ILCHESTER GOAL—TREATMENT OF MR. HUNT.] The Marquis of Titchfield presented a petition from Lynn, praying the interference of the House for a remission of the remainder of Mr. Hunt's imprisonment. The noble marquis read an extract from the petition, in which it spoke of "the unrelenting severity practised towards the victim of ministerial hate, by the petty tyrants in whose power he was placed." The petition then referred, as a precedent for the interference of the House on the present occasion, to their having interfered to procure the remission of the punishment of sir Manasseh Lopez, whose crime was ten thousand times greater than the one imputed to Mr. Hunt. The noble marquis said, he fully concurred in the prayer of the petition, but although he concurred in the prayer, he differed from the petitioners in the reasons which they assigned; for, notwithstanding all he felt upon this subject, it did appear to him that ministers had done no more than their duty in ordering the prosecution of Mr. Hunt. For courts of justice he had the highest respect, and he should not, therefore, be disposed to listen to any thing against their decisions, without the strongest grounds; but the same respect for them made him wish, that they should not become the innocent instruments of unnecessary severity. In looking at the sentence on Mr. Hunt, he certainly did think it a severe one; and it had been rendered much more so, by the great severity with which he had been treated. So much was this the fact, that he looked upon two years imprisonment or less, in the place to which he happened to be sent, as worse than two years and a half in any other prison. Under these circumstances, he considered that, in wishing for a remission of the remainder of the punishment, he was not recommending him to the favour of the Crown, but asking for him a measure of simple justice. He was not one who thought that the House ought lightly to interfere with courts of justice, and especially in a case like the present, as he had no doubt whatever of the illegality of the meeting at which Mr. Hunt presided; but looking at all the circumstances which had since occurred, he thought the home department was called upon to interpose, and advise the Crown to the exercise of its prerogative of mercy.

Ordered to lie on the table.

MOTION TO REMIT THE REMAINDER OF MR. HUNT'S IMPRISONMENT.] Sir Francis Burdett said, that after the numerous petitions which had been presented to the House on the subject respecting which he then rose to address it, and in favour of the motion with which he intended to conclude, and after the able manner in which those petitions had been supported, and especially that presented by a noble lord from Lynn, in Norfolk, he felt somewhat embarrassed regarding the manner in which he should address them, because he thought that the noble lord, though shortly, had strongly occupied all the grounds on which he felt it his duty to press this subject on the attention of parliament; the noble lord having delivered his sentiments in a style that could not fail to produce a strong impression upon the House, from the unaffected simplicity of his language and manner. [Hear.] He must repeat, that he felt more than usually anxious, anxious as he was upon all occasions, in opening a question so materially affecting the liberty of the individual concerned, and so interesting as it appeared, from the numerous petitions from all quarters of the country, to be to the public at large, and when there were strong symptoms of its being favourably considered by a large portion of the House itself. He was also apprehensive that he might not forward, but, by an over-zealous effort retard the object he had in view; namely, the liberation of an individual from an imprisonment which, in the mind, of all impartial men, was a more than adequate punishment for any crime of which he had been found guilty. He must own, that up to the latest moment, he had entertained strong hopes that the ministers of the Crown would have spared him the trouble of addressing the House upon this question. He had been in hopes, that when so plain and palpable a course of proceeding was open before them—a course at once consistent with justice and propriety—a course that would not have been less grateful than just—grateful to the public mind on many accounts, of which the omission would answer no one purpose, but the accomplishment of all those ends which ought to be avoided—namely, that of creating a sympathy with the individual suffering, from a feeling that the crime bore no proportion to the magnitude of the punishment. Under all these circumstances, he had been in hopes that ministers would have recommended the Crown to do that which he did not despair of still persuading them to do, if the House should support him in his present motion. Notwithstanding the difficulty under which the members of administration sometimes laboured, and those trammels by which they felt themselves bound to support generally what they did not on all occasions individually approve, he did not altogether despair of having the able and efficient assistance of the right hon. secretary for the home department on the present occasion. He flattered himself the more with the hope of obtaining it, because, on his [illegible] to apply to that right h[illegible] behalf of two persons, [illegible] lived nea[illegible]residence in the North [illegible] had been [illegible]enced to a punishment [illegible]ch appeared more than commensurate with their offence, and who bore, indeed, so good a character that their neighbours doubted whether they had been properly convicted; he repeated, that on making known their cases to the right hon. gentleman, he had, with a promptitude and humanity that were highly to his credit, taken them into consideration, and afterwards recommended a mitigation of their punishment. He would not say, that he was obliged to the right hon. gentleman for the attention that he had thus paid; he would not pay him the parliamentary compliments usually offered on such occasions, not from any want of courtesy towards him, but from a wish that the right hon. gentleman would take what had fallen from him as he intended it—as a tribute to his integrity and assiduous attention to the duties of his office, and without any regard to the quarter from which it came.

Under these circumstances, he trusted, that if he made out the following propositions—first, that the sentence on Mr. Hunt was sufficiently severe for the crime of which he had been convicted (and here he must observe, that it was not necessary for his argument to impugn that sentence); and secondly, that the mode of carrying it into execution had augmented it tenfold, and in a manner which the judges themselves never dreamt of,—if he made out these propositions, he trusted he should have done that which would ensure him the support of the right hon. gentleman. Besides these two reasons for liberating Mr. Hunt, he had another, which, though he placed last, he did not value least. He thought that gentleman had a claim, and a strong claim too, upon the public, for having brought to light, circumstances, and for having conducted to a successful termination the important inquiry which had been lately instituted into the treatment of prisoners in Ilchester Gaol. In treating of the first proposition which he had laid down, he must beg leave to call the attention of the House to the nature of the charge against Mr. Hunt. In stating that charge, he could not help observing, in passing, the great hardships that sometimes arose from legal proceedings in this country. When a person had different charges preferred against him in what were called the different counts of an indictment, containing every gradation of guilt, from the highest to the lowest, the hardship was, that after a defendant had been acquitted on all the heavy charges, after he had been found guilty of only one small part of one of the charges, by a jury which took five hours to deliberate on their verdict, and which acquitted him of all the rest, and even of all the heavy part of that individual charge on which they found him guilty—the hardship, he repeated it, was, that the persecuting lawyers might direct the jury to find a defendant guilty upon that count which contained the minimum of guilt, and which, if it had stood alone, would never have been thought fit to form the subject of an indictment. In legislating regarding the fisheries in some of the rivers of the country, the House had passed acts to prevent the meshes of the nets used in them from being made so small as to catch the smallest fish. Now, it was particularly hard that these legal meshes should be made so small that even offenders of the slightest nature could not escape them. There was no evidence to support the heavy charges that were imputed to Mr. Hunt; but the narrow meshes of the law were drawn so tightly around him, that it became impossible for him to escape. Even if Mr. Hunt had been found guilty of the heavy part of the charges preferred against him, he would say, that the punishment inflicted on him was a severe punishment. But, when he recollected that the offence of which Mr. Hunt had been found guilty was a misdemeanor, and was classed by Blackstone inter minora delicta, for which an imprisonment of from one to six months was deemed sufficient, he was compelled to say, that the visiting it with the punishment of imprisonment for two years and a half, was more than sufficient for the purpose of justice. But Mr. Hunt's offence, was even minimus inter minora; for of all the charges preferred against him, that on which he was convicted was the slightest; so that they had the anomaly before them, of a man suffering a heavy punishment for a crime that was as small as possible. A great deal more might be said on this part of the subject; because, at the time of Mr. Hunt's committing the offence for which he was now suffering, he was, in mind at least, as innocent a man as could be. It was an ancient maxim of English law, that "actus non facit reum, nisi mens sit rea"; but, in Mr. Hunt's case, a new practice had been introduced: the intention of his mind was not considered; his knowledge of the legality or illegality of his conduct at Manchester was not inquired into; though it was clear, from his previous deportment and his peculiar character, that he would not have adopted that course of proceeding which he afterwards did adopt, had he known it to be in violation of the law. It was not unnecessary, at this stage of the argument, to repeat that the magistrates had sanctioned the meeting of the 16th of August, by not protesting against it; and with regard to what took place at that meeting, he must repeat what he had said on a former occasion, that he was at a loss to know what the crime was of which Mr. Hunt had been guilty, either individually or collectively with others. However, let his guilt have been what it might, no person could say, that an imprisonment of two years and a half was not a punishment sufficient for it. Our old lawyers, who were men who valued highly the freedom of the subject, were accustomed to hold, that the slightest corporal infliction or deprivation of freedom was a much severer punishment than the heaviest fine. If that doctrine were sound, then again must the House admit the great severity of the sentence on Mr. Hunt. Indeed, he would ask them, if an imprisonment of two years and a half was not more than sufficient for so small an offence as that on which Mr. Hunt was convicted, to what period of time they would have limited his confinement, supposing he had been found guilty of the heavier charges preferred against him? If they observed the same proportion, Mr. Hunt's whole life would not be sufficient for the punishment, unless, indeed, it were prolonged to the age of Methusalem; and not even then, unless the life of Dr. Colston were extended to the same age also. [Hear, hear, and a laugh.]

He next came to the second proposition which he had laid down, having, as he trusted, rendered it impossible for any person to doubt of the severity of the punishment which Mr. Hunt was now enduring. In entering upon this part of his subject, he did not intend to introduce any topics that were extraneous from it, or to forestall that discussion which would come more naturally before the House, when the state of Ilchester gaol should be brought before it. He would, however, go as far into it as the report of the commissioners and the petition of Mr. Hunt would bear him out. It would, no doubt, be recollected that Mr. Hunt, on receiving his sentence, did, before he left the court, ask the judge, with great readiness and sagacity, whether it was intended he should suffer solitary confinement? and that the court said in reply, "By no means." Now; when Mr. Hunt was sent to Ilchester, it was said in that House, that he had been sent there because it was one of the healthiest and best conducted gaols in England. If such were really the motive for sending him there, when that gaol was found to be one of the worst conducted gaols in the kingdom, and to be insalubrious to a degree that could hardly be credited, he had a right to say, that even those who inflicted the sentence on Mr. Hunt never intended to submit him to the inconveniences which he had since suffered; and he was glad to observe, that no gentleman in that House had ever contended that Mr. Hunt should be punished in the manner he had been. Not even the hon. members for Somerset had justified the treatment which Mr. Hunt had received. One of them had said, that he did not believe the charges which Mr. Hunt had preferred against the gaoler, but at the same time admitted, that he ought to have all possible accommodation in the prison. The other who was as incredulous as his colleague to the misconduct of the gaoler, declared, that Mr. Hunt ought not to be permitted to suffer any other inconvenience than that of imprisonment for two years and a half, which was inconvenience enough in all conscience. After such declarations, no doubt the two hon. members would, upon finding that Mr. Hunt had really been treated in the manner which he had described in his able petition, agree that the House ought to do every thing it could, to relieve that gentleman, and that the duration of his sufferings ought to be diminished as their severity had been increased. When Mr. Hunt was first sent to Ilchester, he was put into the northern ward of the prison, where no sun ever came for five months of the year—into a room which was cold and damp, and liable to all the changes of the weather and atmosphere, and into which, when the sun did shine it shone not to bless but to annoy his sight; for it shone upon a high white-washed wall, within four or five yards of the window of his apartment, and from that wall was reflected a light so strong and dazzling as to be extremely distressing to the eyes, as he (sir F. B.) had himself experienced on visiting the prison. In consequence of this, Mr. Hunt's eyes had suffered severely. When he entered the prison he was ushered into a room which had a stone floor, and no sort of accommodation. In this place he found two persons confined, who were to be his co-prisoners, his companions in this quarter of the gaol. They were intended to be his sleeping companions, upon two truckle beds which adjoined the apartment; and one of them, in his gaol-dress, was kindly appointed to assist Mr. Hunt in the room of his own servant. The other prisoner who was to be his companion, was a half-witted fellow, but a whole rogue, who was charged with an attempt to murder his own wife and children. Mr. Hunt naturally enough objected to the social enjoyment of such company; they were, he thought, rather too good for him; and at his desire these fellows were remanded to other cells. It was at this time that sir John Acland visited Mr. Hunt in his apartment; and it was due to sir John to state, that so far as he was personally concerned, Mr. Hunt always received at his hands the most considerate attention. Sir John, at the visit to which he alluded, apologized to Mr. Hunt for wearing his hat in the room, and called on Mr. Hunt to do the same thing, as he feared the consequences of cold from his head being exposed in so damp a place. He ordered in a board, to stand upon while he remained in the apartment, and recommended Mr. Hunt to take the same precaution against dampness in his feet on such a spot. Sir John also gave directions that the stone-floor should be immediately boarded over, the windows well closed and secured, and, in short, the apartment made as decent for Mr. Hunt, as it was capable of being rendered under the circumstances of the prison. Mr. Hunt acknowledged this attention on the part of sir John Acland, and felt grateful for it. This showed the previous state of the gaol, which they had been told was selected for the accommodation of Mr. Hunt, as a mark of favour; but which was in every respect calculated to produce an aggravation of the severe lot of his imprisonment. It was impossible to impose greater hardships upon any prisoner than those which

Mr. Hunt endured in this prison. What reason upon earth could there have been for denying him the assistance of his own servant?—The small ward in which Mr. Hunt was confined was, strange to say, intended by the prison directors for an infirmary, an office for which, of all other places, it was the worst calculated: it was, indeed, the very best place that could be selected to prepare a man for the benefit of an infirmary; but the worst possible one to secure for him any fair chance of achieving a cure. And on the subject of an infirmary, it was a remarkable fact, that no such place was, up to the present moment, provided in Ilchester Gaol. In this part of the prison Mr. Hunt was placed; and he was not aware that in the whole prison a better apartment could be found for him, except in the gaoler's house. When he was first confined he was only allowed the benefit of air in a small close yard, about 24 feet in length; from it a door opened into a larger yard, one, perhaps, twice the length of that House, and from which alone any adequate ventillation could be procured for the ward in which he lived; but to the larger yard he was for a long time denied access. At last, however, that indulgence was granted, to do away, perhaps, the effect of his previous solitary and dreadful confinement. And here, in justice to Mr. Hunt, he ought to say, that so reasonable and moderate were his demands, that whenever the parties to whom he applied could be got to consider his applications, they were usually successful. Sir Charles Bampfylde, the late sheriff, who on this, as on every other occasion, demeaned himself like an upright magistrate, issued an order against Mr. Hunt's solitary confinement, and directed that his visitors, both male and female, should be admitted to see him; and that, in fact, a more liberal system of treatment should be observed towards him; but even before that worthy sheriff had retired from office, the rev. Dr. Colston—a visiting magistrate, unfortunately, of this prison, interfered, in spite of sir Charles's positive orders for an amelioration of Mr. Hunt's treatment, and enforced against him the most unjustifiable restrictions. The reverend doctor acted in this case in the most unjust, imperious, cruel, and ungentlemanly manner in his treatment of Mr. Hunt; and three times, in defiance of the sheriff's orders, renewed the scandalous, degrading, and disgraceful restrictions which it was the object of those orders to remove.—[Hear, hear.]—It was while suffering under these cruel orders that Mr. Hunt was struck with the gross malversation carried on in the gaol, and the necessity, if possible, of some inquiry, in the hope of exposing so much cruelty. It was under these circumstances of restriction and privation, which few men could bear up against, and with an energy rarely possessed, that Mr. Hunt surrounded by difficulties, having before him, as things then stood, an impossibility almost of obtaining a fair hearing, and little chance of getting a full or fair inquiry, it was under such circumstances, and superior to them all, that Mr. Hunt had called for, or rather demanded, an inquiry into the prison abuses. He firmly demanded it, too, against a gaoler, who had acquired a sort of character for integrity in his office; who had, in fact, obtained not only the ear of, but a degree of ascendancy over, the magistrates that should have controlled him, who used to dine at table with some of them, rather upon the footing of a companion and friend, than as a subordinate. This gaoler had succeeded, by a course of deceit, by unaccountable cunning, by a tissue of hypocrisy, in insinuating himself into the confidence of those about him, and in having so imposed upon honourable and worthy men, as to have obtained a high character for probity and humanity. It was this successful deceit which had unfortunately enabled him to continue so long a dreadful instrument of inflicting human suffering, to a degree hardly to be equalled in the annals of tyranny within the sphere of a gaoler's opportunities. Mr. Hunt first applied in the way of charge to the visiting magistrates; and at last, after stating various strong and convincing facts of harshness, and oppression, he compelled them to give ear to his complaint. The gaol-committee, then, at his suggestion, or rather upon his firm demand, instituted the inquiry; and they had not proceeded more than three days in the investigation, when, struck with the confirmatory evidence of the truth of the complaints, they offered a sort of compromise to Mr. Hunt; they agreed that the gaoler ought to be dismissed; they said his resignation should be tendered, if Mr. Hunt were satisfied not to press for further proceedings. Mr. Hunt treated this proposal as it deserved. He said—"No; it is your province to determine upon the conduct of the gaoler as you shall think proper, and to decide upon the facts as they shall appear in evidence. I charge your public officer with being guilty of great public abuse; and I am ready to prove that charge, and let you see the nature of his conduct. I must call for inquiry, not only with a view to his punishment, but also to secure future prisoners from the recurrence of such cruelty: it is for you to conclude the matter, I shall not consent to its suspension."—[Hear, hear.] It was a singular coincidence, that the moment Mr. Hunt rejected this proferred compromise, the gaoler's solicitor, Mr. Joddrel, who, by the way, was mixed up with all these proceedings, served Mr. Hunt with the copy of an attachment for costs, which he represented himself to have been put to, by an application to the court of King's Bench, made by Mr. Hunt, in the hope of getting relief from some of the scandalous acts of oppression and exclusion to which he found himself exposed. This attachment, he repeated, was served the moment Mr. Hunt refused to stifle inquiry. And another strange coincidence was, that on the heels of it came another legal process, demanding payment from Mr. Hunt of Excise penalties, for what was construed to be a breach of the law; but which it was on all hands admitted, was quite unintentional: it was for an act, which, he must say, did not in any sense come within the purview, not to say of the severity, but of the plain and obvious meaning of these harassing laws: It was for a discovery, that roasted wheat or rye was capable of being made into a good, cheap, and wholesome breakfast-beverage as a substitute for coffee for the poor. For this discovery, meritorious and useful as he pronounced it to have been, Mr. Hunt was convicted by the Excise, and ordered to pay a penalty of 100*l.* for selling the article, and another penalty of 100*l.* for making it. No man believed, when Mr. Hunt made this breakfast-powder, that he dreamt of infringing upon any Excise law. He could have had no private or public motive to induce him to evade that law: but, notwithstanding this evident innocence on the part of Mr. Hunt, he was by a technical construction of the law, exposed to a severe and cruel penalty. Besides, he understood that a law officer of the Crown in that House had intimated, that it was not intended to press for those penalties. Yet so it was, the penalties were enforced. When this Crown extent was issued, notice was at the same time served upon Mr. Hunt's tenants, not to pay him any rent; so that at the very moment the demand for payment was made, under all the terrors of the law, to a prisoner in close custody, the parties making it took the decisive step of cutting off from him all means of satisfying their imperative demands. [Hear, hear.] Mr. Hunt in this situation, requested that the sheriff would collect the rents in satisfaction of his extent. Oh, no! the sheriff refused to collect them; and proceeded at once to advertise his estate for public sale, on account of the Excise penalties. Every body knew what was the nature of a sheriff's sale, and the condition in which all property was placed when subject to it. In consequence, a general notion prevailed that the estate was abandoned to summary confiscation, and exposed to the dilapidations which usually precede such sacrifices. He believed some timber was wantonly cut down and removed and other spoliations committed by marauders on the occasion. The day of sale was first fixed for the 10th of February, and afterwards a nearer day, the 7th, was named for the sheriff's auction. Mr. Hunt, however, found means to raise the 200*l.* to pay the penalties, and thereby saved his estate from the confiscation which threatened it. How did it happen, he must again ask, that these penalties were not called for until Mr. Hunt was engaged in detecting and exposing local abuses? Was Mr. Hunt to be told, that he could not venture to do his fellow-subjects service, but at the expense of his property? Was he to be told, that what would have been meritorious in any other person, was in him an offence, for which there was a determination that he should incur a harassing responsibility? Independant of the hardship, there was great impolicy in this proceeding. At a time when general complaints were made of the pressure of agricultural distress, when one cause of the complaint was, that the glut in the market was such, that there was no suitable demand for the commodity, here was a man who, by his discovery, opened a new channel of consumption in the market, which served both the seller and the consumer, and yet he was to be punished for his sagacity! He should have rather been presented with a reward for his ingenuity, than a penalty for a violation of law which he never could have contemplated—[Hear, hear.] And yet such had been the hard fate of Mr. Hunt.

There were, however, other parts of Mr. Hunt's treatment of a yet more atrocious character; for instance, the refusal of admittance to his visitors; and amongst them, the denial of permission to an anxious and dying sister, to take the last opportunity she was likely to enjoy of seeing an affectionate and afflicted brother. Would it be believed, that this refusal to a dying sister, to take a last farewell of an imprisoned brother, was given by a man of station in society? Or, still more would it be believed, that that man professed to be a teacher of the lessons inculcated by the mild spirit of Christianity—that he was a minister of religion, and that religion the Protestant faith—a believer in the religion of Christ? Would it, he said, be believed, that from such a man the hard-hearted and cruel refusal came to an expiring woman to take her last leave of a brother whom she loved. But so it was: she was refused this sad consolation, and she died, without ever again seeing her brother—[Hear.] How far a refusal, under the circumstances in which she was placed, tended to accelerate that doom to which she was approaching, he could not pretend to say; but this he knew, that the refusal was the most outrageous, the most atrocious, and the most repugnant act to every feeling of humanity and justice, that he knew upon record. This act had been done by the Rev. Dr. Colston, and in doing it he had not only violated his sacred duty as a clergyman, but his legal duty as a magistrate: he had paid no attention either to law or to gospel; but had ventured to forget both by a more heartless, more wicked, a more cruel and flagrant act, than had a parallel in the transactions of the most atrocious institutions that ever cursed mankind in the most cruel of times. [Hear, hear.] It was worse, taking all its attendant circumstances into the account, than any thing he had read of in the dark proceedings of the Spanish Inquisition.

It was one of the singular circumstances attending the malversation in Ilchester gaol, that the very enormity of the wickedness practised within its walls, furnished, for a long time, its best protection. The flagrancy of the deeds was such as to stagger credibility. They were, however, unfortunately proved to be too true: they were, through the persevering and unappalled energy of Mr. Hunt, confirmed by irrefragable evidence: and he (sir F. Burdett) would say, that for bringing forward such an inquiry, and for the ability he had displayed in conducting the investigation when it was commenced, Mr. Hunt was entitled to public thanks: he deserved that tribute for his fortitude at such a moment; but, above all, he was entitled to it for the benefit which his country could not fail to derive from the inquiry. Every man in England would have cause to rejoice in the consequences of that investigation; and that individual had a strong claim upon public gratitude, who had put an end to this atrocious system of prison oppression, and had held out to all the gaolers of the empire, both now and hereafter, a memorable example of disgrace and punishment. The government, too, had a right to feel indebted to Mr. Hunt, inasmuch as he had been the means of relieving them from the odium which must necessarily attach to them, for any acts of cruelty or injustice committed under their government; for in every case ministers were responsible for the guilty acts of those subordinate officers over whom it was their duty to keep a vigilant eye. This reverend doctor (Colston) among his many other acts of oppression towards Mr. Hunt, had, during Mr. Hunt's solitary confinement, by his order, and while he was, through that severity, severely afflicted with cramps and spasms in his stomach, refused his application to have the professional aid of a medical gentleman in Ilchester, who had previously attended him. The reverend doctor had treated this application with the utmost contempt, and referred Mr. Hunt to the regular gaol doctor. Now, when the House should look at the evidence respecting this gaol doctor—when they found him mixed up as a party with almost all the acts of the gaoler, and, according to his own evidence, guilty of misapplying the great means which the healing art furnishes for alleviating human affliction, for the purpose of inflicting torture upon his fellow creatures, they would cease to wonder that Mr. Hunt preferred trusting to nature and a good constitution, rather than place himself in the hands of this humane gaol doctor. It was not enough that there were to be found in that prison, chains, stocks, handcuffs. No, this would not do. There was a doctor, who did not hesitate to apply a blister to the head of a man in irons. Why? Because he was ill? because his health required it? No such thing. The blister was applied because the man was considered to be—"a troublesome fellow" [hear, hear!]. This application of blisters appeared to have been a favourite punishment in Ilchester gaol; for, by the evidence, it appeared, three persons, Evans, Halkins, and Gardner, had all been blistered. One was blistered in order to "mend his manners;" another, because he was "a troublesome jockey;" a third because it was thought "he shammed;" and so this last person was blistered on the side. Was it surprising that, with these facts before him, Mr. Hunt should decline availing himself of the assistance of this kind and humane gaol doctor? Having suffered under repeated spasmodic attacks for eleven days and nights, Mr. Hunt made application to the Court of King's-bench, and an order was made for the admission of his medical attendant; and, in consequence Mr. Hunt was now as far recovered as a person placed under such circumstances could be expected to be. Soon after this, a new chairman was appointed by the magistracy; and that gentleman took every step in his power to make Mr. Hunt's situation as comfortable as circumstances would admit. But it was for what Mr. Hunt had suffered—it was for the punishment that had been inflicted upon him beyond the law—that he now called upon them to adopt the measure which he was about to propose. That Mr. Hunt had suffered more than was intended by the Court which sentenced him, was evident from the fact of that Court having, upon his application, afforded him relief from certain restrictions under which he laboured. Let it not, therefore, be said, that by adopting this measure, they would interfere with the jurisdiction of the courts of law. In support of the allegations which he had made, he should feel it necessary to read a few extracts from the report of the commissioners. When he saw the names of the gentlemen appointed on the commission, among whom was a relation of his own (Mr. Munday), he felt the fullest confidence in the result of their labours, and in that confidence he was fully justified. At the same time, the commissioners instead of giving a colour, or endeavouring to make out a bad case, had softened down the facts stated before them as much as it was in their power as honest men to do. Yet, notwithstanding this, they came to the conclusion that the government of the gaol was the very reverse of what it ought to be; that the very situation of the gaol rendered it impossible to have effective improvement; that as to regulations for the management of the prison, they were in too many instances unattended to; and that the visiting magistrates had been remiss in the due performance of their functions; that they, in fact, had trusted too much to the discretion and judgment of the rev. Dr. Colston. Indeed it was apparent, that the other visiting magistrates rather leaned to screen this man's acts, than to investigate and correct them. With respect to the powers and conduct of the magistracy as a body, he was as ready as any man to admit their beneficial effect, but he must protest against the lumping way in which some gentlemen were prone to speak of the acts of the magistracy. It was said that they ought to be protected in the performance of their disinterested and gratuitous duty; that they ought not to be exposed to too rigid a scrutiny; and that what they did wrong, should be overlooked for its motive, and not be afterwards made the subject of inquiry. He protested against this doctrine. He objected to the opinion that because they were unpaid they should be irresponsible. If receiving no pay entitled them to freedom from inquiry, in God's name let them be paid for their services, and held answerable for their acts! But unfortunately the great body of the upright magistracy of the kingdom were thus insulted, and their real utility decried by being mixed up with these ignorant meddling, pettifogging individuals, who had crept into the magistracy to gratify some pusillanimous desire for petty power—and consequential authority, and made a gaol the scene of their tyranny, or the instrument of their malicious or corrupt oppression.

But, to return to the state of this prison: its locality exposed it to every kind of disadvantage. There were no means of effectually cleansing it, except by the constant application of human labour. The pumps for supplying the gaol with water were constantly contaminated with filth; and the various drains which ought to carry off noxious ingredients, never swept away the impurities. Nay, strange to say, although there was a river within a stone's throw of the gaol, it was deemed too great an indulgence to suffer debtors to be supplied with water from its bed. They were not even allowed to receive a pint of beer from a friendly visitor, without permission from this humane doctor and his colleague, the equally humane gaoler. All this was contrary to the provisions of an act of parliament. Bad as was the old law for governing prisons, it was not half so severe as this wanton practice. It would be in vain to preach up the reformation of prison discipline, if torture and oppression could be inflicted with impunity. By the evidence it would be seen, that a considerable manufacture had been carried on in this gaol, and that Mr. Hunt offered to prove that the gaoler derived great profits from it. The commissioners refused to enter into that head of inquiry, and left it for the consideration of the county. Independent of the cruelty inflicted, enough appeared to show that the gaol was utterly without classification. The women were, it was true, separated from the men, for purposes of morality; but they were always locked up by male turnkeys, to whose visits they, at all hours, must have been consequently exposed. There was, in fact, an utter disregard of every thing like prison discipline in this gaol; and yet it had been held out as a model of perfection to the whole kingdom.—There was another singular thing apparent in these transactions. The turnkeys, or persons under the gaoler, instead of being selected from men who deserved reward for their good conduct, were taken from the worst characters in the gaol. So said the commissioners. One of them was a man who had been three times confined for different offences, and who was a remarkably bad character. Such were the persons intrusted with the gaoler's confidence. It was his duty to repeat, that the principal allegations of Mr. Hunt's petition were sustained by the evidence before the commissioners. A more important subject than the present could not possibly be brought under the consideration of parliament. The commissioners reported the particulars of the gross and scandalous conduct of the late gaoler, and expressed their sentiments of indignation thereat. There could, indeed, be but one opinion among all who heard him; it was not necessary, therefore, that he should more particularly advert to this part of the report. But he would just notice the case of Mary Cuer, which the commissioners described as "one of extraordinary cruelty. With a young infant at her breast, this young woman was, during a period of severe frost and snow, locked up in a solitary cell from Thursday till Sunday. She had had a quarrel with another female prisoner, who, with her infant, was also subjected to the same punishment. It appears by the evidence of Mary Cuer, that for the two first days there was no fire in her cell: that she suffered severely from cold, and that during the whole of the four days' confinement she was provided only with bread and cold water in a bucket, without the use of any lesser vessel to drink it out of, and she was not allowed the opportunity of laying out, for the benefit of her child, the money granted by the parish for its maintenance, nor even of warming a part of her own allowance of bread and water for its support; and her own milk having, under these privations, failed entirely, no mitigation to the sufferings of the infant could be derived from that source." [Cries of hear.] He did think that this was a case of iniquitous cruelty exceeding any thing he had ever heard of. He knew of no form of language, of no felicity of expression, which could be more emphatic or more affecting than this simple and unlaboured statement of a mother, with a famishing infant at her breast, shut up in a prison at Christmas—in that inclement season when the snow and frost without, increased the bodily sufferings of those who were immured within; and denied even the sustenance of water, excepting in a bucket—[Hear, hear.]—as if it were necessary that cold water should be conveyed to her in a manner which might most aggravate her other sufferings!" Good God! could the torments of hell itself exceed the misery endured by this unhappy woman? Was it possible for the human mind to conceive a picture of greater agony, than a helpless mother, thus excluded from all relief, from all sympathy even, with an infant starving at her breast, and her ears for ever pierced with the unavailing cries of her offspring for its food? Could any ingenuity produce a more deplorable or afflicting case? And did facts like this lay no ground for the proposition he was about to submit to the House? Why, he was prepared to say, that if Mr. Hunt had done no more than bring to light such enormous cruelties as these, and thereby become the cause of preventing such scenes from ever occurring again in our gaols, he might reasonably claim some consideration from a body professing, to a certain degree at least, some sympathy with the feeling of the public. On this ground alone Mr. Hunt would surely be entitled to some manifestation of favour from that House. If a House of Commons, at a former period of our history, had received an eulogy from a celebrated poet, for having inquired into the abuses of gaols, and detected the evils of the then existing system —if Thomson could have been moved to commemorate that band of patriots, not to be forgotten—

"Who, touch'd with human woe, redressive search'd
Into the horrors of the gloomy gaol,
Unpitied and unheard, where misery moans,
Where sickness pines, where thirst and hunger burn,
And poor misfortune feels the lash of vice:
While in the land of Liberty, the land
Whose every street and public meeting glow
With open freedom, little tyrants rag'd, Snatch'd the lean morsel from the starving mouth;
Tore from cold wintry limbs the tatter'd weed;
Ev'n robb'd them of the last comforts, sleep;
The free-born Briton to the dungeon chain'd:
Or, as the lust of cruelty prevail'd,
At pleasure mark'd him with inglorious stripes"—

if, for the exertions which a House of Commons at that period made in such a cause, it had received this memorable eulogy, what ought to be the praise bestowed on Mr. Hunt? What was his desert, who had brought to light such a monster as this execrable gaoler? [Hear.] Let gentlemen consider how Mr. Hunt was situated when he rendered his country this great service. He was under the lock and key of the same relentless torturer, and even his life was in danger; for under the same roof with such a gaoler, no man's life could be safe. It appeared, however, that the visiting magistrates had offered to compromise matters with this disgraced character, after Mr. Hunt had succeeded in making known these enormities. Was it not too much that these gentlemen should think of leaving Mr. Hunt in the power of this man, after such exposures had been made? He would confess, that to him it appeared almost providential and miraculous, that the other unfortunate beings, broken down in mind, and spirit as they must have been, should have had the energy to establish charges of so atrocious a nature against a gaoler under whose control they were. It was highly important, in order to show the extent of Mr. Hunt's sufferings, to read that part of the report of the commissioners, which described the state of the apartments in which he had been placed. "We had the opportunity of seeing these three wards under different circumstances of weather; and the impression left on our minds is, that they are, for the purposes to which they are intended to be applied, the most objectionable part of the gaol. It is in this part that the inconvenience of high walls is most sensibly felt: with a northern aspect and no good admission of air, all the worst effects of damp prevail in an aggravated degree; the cold evaporations of wet seasons and the heat of the summer, each generate a species of atmosphere distressing and insalubrious. When to this is added the distance from that assistance so constantly required in hospitals, we consider the ward intended for the sick peculiarly ill-suited to its purpose. When we visited Ilchester, this ward was occupied by Mr. Hunt and the adjoining refractory ward, was given up to two prisoners who attended upon him. The magistrates appeared to have made many alterations calculated to improve the apartments for the occupation of Mr. Hunt; and in the general arrangement, it did not occur to us that the gaol could have admitted (without great sacrifice) of a disposition more conducive to his comfort. So long, however, as such an exclusion of sun and air continues, the main objection to the ward cannot be considered as removed." Why, the mere exclusion of sun and air from the prison chamber of a man who was sentenced to be confined there two years and a half, was a pretty considerable grievance in itself. But if, in addition to being confined in this way, he was to be subjected to the cruelty of his inhuman gaoler, it was no great mercy not to have taken away his life at once. Of the visiting magistrates he should not say much, excepting only of the rev. Dr. Colston. However extraordinary it might seem that an individual of his profession should be so disposed, it was not less true, that Dr. Colston appeared to have been the man, who, on every possible occasion, was foremost in his endeavours to deprive a prisoner of the means by which his health might be preserved or his comforts extended. Nay, the disposition of this rev. gentleman towards Mr. Hunt was manifested even after the new gaoler had gone down to the prison. That individual, for the sake of ventilation, had left a little door open, which led into a sort of yard near Mr. Hunt's room. But, then down came Dr. Colston, and notwithstanding that the commissioners had reported this indulgence in terms of commendation, and that every principle of common humanity and common sense required its continuance, he ordered the door to be shut up. At present, however, not only this door was again left open as before, but even the high walls, which had been complained of had been lowered so as considerably to improve the ventilation of the gaol. He (sir F. B.) did mean to say, that, after Mr. Hunt had been thus subjected to the vexatious caprices of an arbitrary magistrate, and of a brutal gaoler—after he had passed twelve months of solitary confinement (and it was important to remark, that solitary confinement formed no part of his original sentence), an aggravation which was never intended to be inflicted—he had a fair claim upon the consideration of parliament. His cause was still further aggravated, by the insult contained in the observation of an hon. member, who had said, that Mr. Hunt's was a voluntary solitary confinement; because, forsooth, Mr. Hunt did not condescend to avail himself of a permission to walk in a very small room or yard, with felons and other prisoners, who had obtained "a rule" as it was termed. Mr. Hunt did not care to mingle with these unhappy men, covered as many of them were with filth and rags. The offer itself was only adding cruelty to insult. And on the subject of the cruelty exercised towards Mr. Hunt, it was proper to state, that at first he was allowed to see some persons among his friends; then he was forbidden to see certain others of them; and at length Dr. Colston positively prohibited all visitors whatever. These severities had aggravated the original sentence of Mr. Hunt beyond all measure. Another thing not to be forgotten was, that Mr. Hunt was only one out of a number of persons who were included in the same verdict. There were Johnson, Healy, Knight, and another individual, who were all of them included; and if there was any guilt in the transaction in regard to which they were tried (though he was at a loss to conceive how any guilty intention could have existed on that occasion, and certainly none was proved against them), each of those persons was more guilty than Mr. Hunt. Mr. Hunt was an invited person only; but the others had framed the resolutions, and originated the meeting. Yet, strange to say, they had been sentenced to one year's imprisonment only in Lincoln gaol; and none of these four individuals had had any reason to complain of unnecessary severity. Was it possible for the public to form any other judgment on the subject than this—that Mr. Hunt was, in truth, the victim of vindictive feeling? The people did think that his majesty's government had done themselves no good by their treatment of this individual. They had, in fact, by their own act and deed, elevated Mr. Hunt into the character of a martyr. They had taught the people to look up to him as their victim; and after the exposures which he had caused to be made, the people could not but feel that he had done a most important service to his country. The inquiries which Mr. Hunt's representations had led to, must, ere long, tend to produce an entirely new modification of our gaol system, and of the severities of solitary confinement. However well intentioned the late Mr. Howard might have been, his system in this respect had been productive of more mischief than any other system of imprisonment. In this day it was common to hear declamations against theories as Utopian; but he knew of none that more deserved that name than the scheme for making a prison a house of reform. It was only justice, however, to admit, that Mr. Howard only intended, that the solitude of imprisonment should relieve the guilty from the contagion and example of crime. It was his wish, that the imprisoned should be treated with the utmost humanity—that they should be visited by chaplains and magistrates—that they should be expostulated with, made sensible of their crimes, and reclaimed from the paths of wickedness to those of virtue. He never wished that, under his system, men should become imbecile, or driven to madness and despair. That humane individual never desired that human beings should be shut up in places where one would not keep a dog. But the men, who, to a sentence of more than two years solitary confinement, had superadded numberless cruelties, who on the victims of such a sentence had in many instances aggravated punishment by insult, had introduced into the country a system of imprisonment totally repugnant to every feeling of humanity, every principle of justice, and every dictate of common sense. On the grounds he had stated, he did trust that Mr. Hunt would be considered to have some claim to the favourable treatment of that House. If ministers wished that these deeds of darkness should be brought to light, and checked in their origin, they must feel that inquiry and detection were the only means of effecting their wishes; but if, on the other hand, they thought that such detection was mischievous, they would perhaps consider, not that Mr. Hunt had any claim upon them, but that he was a fit object of further punishment. Be that as it might, the public would not come to this last conclusion. Whether, however, they would remit the smaller and by far the lighter part, of Mr. Hunt's sentence, it was now for them to judge. For his own part, it became his duty to submit to the House three propositions: 1st, that Mr. Hunt's sentence was originally more than sufficiently severe; 2nd, that that sentence had been aggravated by the abuse of the powers vested in the local authorities of his prison; and thirdly, that he possessed some claim on the public gratitude by reason of the successful exposure which he had made of the abuses existing in the prison at Ilchester. If hon. gentlemen should agree with him in all, or in any of these points, he trusted that they would not think the course which he was now about to propose, at all objectionable; namely, an address to his majesty, which would give him the opportunity of exercising that prerogative which he felt assured was most congenial to his majesty's beneficent disposition, by remitting the remaining portion of a punishment, the complete infliction of which could be attended with no public benefit. He therefore moved, "That an humble address be presented to his majesty, praying that he would be graciously pleased to remit the remainder of Mr. Hunt's imprisonment."

Mr. G. Dawson declared, that in the observations he was about to offer, he did not mean to defend the departure which had taken place from all principles of humanity, in the conduct of the late gaoler of the prison in question. At the same time he thought that the feelings of men might seduce their judgments. No man ever went to a dungeon where he witnessed the situation of an unhappy convict, without having his compassion highly excited. He proposed to examine into the charges of cruelty preferred on the part of Mr. Hunt. The hon. baronet had assumed, that the sentence passed upon Mr. Hunt was too severe. He (Mr. D.) did not conceive that he should be justified in opening this question, and on such a subject he could not but bow to the decision of the learned judges who passed that sentence. It did happen, however, that Mr. Hunt's own complaints included not half the grievances stated by the hon. baronet. Mr. Hunt had made no complaints about the blister on the head—the irons—the water-bucket; but had represented, that he was confined in a dark room, with a high brick wall, which shut out the sun, and that he was debarred from communication with his family. In regard to the matter of cruelty, the hon. baronet, so far as Mr. Hunt was concerned, had totally failed to establish his charge; and if he (Mr. D.) should be able to show that Mr. Hunt had himself praised the salubrity and convenience of his apartment, he did trust that that part of the question would be entirely disposed of. On the 15th of May, 1820, Mr. Hunt was sentenced to two years and a half imprisonment. When that sentence was passed he applied to Mr. Justice Bayley, to know whether his confinement was intended to be solitary? Mr. Justice Bayley replied, "Certainly not;" and added, that if Mr. Hunt should find reason to complain of improper hardship, he might appeal to the Court. On his arrival at Ilchester, Mr. Hunt was placed in a room of the prison which the hon. baronet had been pleased to call a dungeon. It was, however, situated in the female ward of the prison, and, therefore, not very likely to be placed in the most uncomfortable situation. When Mr. Hunt first arrived, two or three beds were in this room, and did remain there for one night, in consequence of the absence of the gaoler; but on his return they were removed, and a comfortable feather bed was provided for him at the expense of the county. The persons with whom Mr. Hunt had been described as not condescending to mix were not felons, but imprisoned for misdemeanors only. For the convenience of Mr. Hunt, bells were hung; and the floor of his apartment, which before was of stone, was replaced with one of wood. This was at Mr. Hunt's own suggestion. To show that these attentions were felt and acknowledged by Mr. Hunt, he would now read a letter from that gentleman, in which he stated—"I believe no man that ever lived was more happy than I am here. In fact, I have every possible care taken of me." [Hear.] It was dated July, 1820. It was true this was only a few weeks after his committal; but he (Mr. D.) begged the House would bear in mind the contents of this letter. Shortly after the appearance of this letter, an order was made by the visiting magistrates for the admission of Mr. Hunt's family. Among the visitors who came, however, was a Mrs. Vince, a woman who was notoriously living (her husband being still in existence) with Mr. Hunt, whose wife was also alive. This was considered to be too grossly immoral. [Cries of "hear."] Such a scandalous connexion the magistrates were bound to discountenance; and they forbad these visits accordingly. From the time that Mrs. Vince was refused admission every thing became jaundiced in the eyes of Mr. Hunt. He applied to the Court of King's Bench, and in his petition prayed, "that no other punishment might be inflicted upon him than that which had been awarded by the Court." He asserted in his affidavit, that, on being conveyed to Ilchester, he was placed in a cold, dark, miserable dungeon—that he was not allowed fire irons or fender (no very important deprivations,) and that his health was materially injured "by being confined within the pestilential walls of a small yard." How did this statement correspond with the letter Mr. Hunt had published in the "Sherborne Mercury?" He had there been guilty of a voluntary falsehood, or in his affidavit had committed a wilful perjury. He complained also to the Court, that "the females of his family" were driven away in a brutal and ferocious manner. The Court of King's Bench called upon the gaoler and the magistrates for their reply, and they put in an answer so satisfactory, that the complaint was dismissed with costs. Besides, whom had Mr. Hunt called "the females of his family?" One of them was a woman with whom he was living in open adultery. The females of his family, properly so called, had never been excluded—his mistress only was refused admission. The refusal of the Court to interpose, was, he thought, a sufficient warrant for the House to reject this motion. He admitted that some slight hardship might have arisen out of the want of accordance between the magistrates and the sheriff; they did not act together: and what at one time was refused, at another was granted. It would have been far better if this vacillating system had not been pursued; but even by that Mr. Hunt had been a gainer, for he had been allowed to continue his adulterous intercourse in the most unblushing manner. The House, however, had nothing to do with this want of concert between the local authorities. The simple question for it was, whether the punishment, as it had been inflicted, was disproportionate to the offence of Mr. Hunt, and whether any thing had been done contrary to the sentence of the Court? He did not think that his imprisonment had been attended with any unnecessary restrictions. His medical, legal, and personal, nay even "the females of his family," had been admitted, although, for some time, an objection, on the score of decorum and morality was made to Mrs. Vince. The restrictions complained of had continued till the 16th Dec., 1820. When sir C. Bampfylde took the management of the gaol into his own hands, free access to all Mr. Hunt's friends was allowed; but no sooner had sir C. retired, than the magistrates thought themselves bound to put the rules of the prison in force, and they supposed that Mr. Hanning, the new sheriff, would continue the opinions he had held as a magistrate. Matters thus remained until the investigation, when Mr. Hanning relinquished his previous notions, and admission was again given to Mr. Hunt's mistress. The magistrates again succeeded in procuring her exclusion; but, subsequently, the admission of Mr. Hunt's friends, male and female, was granted at all times of the day; and at the present moment the only hardship he suffered was the deprivation of personal liberty. That the magistrates had the right to impose and enforce these restrictions there could be no doubt; as the 32 Geo. 3rd, c. 60, was passed for the special purpose of giving visiting magistrates authority. There was no reason why Mr. Hunt should not be treated like all other prisoners; yet he had been even more favoured than the debtors; for the debtors in Ilchester gaol were not allowed to be visited by their wives. He was of opinion, that the magistrates would have forfeited their characters and neglected their duty if they had permitted the adulterous intercourse between Mr. Hunt and Mrs. Vince. Of all men in the world, Mr. Hunt had the least right to expect favour. He had run a long and dangerous career; and, with a considerable share of talent, he had applied it to the worst purposes. He had thrust himself forward every where: he had even gone out of his way to attract popularity: he had put himself at the head of mobs, rebels whom he had instigated to rapine and violence; he had put himself at the head of a new school of rebels, infidels, and blasphemers. He had kept the country in a constant state of alarm, until his course was happily at length arrested by the strong arm of the law. Since he, with those incendiaries Wooler and Carlile, had been safely imprisoned, order and tranquillity had been re-established. He trusted that the result of that night's discussion would not afford a hope to the friends of confusion and anarchy that the public mind would again be poisoned by the seditious artifices of a Wooler, or by the odious blasphemies of a Carlile.

Mr. Hobhouse, from the temperate opening of the hon. under secretary, had not at all anticipated the heat and violence of his conclusion. If such men as Wooler and Carlile endeavoured to inflame the country, such men as the hon. gentlemen and his friends did their utmost to inflame the House, to excite its passions against an unfortunate individual, by mixing up his name with those with whom he was not in any way connected. In this attempt the hon. gentleman had shown far more skill than fairness, though the portion of skill, judging at least by its effect, was indeed scanty enough. He begged the hon. gentleman to show him, if he could, what Wooler or his "seditious artifices" had to do with this debate, or how Carlile and his "odious blasphemies" affected the question before the House? He had heard of no blasphemy of Mr. Hunt's, no impiety, no infidelity. He was not so well acquainted with the writings of Mr. Hunt as the gentlemen opposite seemed to be; but there certainly was nothing of these imputations against him there; there was no such crime on the record, and he protested against the associating Mr. Hunt's name with invidious topics, merely for the purpose of diverting them from the consideration of his claims on their justice. The hon. gentleman had failed to show that the statement of his hon. colleague was in any respect exaggerated. In endeavouring to discredit the testimony of Mr. Hunt, the hon. gentleman had discredited the commissioners. Every thing which the hon. gentleman alleged in defence of the magistrates and gaoler, had been set aside by the commissioners. Every charge against the gaoler and magistrates, made by Mr. Hunt, had been substantially admitted to have been proved. The hon. gentleman had gone out of his way to give them a lecture on adultery. He trusted he had as much love for morality as the hon. gentleman. Certain it was, that the friends of liberty in that House had much more need to be pure in their morals than gentlemen on the other side, as their conduct was more closely watched, and was commented upon with malignity, with (as an hon. gentleman had suggested to him) paid malignity. But he recommended to the hon. gentleman to be cautious on that topic, as, when he uttered censures on immorality in general, he knew not how high his shafts might reach. His condemnation might affect persons very different from the defenceless individual whom he had dragged forward on the floor of the House. The intercourse of Mr. Hunt with Mrs. Vince was no doubt to be considered scandalous; but who were the persons who complained of it? The magistrates who had permitted an improper intercourse to exist between the male and female prisoners, and Mr. Bridle, who, there was good reason to suspect, had carried on an improper intercourse with a female prisoner. How, then, did the hon. gentleman pour all the thunders of his morality on Mr. Hunt alone? The magistrates, however, were not so confident in their morality as the hon. gentleman, for they had withdrawn their prohibition, and Mrs. Vince was now allowed to visit Mr. Hunt. The hon. gentleman had relied on the fact, that Mr. Hunt had thought differently of the gaol at the beginning of his imprisonment. But, the hon. gentleman had not told them the date of the letter on which he relied. The letter was written in July. Mr. Hunt had only been committed at the end of May, and it was to be observed that in the summer months the inconveniences of which Mr. Hunt complained were not perceptible. If Mr. Hunt, after that short residence in the gaol, thought it a place in which a man could be happy, he was as much deceived as to it, as the hon. gentleman who had not been there, or the members who had formerly come forward to vouch for its good management, after what they had thought an examination, and the county members, who had seen it hundreds of times, and who were astonished at the enormities which this investigation had brought to light. Let the House forget the lectures of the under secretary, and look only at the report of the commissioners. The commissioners said, that Mr. Hunt's cell must suffer for want of sun and air; and when it was considered how trifling these ingredients of human existence were, they would know what to think of his situation. But the magistrates, though they would not allow him sun or air, gave him something to lie on when he was sick—a feather bed. Now this munificent gift, purchased at the expense of the county, and dwelt on by the hon. gentleman, was not thought worthy of notice by the commissioners who perhaps thought it better to provide for continued health than for inevitable sickness. But not only had a feather-bed been given to Mr. Hunt, but a bell to ring up a gentleman in livery—one of the prisoners, with his coat turned inside out to attend him. But this indulgence was thought too much for a person of so determined a character of wickedness as Mr. Hunt, and the bell was taken away. But even this great, though transitory happiness, was not mentioned by the commissioners, who did not seem to imagine that the evil of a want of sun and air could be effectually mitigated, either by the feather-bed or the bell. It was not to be contended, that because Mr. Hunt had been sentenced to imprisonment he was to be treated as a common felon. There were certain cases of imprisonment in which allowances were to be made to the prisoners. The under secretary of state might be safely appealed to on such a point. The three successive sheriffs of Somerset had taken the same view as he had. The court of King's-bench also declared, that no addition should be made to the suffering of confinement. The hon. gentleman had allowed that Mr. Hunt had been made the subject of irritating contradictory orders, but he had said, that Mr. Hunt had derived an advantage from them. How this could be he could not conceive. If Mr. Hunt had at once known what he had to suffer, he might have braced himself up to the endurance of it; but he had at at one time been treated with some mildness—at others plunged in the extremest severities. The hon. gentleman had conceded much of the case. He had allowed the enormities—he had allowed the cruelties perpetrated in the gaol. But, after stigmatizing in their proper terms the enormities of the gaol management, had he no gratitude to him who had brought these enormities to light? He (Mr. H.) could consider Mr. Hunt in no other light, in this instance, than as a public benefactor. He had no reason to regard Mr. Hunt with personal favour: he considered him merely in his public conduct in the investigation of abuses. The hon. gentleman had misrepresented his hon. colleague, in his remarks on Mr. Hunt's sentence. All he had said was, the two years and a half imprisonment was punishment enough for an anomalous crime—not known to be a crime even by the prosecutors—scarcely contemplated as a crime by the jury—an offence which had made it necessary to send the jury back. The hon. gentleman had said, that so much respect should be paid to the tribunals, that their sentences once delivered should be exempted from reflection or censure. He (Mr. H.) had not read the constitutional law of the country. It was one of the most useful duties of representatives of the people, to shew judges that they were not to be exempt from censure, even on their high seats, when the language of revenge spoke in their sentences; and if there was to be liberty in England, not liberty which was merely to round a sentence, but to form the happiness of a nation, this scrutiny must still be exercised over the whole conduct of judges, but especially over the sentences of judges on criminals of state. To those who thought the character and talents of Mr. Hunt full of danger, he would say, that the danger would be augmented by continuing what the mass of people now considered an unjust punishment. On those who did not consider Mr. Hunt as dangerous, as well as those who did—on all who knew what he had done, and what he had suffered, he called as men and gentlemen, and (by a name which involved still higher duties), as Christians, to agree to the motion.

Mr. Dickinson thought, that he could not better begin the observations he intended to make, than by referring to an observation that had been made on this subject, by his worthy friend, the member for Norwich, who had said, that at the commencement of the Coldbath-fields examination, the magistrates had persisted with pertinacity in defending their gaoler. He wished the conduct of the magistrates of Somerset to be contrasted with this.

On the first symptom of accusation, they, together with the sheriff, appointed a committee of their own, to investigate the abuses, the conclusion of which was the dismissal of the gaoler and the surgeon. Of the surgeon's general character, from long acquaintance, he could bear testimony, though he could say nothing with effect to mitigate the sending the blister as a punishment. The hon. baronet had spoken with considerable severity of a misdemeanant, who he said had been appointed as the companion of Mr. Hunt on his going into prison. Any gentleman who would read the evidence would see that there was some reason for this asperity. He would refer to the examination of Wyatt, who was a witness in the true sense of the word, for he was only convicted of an assault, whereas most of the other witnesses, especially the one against Dr. Colston, was a convicted felon; and unless he was pardoned his testimony could not be received in a court of justice. But it appeared in p. 335, that Wyatt had been his servant, and not his companion, for nine months; and in the way in which his services were rejected, and the way in which the relation of master and servant was concluded was, by Mr. Hunt contriving with Hobbs, a turnkey, to have him placed in solitary confinement for twenty-four hours; and for what?—because he came one day suddenly into his room, and found his ward, Miss Gray, sitting upon his knee. This produced great anger on the part of Mr. Hunt at the moment, and ended in the punishment he had stated: the history of this transaction was in the evidence of Wyatt, p. 335. Much had been said of the cruelty practised on Mary Cuer, and which he did not intend to palliate; but this he knew, that the attention of the visiting magistrates was not drawn to it, and that the attention of nobody was drawn to it, till two years after the transaction; and there seemed to be a good deal of variation in the testimony of this witness. The hon. baronet had mentioned two facts, that had that night for the first time met his ears: one was a compromise between the gaoler and the magistrate for his retirement, and on which he thought there must be some mistake; for he had been a party to his dismissal, and had never heard of any compromise. The other was, that Dr. Colston had denied admittance to Mr. Hunt's sister when she was in a state of health in which she could not last long. As he had never heard of this, he with difficulty believed it to be a fact; and he would now repeat what he had said on a former occasion, that from a long acquaintance with Dr. Colston, he believed, although he might, like others, sometimes mistake the nature of his duties, yet he believed him incapable of a deliberate act of cruelty. The nature of the solitary confinement of Mr. Hunt was this; he had, above the other prisoners, the power of walking three hours and a half in the day in the time-yard—a space longer than the length of the House of Commons from its outward walls; he had two times-men to attend him as servants; and in other respects he was like the other prisoners. This could not be termed solitary, nor any thing like it; and yet he was ready to say, that he believed it a more rigid imprisonment than was intended for him by the court of King's-bench! We had heard, that a feather-bed had been afforded him only on his first entrance. In fact, the magistrates had studiously endeavoured to make his apartments comfortable; and, if it was a question at this moment in a court of justice, he would not hesitate to call the hon. baronet to prove, that his upper apartment was as airy an apartment as a man need have; that his lower apartment must of necessity partake of this good air; and that, upon the whole, barring the gloom of a prison, his apartments were such as a man sending his son for the first time to the University would be delighted to find in a college. But, in order that the lower apartment might be made more airy, he had lately, with the other visiting magistrates, visited the gaol, and had ordered that the cross walls might be lowered as far as was consistent with safety; and, as Mr. Hunt had unfortunately contracted a complaint in his eyes, that green blinds might be furnished, to give a more commodious shade to the room. Nobody could lament more than he did the vacillations that had taken place in the councils of the magistrates of Somerset; but the magistrates, nevertheless, had been consistent in their orders, and the sheriff being of a different opinion gave more the appearance of inconsistency than was, in fact, the case. There were no signed rules; and therefore the magistrates thought that they could not follow a better direction than the rules as they were, and these they applied to Mr. Hunt; and whether they ought to have been applied to him or not, there still existed two opinions. But the magistrates knew that they, as a body, were the "custos morum" of the county, and they felt the impropriety of permitting the bad example to be introduced into the gaol, of a cohabitation with a person not his wife, who, notoriously for many years, had been in the habit of living with him. He was the first political offender that had been placed in Ilchester gaol, and it was well thought that no leniency ought to have been shown him on this account; for it was known that political offences were often more mischievous in their results than others, and that they were so contemplated in the law; for the highest offence of that kind, that of high treason, was visited by peculiar punishments. For himself, and a minority of the magistrates, he was of a different opinion, and perhaps he was guided by a law maxim that he had read in the former part of his life, which was, that prisons were "ad conservandos homines, non ad puniendos;" and besides this, he was more inclined to look generally on the subject, and to be governed by the practices of other gaols with regard to this description of offenders. But the authority of Mr. Justice Best silenced his opinion; and after that he owned that he thought it in vain, and he had made no further effort for the unrestricted imprisonment of Mr. Hunt. If the magistrates had acted with impropriety, there was an appeal to the highest tribunal in this country. If it was a new offence, the court of King's-bench had the power, if it chose to exercise it, of speedy and summary proceeding to bring it before them. Nobody questioned its impartial distribution of justice: it was peculiarly watchful over all inferior tribunals. The magistracy of the counties were one of its principal cares: they there knew what countenance to receive for the performance of their duties, and what punishment for their neglect. With regard to his vote that night, it would be against the motion of the hon. baronet. He felt actuated by no feeling of hostility to Mr. Hunt. He lamented the necessity of inflicting on any man two years and a half's imprisonment. But Mr. Hunt had been guilty of a most dangerous offence—that of assembling, with a bad design, an immense number of people. The principle of his punishment was, to deter others from committing a similar offence—"pœna ad paucos, ut metus ad omnes perveniat." He believed it had had its good effect in checking such meetings; and as he hoped the dread of a similar punishment would remain on the minds of the disaffected, he should oppose the motion [Hear!].

Mr. Peel said, that the strong impression he felt, that this particular subject was not fit for the consideration of that House, was a sufficient guarantee, that he would not trouble them with many observations. He felt that he might almost put it to the House, whether, in the course of the hon. baronet's speech, he had laid down any thing like sufficient grounds to induce parliament to interfere with the exclusive prerogative of the Crown, and to depart from that which had been the unvaried practice of the House ever since the Revolution? That practice was, not to express any opinion as to the continuation of a punishment awarded to an individual by a court of justice. On the propriety of adhering to that wise and rational practice, unless compelled to depart from it by some overwhelming necessity, there could be but one opinion. But, if there were one man who, more than another, ought to entertain the opinion that this practice should not be departed from, the hon. baronet was that individual. With his avowed opinions of that House—with his recorded complaints of its encroachments on the peculiar province of the Crown—he conceived that the hon. baronet ought to be the last man to propose a precedent, which, if once established would arrogate to that House a power, than which none could be conceived more fatal to the constitution; since it would have the effect of enlarging the functions of the democratic part of that constitution far beyond its useful and natural boundary. The question was simply this—was there, in this case, circumstances of that overwhelming nature, which should tempt the House to interfere with this most important prerogative—that should induce them to meddle with that peculiar attribute of the Crown, which was wholly alienated from the powers of that House, and was unconnected with the ends for which it was instituted? Before he applied himself to the particular case now before the House, he would offer a remark or two on the observation with which the hon. baronet had prefaced his speech. The hon. baronet alluded to a communication which he had had some time ago, with him relative to the punishment which had been awarded to certain individuals who were apprehended on suspicion of a highway robbery. The hon. baronet had said, that he (Mr. P.) must not consider it as arising from want of courtesy, if he did not pay him a compliment for the course he had pursued on that occasion. Good God! could any one suppose that he expected a compliment on such an occasion? He should consider it as the most severe satire, if it could be imagined that he looked forward to a compliment because he had discharged a duty. The hon. baronet had stated to him the case of two individuals, who were suffering punishment on account of a highway robbery. But on examining the facts of the case, their conduct assumed the character rather of a culpable frolic than of a felonious design. When acquainted with all the circumstances, he had taken the necessary steps for remitting the remainder of the sentence, and the individuals were liberated. He claimed no merit for this act, which, as he before said, was an act of duty. The exercise of mercy ought to be as prompt and as pure as the visitation of justice. Where good reasons were advanced for the extension of mercy, he would immediately attend to them; but he never would consent to recommend any one on the ground of personal favour. But the inference which the hon. baronet attempted to draw from this transaction was, that the system which he (Mr. P.) was anxious to adopt would lead him to call for the remission of Mr. Hunt's sentence. In the transaction to which the hon. baronet alluded, he had been influenced by a sense of public duty alone; and if he opposed the present motion, his opposition sprang from the same source. After having fully considered the subject, the strongest conviction was impressed on his mind, that nothing could be more inexpedient, nothing could be more fatal, than that the House should agree to this address. They would, if they allowed this motion to be carried, establish a most dangerous precedent. Who was Mr. Hunt, and for what crime had he been committed to this gaol? The hon. baronet had quoted several writers to show that his offence was inter minora crimina; but he must look to the intentions of Mr. Hunt, if he wished to discover the particular crime for which that individual was punished. The duty of inquiring into the motives of Mr. Hunt was not assumed voluntarily by him. That duty was imposed on him, by the hon. baronet's motion. The hon. baronet had put him on his trial—he had called on him to state to the House on what grounds he refused to recommend a mitigation of Mr. Hunt's sentence. His reason was recorded in the criminal jurisprudence of the country, where it was entered, that Henry Hunt and others were found guilty of "assembling with unlawful banners, and in an unlawful manner." [Cheering from the Opposition benches.] Was it possible that such a statement could be treated with contempt? Was it possible that a meeting which assembled with unlawful banners, for the purpose of inciting the liege subjects of the king to hatred and contempt of his government, could be treated with levity? If it were so, let that circumstance operate as a warning to the House not to agree to this motion. Let the House well consider the consequences before they acquiesced in an address which told the country that the charge brought against Mr. Hunt was so slight, and his conduct so admirable, that the Commons of England were induced to interfere, and to call on the Crown for a mitigation of punishment. Was there any man who had read what had occurred in Lancaster within the last fortnight, without being convinced of the magnitude of the offence? Did any man see, in the full consideration which the subject then received—in the perfect establishment of all that had been stated on the ministerial side of the House—in the complete refutation of what had been called the Manchester massacre—did any man see, in these circumstances, the least reason for supposing, that the meeting was an innocent one? Had gentlemen read those proceedings? Had they, professing as they did a respect for the decision of a jury, considered the verdict which was returned by the jury at Lancaster? Were not the most decisive proofs given of the previous drilling—of the manner in which the parties marched—of their inflammatory banners—and of expressions which left no doubt as to the almost avowed object of the meeting? Were they, after such evidence, to be cajoled into a belief, that the object of the meeting was peaceable—that it was only assembled to petition parliament for a redress of grievances? Would they suffer themselves to believe this, and allow the constitution to be sapped and undermined, and invaded, by those who took advantage of the liberty which that constitution provided, in order to destroy it with the greater security? He could never view the sentence pronounced on Mr. Hunt as too severe for the crime he had committed. Believing, as he did, that his punishment was fully merited—conceiving that the evidence adduced at his trial fully supported the charge that was preferred against him—he never would, as a servant of the Crown, advise the Crown to remit any part of his sentence. Nay, he would declare, with all respect for the decision of that House, that even its unanimous assent to the motion of the hon. baronet would not induce him to depart from the line of conduct he had adopted, after the most mature consideration that he could possibly give to the subject. He saw nothing in the case that called for commiseration. He saw nothing but accumulated proofs of Mr. Hunt's enormous guilt, in availing himself of that distress by which the country had been visited, for the purpose of inflaming the minds of those with whom he had no other connexion except a community of bad feelings.—And, if he saw nothing in the case of Mr. Hunt that called for parliamentary interference, still less could he see any thing that ought to influence the House in those other circumstances which the hon. baronet had thought proper to introduce. The hon. baronet said, that the sentence of Mr. Hunt was aggravated by the conduct of the magistrates; and he also stated, that he would confine himself to Mr. Hunt's case, and leave all discussion relative to the general discipline which had prevailed in Ilchester gaol for the motion of the hon. alderman (Mr. Wood). Here he wished to observe, that when that motion was brought forward, he would be ready to discuss it, and most certainly he would not defend those acts of arbitrary power which were alleged to have been committed. He would fully state his opinion then; but until then, as he saw no necessary connexion between the question now before the House and the system which had prevailed in the prison, he would abstain from noticing it. He would not follow the example of the hon. baronet, who, perceiving that there was nothing in the case of Mr. Hunt, had, with the skill of an artist, referred to other facts in order to inflame the passions of the House. No motion was introduced, it should be remembered, for the release of those prisoners who were thus incidentally mentioned; but Mr. Hunt, who, of all the prisoners in Ilchester gaol, had suffered the least, was selected as an object of special favour. He would put out of the case, the woman who was placed in solitary confinement—he would put out of the case, the blister which was applied to a prisoner's head. No man could defend such acts; no man condemned them more than he did; but he now rejected them, because they were not connected with this motion. The House, if they meant to decide dispassionately, would leave out of their consideration subjects that were not before them. He found that the magistrates and the gaoler had issued contradictory orders with respect to Mr. Hunt; but he must impute the necessity in which that conduct originated to Mr. Hunt himself. Now, admitting every thing that had been stated to be true, supposing that nothing more horrible could be found in the annals of the inquisition than was experienced in that gaol, why, he asked, was Mr. Hunt selected from amongst the sufferers, as the only object of mercy? Was the insalubrity of the air the great cause of complaint? That was an evil, if it existed, which all must feel as well as Mr. Hunt. In the course of twenty years, about 25,000*l.* had been expended on this gaol, to make it as convenient as possible; and, at the present moment, many persons were confined there who had not been convicted of any crime, but who had the misfortune of being in debt. Now, was it consistent with justice to call on the Crown to mitigate the sentence of a convicted offender on account of the insalubrity of the gaol, while persons who were confined as debtors, were exposed to the same evil? Could they possibly request the Crown to relieve the one, without relieving the other? Or, if they did, would not the omission be fatal, and justly fatal, to the application?—With respect to the other ground advanced by the hon. baronet, that it was through Mr. Hunt's means that an inquiry was set on foot as to the conduct of the gaoler, and that very important disclosures were made in consequence, he must say, that if the hon. baronet compelled him to look at the conduct of Mr. Hunt, he must also take a view of his motives. He did not think that the motives of Mr. Hunt were of the most disinterested character. He believed, also, that had he been placed in any other prison in England, some ground would have been discovered on which, in the opinions of some, a secretary of state ought to recommend the remission of his sentence. On the three grounds which formed the main branches of the hon. baronet's argument, he must oppose the motion. The hon. baronet had, he thought, utterly failed in making out a case. He had not shown that the conduct of Hunt was such as demanded the interference of government: he had not shown that the severity of his sentence had been aggravated by the conduct of the magistrates: and he never could be induced to think that the punishment of the offender was uncommensurate with the offence he had committed. On these grounds he would oppose the introduction of a principle which had not been acted on since the revolution. But above all, he implored the House not to let it go forth to the country, that they relieved this man, because he was guilty of sedition, while innocent persons, who were suffering through unavoidable misfortune, were left, unpitied, to their fate.

Sir J. Mackintosh said, that, before he proceeded to state the grounds on which he would give his vote, he was anxious, on account of the tone which had been adopted by the right hon. gentleman, to declare the grounds on which his vote would not rest. It did not follow, as the right hon. gentleman seemed to suppose, that those who supported the present motion approved of the conduct of Mr. Hunt. He, for one, did not approve of his conduct; but he would support the motion on general principles, and not with reference to the course which Mr. Hunt had pursued. When the right hon. gentleman asked, "Who is Mr. Hunt?" he would answer "He is an Englishman!" He knew Mr. Hunt only in that capacity. On his behalf he made no claim of favour; but he demanded whether he had, or had not, a claim of justice on that House? He should despise himself if, on account of any displeasure he might feel at Mr. Hunt's conduct, he could be induced to abstain from defending those rights of justice which were as sacred in the person of Mr. Hunt as in that of any other Englishman. He did not underrate the charge brought against Mr. Hunt: he did not arraign the verdict, nor dispute the justice of the judgment. He did not take these points into consideration, because they were foreign to the question before the House. He was not ignorant of that painful part of the duty of a judge—the exercise of a discretionary power, and the infliction of a discretionary punishment. No doubt, the grave and learned persons who apportioned the punishment in this instance were satisfied in their minds it was just. But, when he made this remark, he felt himself bound to add, that if he saw any thing which appeared to him to be wrong, he would not shrink from discussing and examining the conduct of any judge. One of the most important duties of a member of that House, was that of arraigning the proceedings of a judge, if they appeared to be improper; and he could not help thinking that it was unwise and undignified on the part of judges, or of their advocates in that House, or elsewhere, to deprecate a fair discussion of their conduct. What had been the conduct of judges before that House investigated their proceedings —before the press noticed their actions—before the public scanned their decisions? They were, like judges in all despotic governments, venal, corrupt, and arbitrary. Such were the judges of the infamous star-chamber. Before the period when a free and fair examination of the conduct of the judges became common, they were wicked or contemptible: since that period, they had acquired a reputation, which rendered them the pride of their own country, and the admiration of the world. Nothing was so calculated to exalt their character, as the bold and manly examination of their conduct. He was not called on now to contest their judgment; but, though he had a reverence for judges, it was not a blind one; and if he thought it necessary to arraign their conduct, he would do so without hesitation. Neither was it his intention to make any attack on the magistrates of Somersetshire, farther than to say, that their negligence allowed an alteration to be made in this prison, by which the punishment awarded by the sentence of the court was aggravated. As to his hon. friend below him, though he attempted to defend his brother magistrates, he had pronounced on them a very severe censure, when he stated his own liberal opinions, from which it appeared they had dissented. Now, the ground on which he supported this motion was, that Mr. Hunt had already suffered more than the court sentenced him to, or could have wished him to suffer. He did not found this opinion on any statements contained in the petitions which had been laid on the table—petitions distinguished by foolish language and questionable facts: neither did he adopt it in consequence of the declarations of Mr. Hunt; but he was induced to form his opinion on the report of the commissioners, which had been very cautiously kept out of view during the discussion. The right hon. gentleman had observed, that no precedent could be found, since the Revolution, for addressing the Crown as to the exercise of this prerogative. The contrary was the fact. There was an abundance of precedents both before and since the Revolution; but there was not an instance in which the precedent was so strongly called for, or where it was so likely to furnish a useful example to future times, as in this case. Surely the right hon. gentleman must recollect the case of sir Harry Vane, in the time of Charles 2nd. It was a very remarkable case. On an address from parliament, the king promised not to prosecute that individual; but he afterwards broke his promise, and sir H. Vane was convicted. In 1697, a most remarkable precedent occurred—a precedent much stronger than any address to the Crown for the pardon of an offender. In January, 1697, an address was presented to the king, requesting him to stop the pardon of Thomas White. He would ask the House whether this was not a much greater intrusion on the feelings of the sovereign, than any address for mercy could possibly be? The House sent on that occasion a commission to Newgate to examine evidence and to report their opinion. This, be it observed, was nine years after the Revolution. This commission made a report on the subject of the inquiry intrusted to it, and upon that report the House resolved, that it would interfere no further, but leave the case to the pleasure of the Crown. Here was an interference of the House, not calling for the exercise of the prerogative of mercy residing in the Crown, but against it—not requiring a secretary of state to represent to his master, that as sufficient punishment had been endured, the royal clemency might be extended to the offender; but to check in the sovereign the exercise of those feelings which he might esteem it his greatest privilege to indulge. Yet, notwithstanding the nature of the case, the House decided, that it would interfere, and king William and the secretary of state of that day deferred to its judgment. The minister of king William did not, on that occasion, use language like that which had been heard that night. He did not declare, that he would resign sooner than convey to his majesty the wishes and views of his faithful Commons. He did not assure parliament that whatever resolution it might pass, it would never induce him to second it by a favourable representation. There was no such secretary of state in that day. On the contrary, the greatest deference was shown to the opinion of the House, and no threats of resignation were uttered. Threats of resignation had been more frequently made than faithfully observed. Had the right hon. gentleman ever heard of another case in which the House had interfered in favour of the exercise of the royal clemency? Had he never heard of the proceeding with respect to the rebel lords in 1716? Sir Richard Steele presented a petition to the House in that year, and made a motion in favour of those lords, which was opposed by sir Robert Walpole, the then minister. Be it remembered, that the case was of infinitely greater importance than the present; it concerned men of high rank and station—men who had committed high treason—who had been found in arms against the government of the country, and immediately after a rebellion which threatened the overthrow of the throne. Sir R. Walpole, therefore, would have been justified in using strong language on the occasion; and if he had pursued the course followed by the right hon. gentleman, he ought to have risen and declared, "Whatever vote the House may come to, I shall never advise his majesty to remit the punishment of these lords: if the motion is carried, I shall resign my office under the Crown, than advise his majesty to comply with it; or I will incur the penalties of an impeachment, by openly advising the Crown to hold it in contempt." Such was the language of the right hon. gentleman; but sir R. Walpole did not take so high a ground, nor threaten the nation with a loss like that which the House had heard threatened that night. The question before the House was extremely simple and limited: it was merely whether the punishment which Mr. Hunt had endured was not greater than that which was intended to be inflicted; and whether, in consideration of that excess of unintended severity, it was not incumbent on the House to address the Crown to remit the remainder. He would omit altogether any reference to the character of the offender. On considering the circumstances on which the present application was founded, it would appear that there never was a case in which the interference of the House would be less liable to be regarded as an encroachment on the prerogative of the Crown. It involved no question as to the degree of punishment proper for his offence, or as to the justice of the judgment pronounced upon him. It was simply whether more had not been suffered than was intended; and this could not be a question of frequent occurrence, or one that could excite any alarm as to its being drawn into a precedent. In consequence of certain statements made in that House, and certain proceedings consequent upon them, an inquiry was instituted into the state of Ilchester gaol; and on the recommendation of the House, a royal commission was sent down to conduct it. These commissioners had made a report, which contained discoveries of abuses existing in the management of that gaol. This investigation was set on foot by the House; these discoveries were made by a Crown commission, appointed on the recommendation of the House, and the House was now called upon to follow up a proceeding which originated with itself. Such was the history of the measure which now remained to be matured. The right hon. gentleman had said, that although abuses existed, Mr. Hunt, who complained, did not suffer by them. Take the evidence as stated in the report of the commissioners. If a person suffered from the cruelty of the gaoler, like that unfortunate woman, Mary Cuer, (than whose case nothing more horrible could be imagined), could such treatment be indifferent, or rather was it not most material to the situation of Mr. Hunt? Who, placed as Mr. Hunt was, could feel security, or be free from alarm, in such a prison? Was it nothing to be under a cruel gaoler, who inflicted torture on his prisoners, and who might extend a similar treatment to himself? What apprehension, what fear, must not the cruelties, the dark malignity, and ungoverned passions of this man, not have excited in the breast of all the persons who felt themselves under his power! It had been stated, that the prisoners at one time were not liable to such treatment; but what said the commissioners? That the whole system was one of cruelty and irritation. The right hon. gentleman had here ventured upon the only argument which he had employed against the motion, in saying that if the House interfered to mitigate the sentence of Mr. Hunt, it ought likewise to interfere in favour of the other prisoners who had been the victims of the gaoler's tyranny, and even in favour of the debtors. How he supposed that the Crown could be called upon to remit their imprisonment to the latter, he did not understand; but with regard to the former, he would show the difference between their case and that of Mr. Hunt. The judges chose Ilchester gaol as the place of his imprisonment; but the other prisoners were in it as belonging to the county. And, why did the judges make such a selection? Because the place was considered a model of good management, and one of the best regulated prisons in England. They had made the choice with these views and under these impressions, which they derived from popular report, and had seen confirmed in a publication of the hon. member for Weymouth (Mr. Buxton), who had laudably devoted a great deal of attention to the state of prisons. This supposed well-regulated prison had turned out to be a scene of disorder and mismanagement: the gaoler, who was previously thought humane and merciful, was found to be a monster of cruelty. Instead of a medical attendant who was imagined skilful and attentive, they met with a man ignorant, obstinate, and capricious, who employed those remedial applications that belonged to his art, as the means of torture and punishment. The situation of the gaol, instead of being dry and salubrious, was humid and unhealthy. In short, this prison, instead of bearing any resemblance to the representations made of it, exhibited an absolute contrast thereto. The court was deceived. The judges could not correct their mistake; and therefore it was incumbent on the House, who had made the inquiries which terminated in this discovery, to address the Crown to do an act of bare justice, in remitting a punishment not originally contemplated. The House ought to complete its own work: it ought not to have addressed the Crown for a commission, which had gone through the farce of reporting, unless it was prepared to act upon that report. No apprehension need be entertained that the present case would often occur, or that the interference of the House would encourage many similar applications. The hon. under-secretary had denied the severity of Mr. Hunt's punishment, and had quoted a letter from Ilchester gaol written in the first months of his confinement, in which he praised the gaoler, and expressed his comfort in his new situation. This letter was written in July: it was probably a flourish, intended to show his friends how much he despised the efforts of his enemies, and with what stoicism he could bear his misfortunes. But, even though true and sincere, what did it prove? Why, that from May to July he had not begun to suffer what he afterwards endured. He (sir J. M.) was not called on to support the veracity of Mr. Hunt, and he would only beg the right hon. gentleman to believe him when he was confirmed by other evidence. The court of King's-bench refused to receive the affidavit of Bridle, when his character came to be known. The magistrates, as well as Mr. Hunt, had been at first deceived and gulled by this man. From the evidence before the commissioners, it was clear that Mr. Hunt had suffered more than was contemplated by the judges. He would warn the House against allowing the obnoxious name of an individual (and he was sensible how obnoxious was the name of Mr. Hunt) to be a palliative of any injustice. He was sure the House was too just and generous to adopt the maxim, that any illegal severity could be practised upon any individual because he was odious, which they would not countenance towards another of more estimable qualities. The injustice established in one case was soon imitated. Tyrants were too quick-sighted to begin with the mild, the gentle, and the amiable. It was among the obnoxious few that the rights of all were first attacked. He, therefore, called upon the House, on all these considerations to support the motion.

Mr. Wynn said, that in the case of White the House reversed its own decision, and therefore the precedent did not apply. In the case of the rebel lords, the House of Peers, who had tried them, interfered as a jury to recommend them to mercy, and the House of Commons, who carried up the impeachment, interfered as prosecutors in the same application. This, therefore, was not a similar case. It had been said, that the offence of which Mr. Hunt had been convicted was not a very grave one; but, in his opinion, it was an offence bordering as nearly as possible, upon high treason. It had not been shown that Mr. Hunt, during his confinement, had suffered any hardships which were not also shared by the other prisoners: in fact, he believed Mr. Hunt had less cause of complaint than any other person in the gaol. The circumstance which Mr. Hunt appeared to consider the greatest hardship to which he had been subjected was his seclusion from the society of a person who did not form part of his family. This person was a female with whom he was connected. There was no reason why Mr. Hunt should, in this respect, be allowed greater indulgence than the other prisoners. Was he to be permitted exclusively to practise immoral conduct? If Mr. Hunt had been allowed the society of that female, the magistrates could not, in common fairness, have refused to any other prisoner the privilege of receiving any prostitute with whom he might be acquainted. He concluded by reading a passage from one of the numbers of Mr. Hunt's Memoirs, in which that individual stated that he had heard sir F. Burdett intended to move for the remission of the remainder of his sentence, on the ground that he had already suffered more than the judges intended. This last idea Mr. Hunt thought was all a hoax. "Would any man" (said Mr. Hunt), "lay his hand on his heart, and say, that he had suffered more than judge Best and two other judges of the King's-bench had intended? Had he suffered more than Best intended he should? He believed that Best would have had him tortured if he could."

Mr. Fowell Buxton said, that having on a former occasion fully stated his opinion with respect to Mr. Hunt's sentence and treatment whilst in confinement, he would not that night have said one word, had it not been for the pointed allusion which his hon. and learned friend had made to him. His hon. and learned friend had referred to him as a kind of witness to the good conduct of Bridle. He begged the House to understand that at the time he (Mr. Buxton) visited the prison, and made a favourable report of its management, none of the evils which had since been proved to exist prevailed. He would say a few words with respect to the question before the House. He dismissed from his mind all consideration of the former conduct of Mr. Hunt; he looked upon him only as a man under sentence. Both the term and nature of his sentence were defined; and it was known that the judges who delivered the sentence believed the prison to be wholesome and well disciplined. Now, it had been proved by the report of the commissioners, and by the result of the coroner's inquest on a prisoner named Bryant, that the gaol was in a damp and unwholesome state. If, therefore, Mr. Hunt remained in that prison, the whole period which the law had awarded for his confinement, he would suffer more than the judges intended—he would suffer injustice.

Mr. Estcourt adverted to some arrangements which had been made in the prison, all of which tended to afford additional convenience to the prisoners. Mr. Hunt had appealed to him, as one of the commissioners, to bear testimony to his conduct, and he must, in justice to that individual, now say that he had seen nothing improper in it; but, on the contrary, that there was direct evidence of its being perfectly correct.

Sir F. Burdett said, that never, on any occasion, did he feel less strongly the necessity of replying; for nothing in the shape of argument had been offered in opposition to his motion. The vague and general declamation in which the right hon. secretary had indulged, he could look upon only as a kind of vapour which not unfrequently arose from that side of the House. The right hon. secretary had not condescended to support his declamation against the general conduct of Mr. Hunt by any proofs. Every person must feel how vague and indefinite a charge it was to say, that a man had an intention to subvert the principles of the constitution. Ministers would think every man liable to this charge who might attend a public meeting to endeavour to obtain redress for public grievances. The right hon. secretary had entirely overlooked all the hardships which Mr. Hunt had suffered. Another hon. gentleman had said, however, that some of those grievances had been redressed. But, what inference should be drawn from this circumstance? That Mr. Hunt ought to remain in prison? No; but that he had suffered inconveniences which he ought not to have suffered, during a great part of the term of his confinement, and should therefore receive atonement for the injury. If any measures of relief had been adopted with respect to Mr. Hunt, that was a proof that he had formerly been improperly treated. If that which was now done was right, that which before existed was wrong. He was sorry that some observations had been made on the subject of the intercourse which was said to have been carried on between Mr. Hunt and Mrs. Vince. He could see no necessity for alluding to that lady. When it was considered that two convicts employed in the governor's house had proved with child, and that the moral magistrates who superintended the gaol, were in the habit of putting boys to sleep in cells with men who had been guilty of unnatural crimes, it did appear a little extraordinary, that the purity of the gaol could not endure the contamination of Mrs. Vince. Mr. Hunt's private affairs were a subject with which he was disinclined to interfere. Misfortunes might happen to all men. Mr. Hunt, it appeared, had been separated from his wife at an early period of his life; perhaps this might be considered a misfortune; and he had lived with Mrs. Vince for 18 years. He would wish to know, then, since Mr. Hunt had not been sent to prison to reform his morals, or to be interdicted from intercourse with any person, why he should be deprived of the society of that lady? He contended, that there was more immorality and scandal in unnecessarily dragging the circumstance before the public, than in allowing it to pass unnoticed. It had been said, that the motion before the House interfered with the prerogatives of the Crown. No man was more desirous of upholding the just prerogatives of the Crown than he was; he would do nothing tending to infringe them, and no such effect would result from his motion. But those who now opposed his motion on the ground that it was inimical to the kingly prerogatives, upon other occasions surmounted their scruples on that point. In the case of sir M. Lopez, who was convicted of an offence deeply affecting the honour and dignity of parliament, the House had made a representation in the proper quarter in favour of that individual, the result of which was the remission of the half of his sentence. Could it be improper for the House to interfere in behalf of Mr. Hunt, when it had exerted itself in favour of sir M. Lopez, notwithstanding the atrocious attack on the purity of election made by that unfortunate old gentleman?

He would not detain the House by any further observations from coming to a decision on the question, but would conclude with stating, that he remained of opinion, that the three grounds upon which he rested his motion, had not in the least degree been shaken.

The House then divided: Ayes 84. Noes 223. Majority against the motion, 139.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, April 25.

PETITIONS FOR A REFORM OF PARLIAMENT.] Mr. Pelham rose to present a petition from the county of Lincoln, for a reform in the representation. A noble lord had given notice of a motion on that subject, who was looked up to, from all parts of the country, as a friend of constitutional liberty. He would not pledge himself to support the noble lord's motion but he thought the subject entitled to every degree of attention.

Sir R. Heron said, that the meeting was most numerously and respectably attended. The population of Lincolnshire was almost exclusively agricultural. Formerly, contented with their lot, they were little inclined to interfere in political questions, but now, seeing around them the most severe and menacing distress—finding that the legislature was either unable or unwilling to look the state of the country manfully in the face, and administer those remedies by which alone their distresses could be mitigated they were convinced, that no relief was to be expected but from substantial and effective reform.

Lord Ebrington presented a petition from Crediton in Devonshire, praying for an effectual and complete reform of parliament. It had been unanimously agreed to at a numerous meeting of the inhabitants regularly convened by the portreeve. This was the twelfth petition on this subject which he had presented from Devon, in the course of the present session and among the petitioners were a large portion of the most respectable gentry, clergy, and yeomanry, of that county. Many more would have petitioned but that feelings now existed, very generally, throughout the country, which discouraged the people from doing so. From the manner in which their petitions were treated they were becoming daily more and more convinced that it was utterly useless to petition that House. Although he was not surprised at this, it was to him matter of the greatest regret; and he could not but express his hope, that the people of England from one end of the kingdom to the other, would persevere in public meetings, and in using every means which the law allowed them for the declaration of their opinions on the great and vital question of parliamentary reform. He hoped, too, that the conviction which was so universally prevalent among all ranks of persons out of doors, as to the necessity of correcting the present state of the representation, would, ere long, be enforced even upon the House of Commons itself.

The Marquis of Tavistock presented a petition from the county of Bedford, agreed to at a numerous and respectable public meeting praying for parliamentary reform. He admitted, that it was fruitless to petition the House on such a subject; and he knew that the petitioners were well convinced of this. They had seen every application for a reduction of expenditure resisted by the minister, backed by the overwhelming majorities of that House. They knew well that ministers would meet their statement with perfect indifference. Still they considered it due to themselves and their suffering fellow citizens once more to approach that House with their complaints. They would probably hear from the ministers of the Crown, and particularly from a right hon. gentleman (Mr. Canning), that parliamentary reform was a question merely taken up in the emergency of distress, and that its propriety was not felt, by what they considered the well-disposed part of the community. If by the well-disposed part of the community was meant a large proportion of the landed interest, borough proprietors, magistrates, and clergymen, he was bound in truth and candour to admit that they were unfortunately correct. But if they comprehended within their view of the well-disposed part of the community, the great body of the Commons of England, the industrious and intelligent and moral middle class of society, the men who lived not on the taxes, and who speculated not on the patronage of the ministers; then he denied the correctness of the assertion, convinced as he was, that there existed, from one end of the kingdom to the other, in that great body, a want of confidence in that House, and a firm conviction of the necessity of a parliamentary reform.

The petitions were ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

Reform of Parliament.] Lord John Russell rose and addressed the House as follows*:

Mr. Speaker; I rise for the purpose of moving a resolution, "that the present state of the representation of the people in parliament requires the most serious consideration of this House." Should I be so fortunate as to succeed in this motion, I shall then move for leave to bring in a bill for the more effectual representation of the people in parliament. In bringing this subject before the notice of parliament, I naturally feel considerable anxiety: not anxiety lest I should fail to impress upon the House the importance of a question affecting the formation of the governing body of this mighty empire—a question which, if carried, involves, as some think, the ruin, but as others, and, according to me, a majority of the people believe, the salvation of the country—but anxiety and apprehension lest the weakness of the person, who presumes to bring forward the motion, should be thought unequal to a discussion of such magnitude. It will be an additional weight upon me, in urging arguments which I think are in their nature irresistible, to consider how often those arguments have been enforced by men of the highest talents; men entitled to the veneration of the House and of the country.

On the other hand, if I may venture to speak of myself, I feel some encouragement to proceed, in the recollection, that I have served an apprenticeship, so to term it, in the cause of reform; that I have thus had occasion to consider the subject in its various forms and bearings; and that, in bringing forward a part of the question of reform more than two years ago, although I never for one instant allowed it to be imagined, that the small alteration I then proposed contained my utmost wishes, I yet professed myself inclined rather to support the reforms of others than to originate any general proposition myself. I therefore claim some credit for deliberation when I say, that a careful investigation of the subject induces me to lay before the House the reasons and the principles upon which, in my mind, a more extensive reform may be safely founded.—I am likewise encouraged by the propitious fitness of the present time for entertaining such a motion. The question has been so often met and turned aside by fears of jacobinism in foreign nations, or of tumults at home, that I feel it a great advantage to be able to say, that our present state of external peace and internal tranquillity affords opportunity for ample and undisturbed discussion.

There is another circumstance which ought to weigh in favour of the motion I am about to make; I mean the number of petitions for reform of parliament, which have been pouring into this House since the beginning of the session. This fact shows the value which the people at large attach to this question, and the eagerness with which they look forward to its success. Petitions have this year been presented to the House from the counties of Middlesex, Devon, Norfolk, Suffolk, Bedford, Cambridge, Surrey, and Cornwall, all praying for reform in parliament. In the county of Huntingdon a petition to the same effect has been voted. Petitions have also been presented in great numbers from separate towns for the same object; and the petitions, which have been presented for the liberation of Mr. Hunt, nearly all contain a petition for reform: thus showing, that the vast number of persons, who embraced opinions in favour of this measure some years ago, maintain their wishes unchanged, and their judgment unshaken.

Whilst this anxiety in the country for reform in general encourages me in the task I have undertaken, I feel it to be a circumstance no less propitious, that the petitioners do not ask exclusively for any one plan of reformation. It may be remembered, that a few years ago all the petitions prayed for universal suffrage; but at a meeting, in the present year, of the county of Middlesex, a meeting which might be supposed to bring together all classes of reformers, when a venerable advocate of the cause of reform proposed a petition for universal suffrage, he could find no one to second him. That single circumstance shows the disposition of the people to ask for reform as a cure for abuses existing, and not as a fanciful, untried measure, of which in their own minds they have some vague conception: it shows their inclination to accept from this House any reasonable system of amendment, subject to such an interval of deliberation as the importance of the subject may appear to demand.

Under these impressions, I come to consider what it is that the petitioners ask. I think I am borne out in saying, that what they ask is nothing new; no innovation upon the constitution; no change in the existing laws; they simply pray, that the functions of granting supplies of money, of appealing for the redress of grievances, of giving advice to the Crown, in short, all the legal functions of a House of Commons, should be exercised by the true representatives of the people. This is the language of the petitions, and it is the undoubted language of the constitution. The question to be tried, therefore, is, not whether in law the House ought to be the representatives of the people, but whether in truth they now are so. It is a simple question of fact, which the House is called upon to decide. Considering, therefore, that as to the constitutional right of the people to representation no doubt or question can exist, I shall not consume the time of the House in discussing all the wild theories which have been framed upon that subject. Among others, I shall entirely neglect the theory, that the House of Commons ought to represent, not the people alone, but the Crown and the House of Lords, as well as the people. Surely nothing can be more dangerous than the admission of such a theory. Nothing can be more absurd than to think, that the balance of the Constitution, instead of existing in King, Lords, and Commons, should be found in the House of Commons alone: for how, if such a system could be allowed to prevail, would the country ever be sure that the balance was adjusted? How could the people have any security, that the Crown and the House of Lords had not a majority, and that the true representatives of the people were not, by comparison, few in the assembly which professes to be sent by them alone? Where then would be their guarantee, that their wishes and their interests might not be entirely neglected in a house called the House of Commons, instituted for the purpose of gathering their wishes, and protecting their privileges? Throwing this theory aside, therefore, I shall consider this House as the House of Commons only, and its members, not as delegates of the various branches of the Constitution, but as forming one branch only.—In rejecting theories, I shall likewise lay out of consideration all those plans which require an entire re-construction of the House of Commons: not that I do not think such plans extremely proper to be discussed, but that I imagine the benefits I seek may be obtained by a smaller change; and I think every reformer must agree with me, that if it could be proved we should obtain the advantages we desire by a lesser change it would be unwise to attempt a greater.

Throwing aside, then, such theories entirely, I come to the question of fact which I have suggested to the House; and it becomes necessary, in order to our right decision, to take into consideration on the one hand, the state of the House, and, on the other, the condition of the people. If I can show, that the condition of the people has materially changed, and that the change in the state of the House has not been agreeable to that change in the state of the people, but of a very different and opposite tendency, I trust it will be allowed, that the House and the people have no longer that accordance which they ought to have, and that some remedy is required; but if I farther show, that this discrepancy has made itself evident by acts which the House has done, and which the representatives of the people never could have sanctioned; then it must be admitted, not only that there are abuses to be reformed, but that duty, and love of their country command the House immediately to begin the work.

Without entering into detail farther than is absolutely necessary, it cannot be denied, that the people of England have undergone a considerable change during the last forty years. The wealth of the country during that period has very considerably increased. The fact, which was mentioned early in the session by my hon. friend, the member for Winchelsea, that our expenditure during the last two years of war was 270,000,000*l.*—while it showed the immense expenditure of government, showed also the very great wealth and resources of the people. That wealth and those resources, widely diffused, have had a tendency to increase the importance of the middle classes of society; classes that stand in a peculiarly fortunate situation, equally removed from poverty, which is too often the parent of crime, and from idleness, which is proverbially the mother of vice. Free alike from the temptations created by want, and from those suggested by indolence, they find, in decent competency and useful occupation, the guardians of their morality. Politically speaking, they are intimately connected with the classes above and below them; and are, therefore, not liable to partake either of that disregard of the poor, which sometimes disgraces the rich, or that hostility to the rich, which unfortunately is apt to find its way among the poor. Thus forming themselves the best class of the community, and at the same time zealous for the welfare of the others, they constitute one of the most solid pillars of the state; and I know not that I could select a better sign of the future prosperity of a country, than the wealth, comfort, and intelligence of its middle orders.

Another cause of the improvement of the country is the great increase which has occurred of late years in our manufactures. From the year 1785 to 1792, the average amount of our exports of British manufactures was about 13,000,000*l.* a year. From 1792 to 1799 it was 17,000,000*l.*; but the exports of the year 1821, are stated to amount to 40,000,000*l.* When to this is added the still larger consumption of our manufactures at home, and when it is considered, that out of these 40,000,000*l.* our export of cotton goods amounted to 23,000,000*l.*, our woollens and linens to 7,000,000*l.*, it must be inferred, that a very large proportion of the inhabitants of the country subsist by those manufactures. I will not now dwell upon this new phenomenon in the state of the country, but for the present confine myself to a statement of the fact.

With this immense increase in manufactures and commerce, the dissemination of instruction, and the improvement in knowledge, have advanced even in more than equal proportion. Indeed, this is a circumstance which must strike the most careless observer; from the vast increase of books, and the very high prices which are paid for the exercise of literary talents. From the immense distribution of works of every description throughout the country, one would infer, that, as the opportunities of information are thus increased, the education of the lower classes must be enlarged in the same proportion. Being curious to gain some information on this subject, I some time ago applied to an eminent bookseller's house in the city, from which I learned a number of interesting facts. I will state to the House one, which will of itself be sufficient to prove the astonishing extent to which books are circulated throughout the country. From the firm to which I applied, I learned, that their own sale amounted to five millions of volumes in the year; that they employed sixty clerks, paid a sum of 5,500*l.* in advertisements, and gave constant employment to not fewer than 250 printers and bookbinders. Another great source of information to the country is the increase of circulating libraries. In the year 1770, there were only four circulating libraries in the metropolis; there are at present one hundred, and about nine hundred more scattered throughout the country. Besides these, there are from 1,500 to 2,000 book-clubs, distributing throughout the kingdom large masses of information on history, voyages, and every species of science by which the sum of human knowledge can be increased, or the human mind improved. Here I may also remark on the increase of periodical works. Of these there are two (the Edinburgh and the Quarterly Reviews), many articles in which are written with an ability equal to some of the best original writings of former times, and having a greater circulation than all the periodical works of thirty years ago put together. Besides these there are five periodical works of science only, all in great demand. And here, to show that the demand for such works is not confined to the vicinity of the universities alone, I will mention, that a friend of mine, travelling through Inverness, was enabled to procure, at a small shop, a journal of science and a number of the Encyclopedia, but afterwards, when in passsing through Oxford he applied for the same books, he was told that they were not to be had unless previously ordered.

While so many and such fruitful sources of information are thus opened to the higher orders, the means of improving the minds of the poorer class have advanced at a pace not less rapid or less steady. First came the establishment about twenty-five years ago of the Lancasterian schools, which have distributed so widely the blessings of early instruction; and after these followed the no less beneficial system of national schools, which afford to the poor of every class education suitable to their state and condition in life. In addition to those means of improvement, another has been opened, not less advantageous to the poor—I allude to the great facilities which at present exist, of getting the most valuable works at a rate so very cheap as to bring them within the compass of all. Some time ago an establishment was commenced by a number of individuals, with a capital of not less than 1,000,000*l.*, for the purpose of printing standard works at a cheap rate. By that establishment the history of Hume, the works of Buffon, the Encyclopedia, and other valuable productions, were sold in small numbers at sixpence each, and by this means sources of the highest and most useful instruction were placed within the poor-man's reach. I regret much to add, that this valuable establishment was very much checked in its operation, by the effect of one of those acts for the suppression of knowledge which were passed in the year 1819. I regret this the more, as one of the rules of that establishment has been, not to allow the venders of their works to sell any book on the political controversies of the day.

In noticing the means which have contributed so much to the mental improvement of the great body of the people, I ought not to omit noticing the very good effects which have resulted from the exertions of the Bible Society, the Religious Tract Society, the Society for the dissemination of Christian Knowledge, and other valuable associations of similar character. Since the commencement of the Bible Society, it has applied the immense sum of 900,000*l.* to the laudable purpose of disseminating the knowledge of the scriptures. From the Religious Tract Society not fewer than five millions of tracts are distributed annually, and the Society for Christian Knowledge distributes one million. These facts will show the rapid strides which have been made by the public in the improvement of general knowledge.

I will now come to the state of political knowledge in the country. This has been greatly augmented by the extraordinary increase in the circulation of newspapers. Some time ago I moved for a return of the number and circulation of the several newspapers printed in London and in the country. That return has not been made in the manner in which I had intended; but from the account I was enabled to procure, it appears, that there were not less than 23,600,000 newspapers sold in the country in the last year. Of these the daily London papers sold above 11,000,000, the country papers above 7,000,000, and the weekly papers above 2,000,000. From another source I have been enabled to procure more particular information as to the increase in the number of papers within the last thirty or forty years, the substance of which I will read to the House.

number since 1790, from 146 to 284, which is very nearly double in the space of thirty years.

Having made these statements, from which the House will judge of the vast increase of the wealth and importance of the country, and of the rapid strides it has made in moral and political knowledge, I will now come to the other part of the inquiry; namely, whether the state of parliament is also changed, so as to represent this increased importance of the middling, the manufacturing, and the commercial classes. In proposing this inquiry, I will state broadly, that not only is the House bound to consider whether parliament represents this increased importance, but also whether the government generally keeps up with the increase in strength and knowledge of the people; for I will assert, that no government can be stable, which does not keep pace with the increasing improvement of the people over whom it presides; and that any government, which fails to make such advances, must soon come to final ruin. I take these to be positions so trite, and even so self-evident, that I should not have thought it worth while to recal them to the attention of the House, had not another and a very different theory recently found its way within their walls. I allude to what has fallen from the most liberal member of his majesty's cabinet, one who I believe really takes an interest in the progress of liberty. That right honourable member has urged the increased information of the people as a defence of the existence of certain offices, which could be defended on no other ground. Now to assert, that in proportion as the people asked for more economy there should be more waste—in proportion as they became more honest there should be more corruption—in proportion as they became more enlightened they should have a government less able to bear investigation, are propositions so monstrous and absurd, as must in their very nature tend to the destruction of any government they are meant to support. And yet such is in fact the meaning of the defence which has been set up in this House, that an useless office should be continued because the intelligence of the people had increased. If such propositions are followed up, they will have the certain effect of rendering the government odious in the eyes of the people—of making them doubt the value of a monarchy, and even indifferent to the destruction of our constitutional form altogether.

But to come to the question—the present state of the parliament of the country, and the relation it bears to the improved condition of the people. In looking at this part of the question I was struck with the remark made by Mr. Justice Blackstone, who, in referring to the defects of the representation, says, that yet there was hardly a free agent in the country who had not a vote for a member of parliament in some place or another. Now, it is not to be supposed, that that able commentator on our laws would have gravely made a statement which was at variance with the fact, and, therefore, his assertion must have had some foundation at the time at which he wrote: but let the present state of the representation be compared with the statement, and what a difference will be seen? We have now not only one free agent, but there are in the country at least one million of free agents—men perfectly free and independent, who have no vote for a member of parliament, though anxious to acquire the right, and in every way qualified to exercise the functions of electors. On a former occasion, when this subject was before the House, it was stated, and not denied, that a majority of the members of this House are returned by a body of electors not fully 8,000 in number—a fact utterly at variance with the increase which has taken place in the numbers, the wealth, knowledge, and consequent importance of the people of the country. But if we look a little farther, and go a little more into detail on the subject, we shall find, that while the people go on rapidly improving, the basis of this House is gradually becoming more narrow; and instead of embracing the whole of the community as the source of their representative character, is dwindling into a sort of self-elected corporation, depending on a very small portion of that community. In making this remark, I do not mean to say it is applicable generally to the members of this House, but it is applicable to a majority, able to influence the decision of every vote of the whole.

First, with respect to the county members. I have already observed, that a great increase has taken place in the middling orders—in the commercial and manufacturing classes; but there is no commensurate increase in the number of county members. Out of 513 members (for England), there are only 92 who represent counties; and, even with respect to that number, the full and free expression of the opinions of those who have a right to vote is impeded by a variety of circumstances. Among these I will notice the enormous expenses attendant upon contested elections for counties. I will instance the county of Devon, where some freeholders have to come forty miles at each side of Exeter to give their votes. The consequence of this is, that, as few fortunes can bear the immense charges of a warmly-contested struggle, there is usually a compromise, and one member is returned by each party, though the numbers of one party may be five or six to one compared with the other. Another circumstance, injurious to the state of the representation, is caused by the great number of landed proprietors, whom Mr. Pitt so improvidently raised to the dignity of the peerage. The result was, that those of the landed gentry who remained in the representation of the Commons did not form a body sufficiently strong in name and property to resist the votes of those who were swayed by private interests. For my own part, I am of opinion, that if only the great landed proprietors were members of this House, even if they held their situation as such for life, they would, provided their proceedings were constantly exposed to the criticism of public opinion, be found a more valuable safeguard for the liberties of the people than the House as it is at present constituted. I will even venture to assert, that if the House of Commons were abolished altogether, and the public business transacted by the House of Lords, it would soon become more popular, and obtain more of the reverence of the people, than ever will be given to the House of Commons in its present state. My opinions on this subject are founded on the principle, that those who hold a great stake of property in the country will never consent to any measure of importance against the declared sense of the public, or which can irritate the people to resistance. I am convinced of the truth of this remark, when I recollect what occurred in the case of the Queen, when the Lords showed a deference to the well known feelings of the people more evident than any instance I can recollect in the House of Commons.

I next would call the attention of the House to the representation of the large towns. In some of these there is a full and free exercise of the opinions of the electors; and in those instances they return men of independence to parliament: but in very many others the elections are so managed, and the rights of the voters so abridged, either by votes of this House, or by usurpation of small corporate juntas, that by degrees the number of voters is diminished, while the influence of many of those who remain is absorbed by the intrigue of corporate bodies. I will mention as an instance Plymouth, which in the reign of Charles 2nd, had 7,000 inhabitants, of whom 300 had votes for its members. The population has since increased to 60,000, while the number of electors is reduced to 200. I might instance other places, such as Bath and Cambridge, where the elections are managed by a small number of persons, sometimes not even resident in the towns, but who still contrive to direct the elections as they please.

I now come to notice the small towns or boroughs which return members to parliament. Of these there are 140, containing less than 5000 inhabitants each. (In all my calculations I only include England.) By these 140 boroughs, 280 members are returned to parliament, making a clear majority of the House in the sense to which I have just alluded. Of those small towns there are 40 which contain from 3 to 5000 inhabitants, and 100 less than 3000 each. I believe that the system which prevails in most of these places, and particularly in the Cornish boroughs, is pretty notorious. I could, if I did not fear to fatigue the attention of the House, and if the thing were not so well known, read a number of letters clearly showing many instances in which the return of members to this House, was procured by money only; by bribery the most direct: but the thing is so commonly acknowledged, so universally allowed to be the case, that it would be taking up the time of the House unnecessarily. In the last year it was admitted, that out of 44 members returned for the several boroughs of Cornwall, there were only five who were natives of that county. In another place it was urged by a minister of the Crown as an argument against granting the forfeited franchise of Grampound to Cornwall, that the boroughs of that county represented the commercial interests; and it has even been quoted as a proof of the elasticity of the constitution, that it can thus take in and represent the new interests and the new property of the country. Good God! and is this the way in which the representation of the new interests, and the new property of the country, is to commence? I beg the attention of the House to this practice, to its origin, and to some of its consequences: and then I will ask any man, who respects the Constitution, to say, whether the new interests, the increased wealth and importance of the country, ought to be so represented? This new representation is commenced by an open violation of one of the most sacred laws of parliament. To this is added wilful and corrupt perjury; and in the train of these there follow drunkenness and almost every species of immorality. But with all these disadvantages, with this contempt of law, this gross immorality, does the system produce any thing like representation? It does no such thing. There is no community of interests between the elector and the elected: the elector is utterly indifferent to the character, conduct, or sentiments of the man for whom he votes; and when once the price of that vote is paid, it is to him a matter of no earthly consequence, whether his purchaser is a Tory or a Whig, whether he has sworn allegiance to the House of Stuart or the House of Brunswick, or even the Nabob of Arcot—whether he is a supporter of despotism or a friend to liberty.

One of the worst consequences of this system is the possession of power without responsibility. In fact, the individual thus buying himself in, represents only the commercial House to which he belongs. I remember on one occasion, a member who had got into the House by dint of money, and who was afraid lest I should criticise the means by which he had obtained his seat, came to me, and assured me, that he had no wish whatever to enter parliament, but that he did so to oblige his partners in trade. Now, that is exactly the kind of representative which I do not wish to see in this House. I do not wish to see men returned here for commercial houses, representing only their partners, and naturally anxious to oblige government and support its measures, in order to procure patronage and favour for their establishments. I do not mean to say, that this was the case with the gentleman to whose case I have alluded; but I know that there are members who procure seats in this House for no other purpose but that of assisting the commercial houses with which they are connected. It is well known that in the war there were many good things to be given away, which it was of course a great object with commercial men to procure. There was a license for trade to the West Indies given to one house, which I am informed was worth at least 15,000*l*. Is it not natural to suppose, that such a grant must give no small bias in favour of government to the political sentiments of the parties?

Another circumstance arising out of the representation of the small boroughs is, that it is generally procured by the supporters of government. There are few who would wish to expend such a large sum of money as will buy a seat in parliament, for the pleasure of constantly voting in minorities. Many of those who are returned for these places may have a conscientious disposition to support the measures of government, and therefore come into parliament, in order, by such support, to forward the interests of their country. Others come in with the view that, by assisting the minister, they may obtain a share of his patronage. But whatever may be the views of those who procure a seat in this House, in order to support the government, whether conscientious or corrupt, it is interest, and interest alone which induces the greater number of the immediate patrons of these boroughs, to apply to ministers for a candidate. The attorney who has obtained an influence in a corrupt borough—the middle man—who performs the disgraceful office of handing over the bribe—keeping half as a fee for himself—from the elected to the elector, has no better way of preserving his hold on the borough, than by obtaining the disposal of government patronage in the place and its neighbourhood. He goes to the minister to offer the seat: the minister recommends his friend—his friend, sometimes assisted by the minister, pays his money for the seat. Thus a permanent connection is established between the minister and the borough patron; the one secures a member to support him in parliament, the other confirms his own possession in the lucrative property which produces members of parliament.

Besides this general connection, it is notorious, that some of the small boroughs are so overrun with ministerial patronage, as to be completely in the hands of government. That for which the right hon. the chancellor of the exchequer sits, is of this description. So many situations in the post-office, the packet-office, and other public departments, are held by persons connected with it, that government may be said to have the entire command of the seat; and it is impossible that any independent inhabitant can ever hope to possess the smallest influence there.

But allowing the existence of the abuses I have exposed, there arises another question, whether these abuses have made themselves practically felt in the government of the country. In reference to this question, and in answer to an exposition of abuses somewhat similar to that I have just made, when the subject was brought forward, on a former occasion, Mr. Windham, who was opposed to all reform, observed, that no practical evil resulted from the system of representation, and, with his usual liveliness of expression, likened the petitioners for reform to the man mentioned in the "Spectator," who had every symptom of the gout except the pain. This, however amusing, is a very unphilosophical view of the question, and is directly in the teeth of the remark of Bacon, who says, with equal truth and sagacity, "this is true, that the wisdom of all these latter times in princes' affairs is rather fine deliveries and shiftings of dangers when they are near, than solid and grounded courses to keep them aloof. But this is but to try masteries with fortune: and let men beware how they neglect and suffer matter of trouble to be prepared; for no man can forbid the spark, or tell whence it may come." Notwithstanding the evident existence of these abuses, however, I should be hopeless of carrying conviction to the minds of the House, if many of those abuses had not become visible in their effects. We have now the pain, along with other symptoms, and are suffering severely from the inadequacy of this House to represent the people. By these sufferings it is, that the minds of men are thoroughly convinced of the necessity of reform; and though the opinion of most is, that it could not immediately remedy many of the disorders which its delay has produced, yet it would at least have this effect, of affording a security for good government in future.

In looking at the evils arising from an inadequate system of representation, it must strike every one, that a parliament might go on for a long time without representing the people, and yet without appearing to have very distinct interests. The consequence would be, that the evil would not be so immediately felt. For instance, the people might be eager for a war, and it might be the interest of a corrupt parliament to encourage them to carry their wish into execution. The country might be governed by a good and enlightened minister, and it might be the interest of a corrupt as well as of an honest parliament to support that minister. The people might wish for a reformation in the laws, and there might be nothing in the interests of the most corrupt House of Commons that should induce them to oppose that reformation. There might thus be some cases in which no injury would result to the public from such a system as I have described; but there are other cases, which cannot fail to convince even the most incredulous on the subject, that what they have long been accustomed to consider a complete system of representation, is really incomplete and imperfect.

To exemplify what I have just said, I will take the liberty of reviewing, as shortly as I can, what has occurred since the motion for reform, which Mr. Pitt made in the year 1785. For some time after Mr. Pitt became minister, he escaped all odium, as well by the merit of his own measures, as by the unpopularity of the coalition. Indeed, I consider the measures of Mr. Pitt, after his first accession to office, to have been eminently wise, economical, and just. They were followed by great popularity, which enabled him to conduct the affairs of government, for some years, without the people feeling any necessity of a change being made in the system of representation. Mr. Pitt gave currency to the idea, that the evils of a defective representation might not be felt upon all occasions, when, upon Mr. Flood's motion for reform in 1790, he said, that he was as firm and zealous a friend of the question as he had ever been, that he should be ready to propose his motion for it again, whenever a proper opportunity should arise—that it was true, that, for some time, the inconveniences of a want of reform might not be felt; but they would be felt in certain contingencies, Passing over some years of peace, Mr. Pitt entered upon the war in 1793, having on his side, as he believed, the greater part of the property of the country. I am ready to admit, that the monied men of the country, alarmed by the terrors of Jacobinism—whether justly or no I will not now stop to determine—did enter willingly at first into the war. At a later period, however, it appeared from general testimony that the disposition of the country tended towards peace. Their disposition was gratified two or three years afterwards, by the peace of Amiens. That peace, as all of us know, was only of short duration. We entered upon a fresh war, and continued it for a few years, without any discrepancy appearing between the conduct of the parliament and the wishes of the people, or at least without the people's expressing any earnest desire for a reform in their representation. Yet let it not be supposed, because the people did not cry out for reform, it follows, that the government was conducted in exact accordance to their sober and just opinions. For it is of the nature of the people to push obedience almost to a fault. Nothing can be more false than the opinions of those, who maintain that agitators can easily, and without cause, excite the people to tumultuous and seditious practices. So far is this from being the case, that the disposition of every people is naturally hostile to agitators; indeed, it is so strongly in favour of government, that the general mass of a country never can be induced to see abuse until it becomes intolerable, or be persuaded to take measures of precaution against a contingent loss of property and liberty: nay, more, they will frequently even submit to the greatest evils of misgovernment, before they venture to utter one word in their own behalf.

In the course of the war, however, some instances occurred, which could not fail to excite in the minds of a sensible nation, a lively attention to the acts of its representatives. The strongest instance that I now recollect is, the resolution of this House, on the expedition to Walcheren, in 1809. That expedition was an instance of as singular misconduct and incapacity on the part of the government, as was ever displayed in any expedition sent out from this country. There was nothing alleged in this House, either in support of the original plan, or of the mode of its execution. No untoward accident had happened to prevent its success; the enemy scarcely offered any resistance; every thing went on as well as the planner of the expedition could wish; and yet the result of it has been nothing but disgrace and calamity to the country. It was so fatal as to realize the cries of the children of Israel to Moses in the wilderness—"Because there were no graves in Egypt, hast thou taken us away to die in the wilderness?" And yet, upon that expedition, failing as it did in all its objects, attended as it was by the utmost disgrace and calamity, the House of Commons of that day was not contented with conferring a vote of silent approbation, but absolutely resolved upon a formal eulogium, and entered that eulogium upon its Journals, in order to prevent the removal of the ministers who had devised and supported so absurd a project! This fact was so strong and so striking, that it convinced many who had before held different opinions, and made them feel that there was no community of interest between the parliament that could sanction such an expedition, and a people which were execrating the planners of it, and calling for their condign punishment as an atonement to the thousands of their countrymen who had been unnecessarily and wantonly sacrificed. The result of that resolution of the House of Commons is, that the projector of that most calamitous expedition is now the leader of this House, and the general who conducted its execution is in possession of one of the most splendid rewards that it is in the power of the Crown to bestow.

The general popularity, however, of the Spanish war—a war in which I confess that I took a very strong interest—and the hopes which the people had of overcoming that sovereign who appeared to aspire to the domination of the whole earth, enabled ministers to cast a veil over the errors they had committed, and to conceal the faults of which they had been found guilty. The people again bestowed their confidence on the House of Commons, and certainly that confidence was taken advantage of in the fullest manner. Every abuse was promoted, every job was advanced, every opportunity was seized to turn the facility of the people to their own disadvantage, and to increase the heavy burthens under which they were labouring.

It was when the war was brought to an end that the question of parliamentary reform again attracted the attention and excited the feelings of the country. It then became a question between the two parties in this House, whether we should have a large, expensive military government, or a cheap, economical, civil government. It was evident on which side the interest of the people was on such a question: it was also evident, that if the House of Commons fairly represented the people, it would speak in unison with the wishes of the people: but it was likewise manifest, that if it did not fairly represent the people, it would provide for the private interests of its members, which, on that occasion were directly opposed to the interest of the community. Here, then, we should have the House and the people at issue. The question was one from which the constitution of the House of Commons could be fairly ascertained: it was an experiment on the subject which might very fairly be called experimentum crucis: it was then to be decided what were the nature of its claims to public regard and to public confidence. That question was decided; and was decided against the reputation of this House; for it voted a standing army of 99,000 men, and other establishments of corresponding magnitude.

On a former occasion I have shown, that those establishments, though they were sanctioned by a majority of the votes of this House, were not sanctioned by the majority of the members for counties. And here I may be permitted to observe, that the members for counties may be fairly considered as the real representatives of the people, though from the expense incident to county elections, they are not now so completely popular as they would become were that expense to be diminished. Now it ought never to be forgotten, that the county members had opposed this immense military establishment by a majority of 3 to 2, whilst the House of Commons had sanctioned it by a majority in the very same proportion, and had imposed on the community those heavy burthens to which a great part of their present sufferings might be fairly attributed.

In looking in a general view at the votes which have been given within the last four or five years, relative to questions of economy and retrenchment, a noble friend of mine, the member for Yorkshire, whom I do not now see in the House, has made a calculation of the manner in which votes have been given for ministers or against them by the representatives of the larger and the smaller towns. I have myself made a similar calculation from data, which I found in a pamphlet called the Elector's Remembrancer, stating the distinct votes of each particular member. My noble friend has formed his calculation chiefly from memory. I have taken my calculations from the book I have mentioned, without at all inquiring whether the parties were deemed ministerial or not. I have considered all those as ministerial voters who have never voted at all in favour of reduction, and have put down those as opposition members who have voted three times in favour of popular measures, even though they voted in general in behalf of ministers. I think that such a calculation is a fair test of virtual representation, and a fair test, also, of the value of an opinion which has been sometimes advanced in this House, that the members returned by the small towns are as much the representatives of the feelings of the people as those returned by the large towns.

In speaking of popular questions, I chiefly allude to those which refer either to the Queen or to retrenchment. These two subjects have certainly interested the country more than any others which have come before parliament. I will now mention what were the results of the different calculations made by myself and my noble friend. I will give my noble friend's calculation, first, premising, at the same time, that my noble friend considered as neutral those members who cannot fairly be said to support or oppose ministers constantly. In my calculation I have left out entirely those who appear never to have voted.

According to my noble friend, there are 33 boroughs, in each of which there are less than 1,000 inhabitants; out of the members for those boroughs 12 have voted against ministers, 44 for them, and 10 neutral. There are 35 boroughs, containing less than 2,000 inhabitants each; of their members, 15 vote against ministers, 45 for them, and 8 neutral. There were 76 boroughs, containing less than 5,000 inhabitants; out of the members for them, 48 vote against ministers, 93 for them, and 10 neutral. There were 25 boroughs, containing from 5,000 to 10,000 inhabitants each; out of the members for them, 22 vote against ministers, 27 for them, and 1 neutral. And in 31 boroughs, containing 10,000 inhabitants each and upwards, there were 38 members against ministers,* only 21 for them, and 5 neutral.

Now, my own statement is not very different from that which I have just read to the House; and as the House has heard the one with patience, I will trespass on its attention with the other. From the members of the boroughs under 500 inhabitants, there was one member in favour of reduction, and 19 against it. From the members of the boroughs containing from 500 to 1,000 inhabitants, there were 12 for, and 33 against reduction. From the members of the boroughs containing more than 1,000 and less than 2,000 inhabitants, 17 were for, and 44 against reduction. From the members of the boroughs containing more than 2,000, and less than 3,000 inhabitants, 19 were for, and 46 against reduction. From the members for the boroughs containing 5,000 inhabitants, there were 25 for, and 41 against reduction; and from those from the boroughs containing more than 5,000 inhabitants, there were 66 for, and only 47 against reduction.

Now, the general result of this calculation goes to show, that the proportion in favour of ministers diminishes as the size of the places increases; for, combining the two calculations I have just read to the House, the proportion is in the first instance as 19 to 1 in their favour; in the second, as 3 to 1; in the third, as 2 to 1; in the fourth, as 4 to 3; in the fifth as 3 to 5; so that in the last case it is 5 to 3 against administration, and for retrenchment.

Now these are facts which ought to convince the most incredulous, that the small towns do not represent the interests of the people as well as the large towns. They speak for themselves, and need no further illustration from me. But besides these facts, others have occurred during this session of parliament, which afford results equally striking. I shall take two questions which have been discussed in it, and which undoubtedly are of great public interest and importance: the one relates to the salt-tax, the other to the office of post-master-general. Upon the salt-tax the numbers were 169 in favour of its continuance, and 165 in support of its abolition. Out of these 165 members, there were 42 for English and Welsh counties, and 55 for the large towns; of which towns there are altogether not more than 56*; so that in this small number of 165, less than a third of the English members, we have nearly a majority of the whole number of English members for counties and large towns. Now out of the 169 members, who formed the majority on that occasion, I cannot make out more than 14 county members, though I can make out 61 placemen, of whom only 10 can be in any respect considered as nominees of counties or of large towns. I trust, that after such a statement I shall not hear it averred again, that, while the ministerial side of the House contains the representatives of large and populous towns, the Opposition benches are filled with nothing but nominees sitting for rotten boroughs.

The division on the office of postmaster-general was still more decisively in favour of the proposition which I wish to establish. There were 159 members for the abolition, and 184 for the continuance of that useless office; so that there was a majority of 25 in favour of the office and of ministers. Of the 159, 29 were the representatives of English and Welsh counties, and 40 the representatives of large towns, making together a total of 69. On the other side, I cannot make out more than 11 county members, and 23 members for large towns, making a total of 34: that is to say, that out of those members who were really elected by the people, there were 69 for abolishing, and only 34 for continuing the office. If there be any fact that can make any impression upon the House, it is that which I have just mentioned. Upon that question we have an illustration of the admirable theory I before alluded to, and of which we have lately heard so much—I mean the theory that the House represents not only the people, but also the Crown and the House of Lords. Upon that question we had an instance of the representatives of the Crown and of the House of Lords overbalancing the representatives of the people, until they were completely merged in a minority; and be it observed, that the question upon which the representatives of the Crown and of the House of Lords so overbalanced the representatives of the people, was a question whether we should maintain an office that was in the patronage of the Crown, and had been conferred upon a member of the House of Lords. Let it be also recollected, that upon that memorable night the doctrine was first advanced, that useless offices ought to be maintained as a counterpoise to the increasing intelligence of the people—a doctrine which my hon. and learned friend the member for Knaresborough (sir J. Mackintosh), with his knowledge of Constitutional history, has declared to be altogether new; and at which even the hon. member for Corfe Castle (Mr. Bankes) has expressed himself to be alarmed; and let it also not be forgotten, that that doctrine, new and alarming as it was, has been sanctioned by those who were not the representatives of the people, but who personated, on this occasion, the House of Commons, and declared and avowed this theory as their principle of action.—I will ask any man who looked at this question—who saw the confusion of different branches of the constitution which was thus created—who beheld the public money unsparingly granted by those who were afterwards to reap benefit from the disposal of it—who perceived control assumed over the public expenditure for the purpose of more effectually sanctioning abuse, screening delinquency, and opposing the wishes and petitions of the people for reduction—I will ask any man, who took all the points to which I have just referred into consideration, whether it is any exaggeration to say, that every lover of liberty ought to feel alarmed at the danger to which the British constitution now stands exposed?

Having stated thus much of the practical evils resulting from the present system of representation, I must be permitted to observe, that there are other evils to which it has given rise, much more grievous to a friend of freedom than any which I have yet mentioned. The natural balance of the constitution is this—that the Crown should appoint its ministers, that those ministers should have the confidence of the House of Commons, and that the House of Commons should represent the sense and wishes of the people. Such was the machinery of our government; and if any wheel of it went wrong, it deranged the whole system. Thus, when the Stuarts were on the throne, and their ministers did not enjoy the confidence of the House of Commons, the consequence was tumult, insurrection, and civil war throughout the country. At the present period, the ministers of the Crown possess the confidence of the House of Commons, but the House of Commons does not possess the esteem and reverence of the people. The consequences to the country are equally fatal. We have seen discontent breaking into outrage in various quarters—we have seen every excess of popular frenzy committed and defended—we have seen alarm universally prevailing among the upper classes, and disaffection among the lower—we have seen the ministers of the Crown seek a remedy for these evils in a system of severe coercion—in restrictive laws—in large standing armies—in enormous barracks, and in every other resource that belongs to a government which is not founded on the hearts of its subjects. I may be told, that in the divisions which took place on the enacting of those restrictive laws, the names of many friends of freedom are to be found. If I am obliged to admit this, and even that there are some personal friends of my own, for whom I bear the greatest respect as sincere partisans of liberty, who, nevertheless, have assisted in imposing those restrictions upon the people, which sweep away many of the provisions of Magna Charta and the Bill of Rights, and materially diminish the ancient privileges of Englishmen, I shall at the same time say, that I observe the occurrence with regret, and deplore the more the fatal mistake which has been committed. It is my persuasion, that the liberties of Englishmen, being founded upon the general consent of all, must remain upon that basis, or must altogether cease to have any existence. We cannot confine liberty in this country to one class of men: we cannot erect here a senate of Venice, by which a small part of the community is enabled to lord it over the majority; we cannot in this land, and at this time make liberty the inheritance of a caste. It is the nature of English liberty, that her nightingale notes should never be heard from within the bars and gratings of a cage; to preserve any thing of the grace and the sweetness, they must have something of the wildness of freedom. I speak according to the spirit of our constitution when I say, that the liberty of England abhors the unnatural protection of a standing army; she abjures the countenance of fortresses and barracks; nor can those institutions ever be maintained by force and terror that were founded upon mildness and affection.

If we ask the causes, why a system of government, so contrary to the spirit of our laws, so obnoxious to the feelings of our people, so ominous to the future prospects of the country, has been adopted, we shall find the root of the evil to lie in the defective state of our representation. The votes of the House of Commons no longer imply the general assent of the realm; they no longer carry with them the sympathies and understandings of the nation. The ministers of the Crown, after obtaining triumphant majorities in this House, are obliged to have recourse to other means than those of persuasion, reverence for authority, and voluntary respect, to procure the adherence of the country. They are obliged to enforce, by arms, obedience to acts of this House—which, according to every just theory, are supposed to emanate from the people themselves.

Nor is it one of the least evils of this system, that the ministers themselves are often compelled to retract their measures and alter their policy. If the House of Commons represented the people, the ministers would have no other difficulty than that of making their measures palatable to that assembly. Once sanctioned there, they would naturally obtain the cordial and affectionate concurrence of the country. But, in the present state of things, ministers are obliged to follow a winding and uncertain course; they are to be seen supplicating in one quarter, bribing in another, menacing in a third; they employ the whole session in courting the approbation of the great proprietors of the boroughs, and then, after the prorogation of parliament, they frequently find their whole web of policy undone by the sense of the country: and why? Because, in spite of the approbation of the House of Commons, a free press and a public opinion dare to condemn their conduct, and have power enough to prevent their measures being carried into effect.—Thus, to quote one instance among a thousand, after the House of Commons of 1816 gave their sanction to a standing army of 99,000 men, the remonstrances of the people have compelled the government, by repeated clamours to reduce it to 68,000, only two-thirds of the original establishment.

Now, in proposing reform, I propose a measure which must be for the advantage of a wise and good administration; nay, it ought to be wished for even by the present ministers. For my own part, I will confess that I have never seen in them any dark or dangerous designs of destroying the liberty of their country: all that I have been able to observe in them is little inclination to do any thing, either good or evil, so long as they were permitted to retain unmolested the advantages they derive from power, place, and profit. I believe, that in most cases it is perfectly indifferent to them whether the measures they carry are those which they themselves originally proposed or those which have been altered, framed, and dictated by the indignant sense of the country. I wish them, therefore, to find at once in parliament an echo of the public voice; to have it in their power to avoid the odium and disgrace of carrying in this assembly measures which they afterwards abandon; to be able, without the delusive support of a majority not acknowledged by the country, to feel at once in this House the pulse of the people of England. Such a reform, I am convinced, would be at once an advantage to the Crown, a blessing to the people, and the safety of the balance of the constitution.

In these conclusions I am happy to think that I am supported by great weight of authority. Lord Clarendon, it is well known, speaking of Cromwell's parliament, in which the number of members for counties was greatly increased, and the smaller boroughs totally omitted, says, it was generally thought "a warrantable alteration, and fit to be made in better times." Mr. Locke complains of the representation of decayed boroughs, and particularly of Old Sarum. Without entering more into detail, I may say, that Mr. Justice Blackstone, lord Chatham, Mr. Fox, and Mr. Pitt, all concur in recommending a temperate and rational reform.

Thus you have the sanction of lord Clarendon, the most venerable of Tory statesmen; of Locke, the most liberal of Whig philosophers; of Blackstone, the most cautious of constitutional writers; of Chatham, the boldest of practical ministers; of Mr. Pitt, the theme of eulogy to one great party in this country; of Mr. Fox, the object of affectionate admiration to another. Such an union of the great authorities of men, however different in temper, however opposed in politics, of men forming their judgment upon the most different grounds, living in different times, and agreeing in their conclusions upon hardly any other topic, strikes me as presenting a moral combination in favour of my proposition, that is in itself almost irresistible. The opinions of the men whom I have named are blended in our minds with all that is venerable in our constitution and our laws; their united suffrage in favour of any new measure gives to the mind much of that confidence, which in general is only obtained by following the lessons of experience; it takes away from reform all the ruggedness of innovation, and constitutes, as it were, a species of precedent in favour of the course which I am urging you to pursue.—Against these authorities I know of no equal names which can be adduced on the other side. There are, it is true, Mr. Burke and Mr. Windham, but they were both, perhaps, men who displayed more fancy than deep reflection in the view which they took of this question, and who have certainly left on record no confutation of the powerful arguments of the great statesmen, who thought differently from them on the subject.

Having now had the honour of stating to the House the unprecedented advance of the country of late times in wealth and knowledge; having stated the great increase of corruption which has crept into the elections, and how much confined the popular force has become in influencing the various modes by which members obtain seats in this House; having also stated the practical injury which has ensued in the wide distinctions prevailing on some great public questions, between the opinions of the people of England and of the members of this House, I now come to the consideration of a plan which I think calculated to remedy a great part of the existing evil. In considering what that plan should be, I have naturally directed my attention to the remedial measures which have been heretofore suggested by persons of weight and authority on this subject. The proposition of lord Chatham was to add 100 to the number of knights of the shire sitting in this House. Mr. Pitt, likewise following the footsteps of his father, at first proposed an addition of 100 to the number of county members. Mr. Flood, in the year 1790, proposed the same numerical accession of strength to the representation, to be elected by householders throughout the country; and Mr. Fox at the time remarked, that the plan of Mr. Flood was the best he had ever seen submitted to the consideration of parliament. Feeling, therefore, the weight and influence of such great authorities, I shall adopt their number in my present proposition.

My plan will then be, that a hundred new members shall be admitted into this House; and, as far as I have formed any settled opinion about the distribution of that number, the leaning of my mind is, that 60 members should be added for the counties, and the remaining 40 of the 100 should be for the great towns and commercial interests of the country. However, as to the manner of distribution and the mode of election, that is a branch of the subject which ought to be reserved for the gravest and most deliberate consideration, after the present motion shall have been carried.

It may, however, be said, that since the time when Chatham, Pitt, Fox, and Flood called for an addition to the number of members in this House, their proposed number of 100 has, in point of fact, been added by the Irish Union, which it is known has given that numerical addition to our body. Nor is there any reform more generally unpalatable than that which proposes to add to the numbers of this House, already rather too large than otherwise. In order to get out of this difficulty, I should say, that a number to the same amount as that given for the representation of Ireland might be struck out of the present list, with great benefit to the country; for instance, let the hundred be taken away from the hundred smallest boroughs, which return each two members to sit in parliament. Let these boroughs return but one member each, and then the present number of the House will be retained.

In proposing this plan, I cannot but recal to the recollection of the House, that it was not long ago since I hoped, that much of the real advantages of reform might have been obtained by the detection of prevailing corruption at the borough elections, and the filling up of vacancies so detected by a more popular form. By these means it was possible that a great popular representation might have been introduced, to the exclusion of a wide spreading corruption. In the hope of accomplishing such a change, I moved for a committee last year, to consider of the means of legally convicting boroughs of notorious corruption; and I am not sure that, if the matter had been then taken up in a spirit of sincerity, it would not have effected, in a silent and gradual manner, an adequate reform in parliament.

But to be efficacious, it requires the whole co-operation of this House, and such an aid, I am sorry to declare, I have not been so fortunate as to obtain. I am sorry that the House did not, on the occasion to which I allude, evince the sincere wish I had hoped for, to put down corruption. They agreed, it is true, to punish any specific act of corruption, whenever the particular case was brought under the consideration of parliament; but they would not agree to enact the only measures which were calculated practically to put down the evil they professed so anxious a desire to correct. In that respect their conduct resembled that of a police magistrate, who should declare his readiness to convict any notorious thief who might be brought before him, but who at the same time should proclaim, that though he knew there were bands of thieves nightly prowling through the streets, he would not send out a single officer of police to apprehend and detect them.

The indifference of the House to the measures I then proposed has compelled me to look for others more calculated to insure the co-operation of the country at large, and to obtain from the House, in the gross, that reform which they were unwilling to effect by gradual and unpretending means. I therefore press for your consideration the plan which I have now opened; I think it the best and safest proposition which can be suggested for the remedy of a notorious and growing evil.

There are, obviously, many minor details, into which it is unnecessary for me now to enter, and which can only be conveniently considered in a future stage of this proceeding: such, for instance, is the discussion whether copyholders ought to be permitted to vote in the counties; but these matters, I repeat, had better remain over until after the introduction of a bill, defining the outline of my plan. The first step must be to ascertain whether the House will consider at all the question of parliamentary reform. If they once admit the necessity of the principle for which I contend, then I have no doubt they may hereafter, with little difficulty, become reconciled to the measures for its practical application. I think, under such circumstances, the modification of details might easily be accomplished. Leaving, therefore, all these details for future consideration, I will shortly state the answers that strike me as applicable to some of the objections, which I have heard from time to time made to the expediency, if not to the principle, of parliamentary reform.

The first and most plausible objection against any alteration in the present constitution of the small boroughs is, that they constantly furnish the means of bringing into parliament men of great talents. This is an advantage which I am not in any way disposed to undervalue; but it is one which I submit would remain after my plan is adopted. I have no objection that a number of these boroughs should remain as they now stand; but what I object to respecting them is, that the small boroughs are so numerous, according to the present system, as not only to have their proper weight in the scale of the representation, but to have, in addition, the means of commanding a preponderating majority in parliament. They thus give the sanction of a general parliamentary assent to measures, which have in the main received only the concurrence of a number of individual borough-proprietors. We are thus, for the sake of obtaining a few men of talents, sacrificing the great end of parliamentary representation, the expression of the feelings and interests of the people. In order to preserve the show, we are giving up the substance of a legitimate House of Commons:

> "Thus, if you dine with my lord May'r,
> Roast beef and venison are your fare;
> But tulip leaves and lemon peel
> Serve only to adorn the meal;
> And he would be an idle dreamer,
> Who left the pie and gnaw'd the streamer."

The next objection to which I shall advert, is founded on that inveterate adherence to ancient forms, however unsuitable, to old practices, however abusive, which influences so greatly the decisions of the English parliament. As this objection has its strength more in the feelings and affections, than in any logical argument upon which it is grounded; as it rests on superstition rather than on reason, I know not how to meet it better than by referring to an example in ancient story. The instance I allude to occurs in the history of Rome; and here I must entreat the attention of the hon. member for Corfe-castle, who may be styled the tory commentator, as Machiavel may be styled the whig commentator, on Roman history. About 370 years after the foundation of

Rome, there arose a contest, not very unlike the question we are now debating, whether the two consuls should continue to be chosen from the patricians, or whether one should be chosen invariably from the plebeians. Appius Claudius, who was the prime advocate of aristocracy and existing institutions in that day, argued, that the greatest evils would follow if any change was made in the ancient forms. He contended, particularly, that none but a patrician could take the auguries—that if any alteration were made the chickens would not eat—that in vain they would be required to leave their coops. The language given to him by Livy is, "Quid enim est, si pulli non pascentur? Si ex caveâ tardius exierint? Si occinuerit avis? Parva sunt hæc: sed parva ista non contemnendo majores nostri maximam hanc rem fecerunt." Such was the reasoning of the Roman senator: reasoning, be it observed, not very different from that which is used to show, that our whole constitution will be subverted if any invasion is made upon the privileges of Old Sarum. But what was the result? After a successful war against a foreign enemy, Camillus, the dictator, had to encounter the most dangerous seditions at Rome, raised on this subject of the consulship. What did he and the senate do? It will be imagined that they passed restrictive laws; that they prohibited public meetings of more than fifty persons in the open air; that they punished the seditious orators, and restrained the liberty of speech for the future. No such thing. They assented to the petitions of the people. "Vix dum perfunctum eum bello atrocior domi seditio excepit: et per ingentia certamina dictator senatusque victus, ut rogationes tribuniciæ acciperentur; et comitia consulum adversâ nobilitate habita quibus L. Sextius de plebe primus consul factus." And what was the consequence? Discord and calamity? Quite the reverse. After some further contest, the whole dispute terminated in favour of the people; and the senate, to celebrate the return of concord between the two orders, commanded that the great games, the ludi maximi, should be solemnized, and that an additional holiday should be observed. Rome increased in power and glory; she defeated the Samnites; she resisted Pyrrhus; she conquered Carthage; nor in the whole of her famous history is any complaint to be found on record, that the chickens declined to eat, or that they refused to leave their coops, on account of the plebeian consul. The hon. member for Corfe-castle, in relating this circumstance, attributes the concession of Camillus to two reasons: first, that he thought it prudent to grant what could not long be refused; and secondly, that he was weary of bearing popular odium. Now, I beseech the hon. member to follow the example of Camillus: let him grant what we cannot much longer refuse, without danger to ourselves and ruin to our country. Let him rest satisfied with the odium we have already acquired, and consent to change a course which has made us so obnoxious to the people of England.

Another objection, which I have heard made to reform is, that the people, if not numerically, are at least virtually represented; and as the clearest proof of their agreement in the judgment of parliament, it is stated, that when that judgment is once pronounced, they acquiesce in it without resistance, and the agitations upon that subject immediately cease throughout the country. This is to my mind any thing but a test of popular confidence in the wisdom of parliament. The acquiescence, thus spoken of, is what in fact has constantly appeared in the conduct of the people under every government throughout the world. For it is one thing for the people to complain, pending the agitation of any question, and another and very different matter to incur the risk of criminality, by declaring any violent dissent from the final adjudication of the constitutional authorities under which they live. The practice of the people is, to express their opinions while a great question is undecided; but when the decision of the supreme magistrate once takes place, they have only to choose between bowing to his authority, or acting in rebellion to his power. The people of England, who are distinguished above all other nations for their respect to law, whose characteristic is a submission to what has been adjudged to be legal, know very well that a decision of the king and his ministers may be altered, but that, once confirmed by parliament, the act is complete and final: therefore, while a measure is ministerial, they complain; when it becomes parliamentary, they are silent. But nothing is more irrational than under such circumstances to infer the approbation of the people from that silence. When the parliament decided upon the propriety of omitting her late majesty's name from the Liturgy, did the people, because they then petitioned no more, acquiesce in the justice of that decision? Were they, when they abstained from remonstrating against the continuance of two post-masters-general, to be supposed as adopting the decision of this House, that two were necessary. All that ought to be inferred from the people's silence, when so situated, is, that a sufficient case for actual resistance had not yet occurred, and that it was useless for them to protest against the decision of parliament. I think the people judge wisely, because, in the times in which we live, the abuses they endure, though flagrant, do not amount to a justifiable ground for actual resistance. But let not any thing be inferred from their obedience, even if pushed still farther. The people, under the very worst species of tyranny, are often found sullen and silent victims. Does the House not know the perfect obedience which was paid to the acts of James 2nd? Was that tyrant not surrounded in his worst hour of misgovernment by adulatory lawyers, by subservient addressers, by servile surrenderers of corporate rights—in short, by every being who was ready to prostrate the liberties of his country? Did not James enjoy the full measure of this sort of obedience until the evils of his misrule at length compelled him to abandon his throne? Was not the Russian Emperor Paul, notoriously tyrannical as he was, obeyed by the vast population of his empire during years of oppression, and up to the moment when the bowstring put an end to his despotic career? Was not Ferdinand of Spain obeyed when he signed with his own hand the death-warrants of his best subjects, until at last the flame of popular discontent, which remained so long smothered, burst forth in the blaze of rebellion, and consumed all the bulwarks of his arbitrary rule? No doubt that, in the day of these tyrannic acts, the inflictors of them thought, as some men are disposed to think here, that the people were in willing and satisfied obedience because they abstained from open resistance; and there were bad advisers to press for the continuance of fatal and desperate measures, until at length they became intolerable, and recoiled upon the heads of the abettors of them with ruin and destruction. The same fate will befal England, if similar measures are pursued to a desperate extremity. Suppose a war arose, not of the people's own seeking, though the minister were to secure for it the approbation of parliament—suppose it led to bankruptcy and general confusion, in that melancholy hour, what answer would the uniform opposers of reform have for those whose advice, if timely attended to, would have saved the institutions of their country? What security would you have then, that the reform which has not been made from within, may not come with a vengeance from without?

And now, lastly, I come to an objection, which, in the failure of all other argument, after the defeat of every specific and tangible objection, is always brought forward as a complete bar to every proposition of reform. This consideration, which addresses itself rather to the nerves than to the understanding of those on whom it is meant to operate, is the example of the civil wars of England and the French Revolution. I likewise beseech your attention to the civil wars of England and the French Revolution; but I beg of you that it may be a sober attention, worthy of men and of Englishmen. And first let me ask, will any man say, that it would have been right to permit Charles 1st to abolish parliamentary government, to levy money by his own authority, and supersede the ancient liberties of England by the doctrine of divine right?—that it was not lawful and praiseworthy to resist a system of despotism, not intended, not projected, but actually established in England in the early years of that reign? Or will any man say, that the mean debauchery of Louis 15th was a fit employment for the resources of a great nation like the French? That the abuses of the French government did not require reform? If there be any man who will say this, let him enjoy his opinion if he will, but let him not presume to think himself worthy to enjoy the benefits of the British constitution; and, above all, let him not venture to think his counsels can be listened to in a British parliament.

I assume, then, and let us now confine our attention to one of the two countries—I assume, that lord Clarendon, and lord Strafford, and lord Falkland were right in their early opposition to the misgovernment of Charles 1st. But why not stop, it will be said, like lord Clarendon and lord Falkland? Alas! Sir, who shall say that the policy of lord Clarendon and lord Falkland would have procured for us a system of liberty? Who will venture to lay his finger upon that point in the history of Charles 1st, when it would have been possible to save the monarchy without losing the constitution? Who shall presume himself to possess more learning than Selden, more sagacity than Pym, more patriotism than Hampden?

The question, in fact, was involved in inextricable difficulty. From all I have read, and all I have thought upon this subject, I take the cause of that difficulty to be this: The aristocracy were divided; they were divided between a larger party, who were satisfied to bear arbitrary power for the sake of property and tranquillity; and a smaller party, who were ready to sacrifice property and even life for the sake of destroying arbitrary power. But this last party, being the minority, were obliged to call to their aid the assistance of the people. Now the history of the world shows, that to accomplish great changes in government by the active agency of the people, is a task of great hazard and uncertainty. The people, in a state of agitation, are, in times like those I speak of, naturally suspicious; they awake from a dream of confidence, and find that their facility has been abused by those rulers in whom they had implicitly trusted. In this wreck of all their established reliances, in this anxious desire for the benefits of freedom, in this tremorous apprehension of falling back into slavery, what wonder is it that their fears should be continually roused, that they should listen to accusations even against their best friends, and that, with a mixture of zeal and timidity, they should destroy the beautiful temple at the same time that they tear down the foul idol that it contains? What matter of surprise is it, that, unable to know exactly the truth, they should rase the very foundations of a society under which they have greatly suffered?

But how are these evils to be avoided? How are these natural and usual calamities attendant on popular revolutions, to be averted? By a united aristocracy. History here, too, tells us, that if great changes accomplished by the people are dangerous, although sometimes salutary, great changes accomplished by an aristocracy, at the desire of the people, are at once salutary and safe. When such revolutions are made, the people are always ready to leave in the hands of the aristocracy that guidance which tends to preserve the balance of the government and the tranquillity of the state. Such a change was the expulsion of the Tarquins from Rome; of James 2nd from England, These were revolutions, accomplished without bloodshed and confusion, by the influence of an united aristocracy. I call upon the aristocracy of England, therefore, now to unite to make that change safe, which, if they do not unite, may be dangerous, but which will not be the less inevitable. I call upon the Tories to stay the progress of abuses, which must end in the convulsion of the state. I appeal still more confidently to the Whigs to unite for a similar object. If I know any thing of Whiggism, the spirit of Whiggism is, to require for the people as much liberty as their hands can safely grasp at the time when it is required: and I am so far from agreeing to the flimsy accusations sometimes made against the Whigs, that I think, looking at their conduct from the beginning, their chief fault has been a fault of policy, in asking for more freedom and more securities for freedom than the people wished or could retain. The exclusion bill and the whole life of Mr. Fox are instances of this observation. When at the revolution, however, the government of this country was settled, the Whigs retained in their own hands the boroughs which they were able to influence. I really believe that to this measure the settlement of the house of Hanover is mainly owing. During the reigns of the two first kings of the house of Brunswick, the county members consisted almost entirely of the most determined Tories; and had they prevailed, we should probably have seen upon the throne the descendants of James 2nd, granting, perhaps, more securities for our religion, but not more guarantees for our liberty than James himself. I think, therefore, the Whigs were fully justified in retaining a certain quantity of borough influence, which they could not otherwise have justly held. But now, when the people are enlightened, and fully capable of understanding their own interests, the Whigs will act wisely if they yield to the increased intelligence of the country a due share in the return of their representatives. As they formerly retained the boroughs to secure liberty, let them now for the same noble object consent to part with them. Let them show to the country, that if reform is impeded, the Whig aristocracy stands free from the charge of hindering its progress from any personal and selfish interest of their own. In so doing, they will give energy and effect to their opposition in parliament; for I do not wish to conceal it, the possession of these boroughs has lessened the energy of their efforts in support of the liberties of the country. They have been able to state, with less firmness and frankness than they might otherwise have done, the causes of the misgovernment of the country; and the people, on the other hand, seem to feel that the Whig aristocracy retain something which properly belongs to themselves. Hence the union between the party of the people within and without the walls of parliament has been less cordial than it would be if the Whigs were content to yield something to the popular desire for reform: I beseech them to do so; but not them only; all the aristocracy of the land. Sir William Temple, a wise and amiable man, but whom no one will accuse of being too great an enthusiast for liberty, has said, that this great nation never can be ruined but by itself; and that, even in the greatest changes, if the weight and number rolled one way, yet England would be safe. I beseech you that the weight and number may roll one way; I beseech the possessors of great property to consider how nearly it concerns them to retain the affections of the great mass of the people. I beseech you, that, throwing aside all feminine fears, all pedantic prejudices, and all private advantages, you will consider only your duty as men, the wants of the age in which we live, and that permanent and pervading interest which we all have in the maintenance of the English constitution. May you remember, that the liberty which was acquired for you by your ancestors will be required of you by your descendants: then will you agree to a temperate and timely reform, reconcile the different classes of society, and prevent a convulsion which may involve all in one common ruin. Then may that proud constitution, which has now subsisted in maturity little more than one hundred years, continue to maintain the spirit of its freedom, and extend the sphere of its salutary influence, until its existence vies with that of the most durable institutions that were ever reared for the happiness of mankind in any age or in any country.—I now move, "That the present state of the representation of the People in Parliament requires the most serious consideration of this House."

Mr. Horace Twiss said, the House would not expect him to go through a tithe of the various matter adverted to, and the enormous theories by which it had been attempted to support this question. As to the objections urged by the noble lord against the influence of the Crown in that House, it appeared to him, that such influence could only be objectionable when the functions of government were completely exercised out of doors; but when the whole executive was, as it were, carried on in that House, the objection he thought did not stand upon such good ground. The same might be said of the interference of the Lords in that House. But, in advocating innovations upon the existing system of things, the advocates were not entitled to any benefit from the antiquity of any practice. They who opposed them had a right to follow such a course of argument; but surely not they who urged as the foundation of their argument the modern changes of time. But upon those silent changes he was willing to rest the issue of the question between them. And in reply to the augmentation of power in the House of Peers, he would urge the popular party, which in the lapse of time had insensibly grown up in that House, unknown to our ancestors. If bribery and corruption were found to exist in some of the details, it was not fair to charge the system with it. If the outrages of the Westminster mob had been attended with loss of life in the case of sir M. Maxwell, or if the attempt at drowning a candidate on a late occasion at Chester had succeeded, it would have been deemed murder by the law; but would it have been fair to charge these as evils upon the popular system? The noble lord, in his inducements for reform included the expense of boroughs. But, allowing the expense of a borough election to amount to 4,000*l.*, he asked if for treble that sum any one would guarantee the cost of a contested election for Manchester or Leeds? The expense then being equal, or greater in the popular mode, he asked any one who had witnessed the scene of a contested election, the state of the public-houses, and the state of the electors, stimulated to outrage and disorder by every idle watch-word, which was the preferable system? The expression of public opinion was much about the same in both cases. There was one very difficult point of difference between the noble mover, and himself as to the meaning of the word "representative." He (Mr. T.) understood by it a guardian of the interests of the people in parliament, to the best of his abilities. Let the noble lord look at the operation of public opinion in bringing about the abolition of the slave trade, the emancipation of religious sects, and the mitigation of punishment, before he declared that the people were not ably and amply represented in parliament. But, although it ought duly to represent public opinion, that House ought to oppose a steady, constitutional barrier, against the overrunning stream of popular innovation. The innovation contended for by the noble lord, was by some unaccountable means, styled moderate reform. This moderate reform was, to disfranchise a hundred boroughs at once. This was the amputation of an entire limb [Hear!]. It would be well for the House, in disposing of this question, to consider what would come next, if they satisfied the cravings of the reformers in this respect. They would next be told they had not gone far enough; and they would be driven on, from one point to another, until they arrived at complete radical reform. These attempts of the radicals had been, by some of their own number, compared to the operation of wedges! But, unhappily, those wedges would be found each succeeding one of larger dimensions than the last, and formed so as to fit the enlarged gap, till the solid fabric of the constitution was rent asunder, and riven to the very heart. Those who formerly only claimed to be governed equitably, now demanded to direct the government themselves. The House would consider how far, if they assented to the first of a series of premeditated changes in the constitution, they might not be instrumental in a total subversion of the monarchy. If a second time the monarchy was to fall before the democracy, the House of Commons, he trusted, would not a second time assist in achieving the downfall.

Lord Folkestone said, that as this was the first time upon which he had risen to deliver his opinions in that House upon the great question which was involved in the motion of the noble lord, he claimed the indulgence of the House while he stated to them the grounds of the vote which he should give. He had, after much doubt and hesitation on this momentous subject, at length made up his mind to vote for a reform in parliament, and to support a measure calculated properly to produce that end. Still, however, entertaining great deference for the opinions of very many honourable persons which he knew differed on this point from his own opinions, he must declare that every feeling of his heart was engaged in the cause; and that the result of his inquiries and deliberations only tended to convince him, that it had now become absolutely necessary, for the salvation of the country, that a reform —and a very decided one—should be adopted. The reform he should advocate was not framed so as to establish a democracy—it was not meant to destroy the throne, but to support it. It was with a view rather of rescuing the throne from the dangerous situation in which the present system, as he conceived, was calculated to place it—it was in the hope of more firmly establishing it, that he meant to support the present motion. To him it did appear, that it must be almost impossible for any hon. member, whatever his sentiments on political questions might be, to take upon himself to assert, that the representation of the people in that House was in such a state, at present, as he would declare that he thought fit and proper. To prove the necessity of some reform, cases were by no means wanting; for they were to be found in many of the votes of the House. But, of all the various votes to which it had of late years come, none in his judgment was more apposite by way of example, than one which had been agreed to in an early period of the present session. It did strike him as that particular vote which, of all others, in his parliamentary experience, was most likely to reflect discredit and disrepute upon parliament. A few weeks ago that House had manifested its willingness to vote the suspension of the Habeas Corpus act in Ireland, without any ground whatever being laid for such a suspension, excepting what was furnished by the speech of the minister, and the mere representation of the noble lord who was at the head of the government of Ireland, to that effect. Yet a measure of this momentous nature had been voted, and passed in one night. Now, it had turned out, that so slight was the necessity for such an act, that since this hasty vote. It had not been in one single instance brought into operation; nor had there been one single person arrested under it. After this, would any person feeling a real regard, a genuine love for his country and the constitution—would any one be found to say, that House was constituted as a British House of Commons ought to be? For his own part, he really and truly believed, that there was no gentleman on the other side even, who would get up and say that, either in principle, or theory, or fact, the House at present was so constituted. He did not believe that any of those hon. gentlemen really wished to retain the present constitution of parliament, except from a fear of ulterior consequences—from an apprehension of future convulsions and revolutions. And, with respect to convulsions, he would beg leave to ask the House, looking at the state of affairs which at that moment actually existed in the country, whether, if the House continued to be constituted as it now was, and went on pursuing the same measures which it had long been pursuing, they could suppose that such convulsions could be averted?

On referring to the various arguments which had been at different times adduced against parliamentary reform, he found some that were singularly contradictory and inconsistent with each other. In some cases the argument had been drawn from the paucity of petitions presented for reform, in others, from the multiplicity of such petitions: in others, again, the objection or argument was founded on the supposed danger of the principle of adding 100 members to the body of parliament. Another principle, upon which parliamentary reform had been several years ago resisted in that House by one of the most honest opponents of the question, (the late Mr. John Pitt, afterwards lord Camelford,) was this—that the House of Lords was no effective counterbalance to the power of the Crown, and therefore it was necessary to keep up the borough system. This argument was not less extraordinary than the others he had mentioned. But, there had been some two years since, a speech published, purporting to have been delivered by a right hon. gentleman (Mr. Canning), whom he saw in his place, to his constituents at Liverpool, which was supposed to contain the newest and most approved arguments against reform. It had been cried up in that House as containing all that could be advanced on the subject; and from the price at which it was published, (and by which, to judge from the size of the pamphlet, the booksellers must have been losers), it would appear to have been widely dispersed over the country. If he had not known that the right hon. gentleman was a strong opponent of reform in parliament—that the right hon. gentleman's object in making that speech was to instruct his constituents as to the dangers of reform, he should have said, upon perusing it, that it was a speech in favour of parliamentary reform. [Hear.] The right hon. gentleman, in his address at Liverpool, had spoken of the account which he owed to his constituents as their member, and as a minister of the Crown. This was a very democratical notion. Responsible as a representative to his constituents he certainly was, but how as a minister of the Crown the right hon. gentleman was more accountable to the people of Liverpool than to the people of Manchester or any other town, he did not perceive. The argument upon which the right hon. gentleman had chiefly relied was, the vast happiness the people of England enjoyed under the system as it existed. In the first place, this happiness might not be produced by the system; but if it were, he should be glad to know where that happiness was now to be found? Had it not entirely disappeared, and were not the people at this moment in a state of suffering not surpassed in the history of the world? In talking of the present constitution of the House, it was not a little curious to remark the present constitution of the government. Not long since, the noble marquis (Londonderry), had come down with a detailed statement of disturbances in Ireland: and he had concluded by frightening the House by assuring it, that "rebellion was stalking abroad in the land." Yet, what had another member of the government only a few nights ago asserted on the same subject? Not only that rebellion did not stalk the land, but that the disturbances were only not contemptible, because if not checked they might lead to dangerous consequences. Such were the trifling contradictions of the different members of government in the present constitution of the House! But, if it was to be contended, that all the happiness of the country was to be attributed to the House of Commons, he with much better reason, might attribute all its distress to the

To return to the speech of the right hon. gentleman at Liverpool. He had proceeded to illustrate what he called the happiness of the country under the powers that were, by reference to the six acts—those melancholy attacks upon British liberty, which had passed shortly before his election. At least this was unfortunate, especially as within two months after the address was delivered, rumours were heard of drillings in the north, and disorders prevailed, just as much as if the House had never passed the six acts. In addition, ministers had then thought it necessary, in spite of the happiness of the whole country, to build new barracks at Carlisle and Glasgow, and for the ground on which they were erected they had been compelled to pay 200*l.* and 250*l.* per acre. Such were the beneficent effects of the six acts. If they looked at the right hon. gentleman's account of the effect of the House of Commons on the other branches of the constitution, it was the more extraordinary that he approved of it. This, the right hon. gentleman observed, was admitted on all hands, that, from the first establishment of the House of Commons, it had been gradually growing in power, until, like Aaron's rod, it had well nigh swallowed up the other two branches, its fellows. The right hon. gentleman had said, that the constitution was good, because it was continually shifting and varying. Now, if it had been good at that time—if it had then been so nicely balanced at that time—it could hardly happen that it was exactly balanced now. If the system were good at the moment the speech was delivered—if at that precise period the balance were so nicely and delicately adjusted, it could not be so at present; because it was always altering. And did the right hon. gentleman mean that it had reached its perfection just at the date of his defence? He (lord F.) was convinced that the system—the constitution of the House—was hourly becoming more obnoxious; and though, perhaps, it might not yet have absorbed its fellows, it had taken a great stride to absorb one of the prerogatives of the Crown, and a prerogative of the highest value and importance. After the bill of pains and penalties against her majesty had been withdrawn, it became highly desirable that parliament should be dismissed without any interview with the sovereign: it was felt that for the king to address both Houses, under such circumstances, would be attended with great difficulty; although it was most indecent that the Commons should not be thanked for granting to the king the largest stipend ever given to a monarch. Parliament had not been prorogued by proclamation; as, after consultation, it was finally determined that it could not be done: accordingly, as the king could not come down, and as the prorogation by proclamation could not take place, both Houses had taken upon themselves to dispense with one of the most ancient and undoubted prerogatives of the Crown—a prerogative which he, though a determined reformer, and a reformer to a great extent, would not have consented to abolish. The right hon. gentleman had once very candidly confessed in that House, that, when he composed a speech, he sat down to consider the arguments which might be used against him, and to answer them before hand. But in this sort of anticipation the right hon. gentleman was apt to exaggerate the arguments of his adversaries. In this way, the right hon. gentleman had supposed the reformers to have contended, that the House of Commons was not sufficiently powerful. This no reformer could ever say. No: the complaint was, that the people were not sufficiently powerful. The six acts, the proceedings on the Manchester business, shewed the power of the House of Commons; but what was wanted was, that in the exercise of that power they should be influenced by the will and the interests of the people. The right hon. gentleman, while he had described the power to which the House of Commons had grown up, had made it matter of praise that its constitution had not been changed. In ordinary cases of trust examination of character was required, and as that trust was increased, the necessity of scrutiny as to the persons trusted was greater. No doubt the House ought to be watched, and watched narrowly: so said the reformers, and so said the right hon. gentleman; for here he was himself a reformer. Strange, and inconsistent as it might seem, the conclusion the right hon. gentleman had drawn from these premises was, that the people were to be well satisfied, because there was no material difference between the House of Commons now and formerly. It had been disputed by some, whether if a man could lift a calf, and continue to lift it every day, he would grow stronger as the calf grew heavier, so as to be able to lift it still, when it was increased to the size of an ox. What might be the right hon. gentleman's present opinion, it might not be easy to say; but, applying the moot point to the House of Commons, he must contend, that the man would not be stronger, yet nevertheless he would be able to lift the ox. The fact, however, was mistaken. The House of Commons had materially altered. The right hon. gentleman had himself asserted, that it was subject to perpetual change; and he (lord F.) begged to assign one or two reasons why, in the nature of things, it must be very much altered from its original constitution. He had been long enough in parliament to recollect, that many years ago, a member would have been called to order for talking even of a peer being concerned in an election; much more if he had said, that peers and the Crown had their representatives in that House. In this respect there had been a change. As money made wealth so power increased power; and those who once were powerful daily became more so. He had formerly seen a little book, containing the names of members, and the places they represented a century ago; and it there appeared, that boroughs were usually represented by gentlemen residing in their neighbourhood. Now, however, the members were merely the nominees of individuals, without the slightest connexion with the places they affected to represent. In this respect, also, there was a change; and certainly not for the better. He found also, that in the time of George I. there were only 178 peers, but now there were 310: and, adding the bishops and the Irish peers, 382. The progress had been in the following degrees: In 1719, there were 17[illegible] peers. In 1780 there were 183. In [illegible] there were 310. From the year 1760 to 1821, there had been no less than 209 creations. Was this no change in the constitution? He begged the House to consider how this increase applied to the question of reform. In the first place, there were taken from the choice of the people, 209 persons who might have been their champions; and those who might have been their champions, by the favour of the Crown were converted into their enemies. The enemies of the people were also increased by this operation in another way; for these peers, who before, perhaps, had represented boroughs, on retiring to the upper house of course put their nominees into their seats; and thus, besides the 209 enemies in the new peers, the people met with 209 additional opponents in their representatives in the House of Commons.

The only plea on which those who resisted reform could defend the influence of the Crown was this—that the House of Commons, in fact, governed the country—that the three estates no longer existed to any practical purpose: but that the king, the peers, and the people had their representatives here. If this were true, then it was not true, that the representatives were chosen by the people; or, if it were true, then the right hon. gentleman was even a greater democrat than the reformers, and was for nothing short of a republic. If the House of Commons were elected by the people, and it absorbed all the power of the three estates, and if the right hon. gentleman were content with that state of affairs, he was satisfied, to all intents and purposes, with nothing less than a republic. [Some symptoms of impatience were here exhibited on the ministerial benches.] He could assure the House, that he was not anxious to occupy more of its time than was necessary. What he had said might be very absurd, but it did not appear to him to be so; and until he was of that opinion, he should persevere. [Hear, hear.] The inconvenience of frequent changes was dwelt on; but it was not for frequent changes that the advocates of reform looked: at least, the most zealous and able advocate of radical reform, Mr. Jeremy Bentham, conceived, that by what he called "annuality of election," a greater permanence would be given to the composition of the House than was now known. Those who contended, that the Commons included the three estates, and in fact governed the nation, were the real enemies of the Crown and of the peers, and they only seemed to wish to destroy the monarchy. The king had his representatives, and the peers had theirs; and, among the former were the lords of the Admiralty and the post-masters, who were sent to counteract the few real representatives of the people. He would contend that this doctrine of the three estates being equally balanced in that House was not the fact. But, even if they were balanced here, there was a power in another place which rendered that balance useless. As an instance of this, he would refer to the Catholic question. That question had once been carried through the House of Commons. Neither the representatives of the Crown nor the representatives of the lords in that House were able to defeat it; but, in the House of Lords, the measure was rejected. Therefore, he had a right to argue, that the people had not fair play; because it appeared, that when a popular measure was carried in the Commons House of parliament, in spite of the representatives of the other two bodies, those bodies revived, exerted all their influence, and gave a death-blow to the question in another place. Besides, it appeared that the decisions of that House were considered by his majesty's ministers as of no importance. No later than last night, the right honourable member for the University of Oxford had declared, that if an address to the Crown were carried by the unanimous voice of that House, he would not advise his majesty to act. [Hear, hear.]

With respect to this new doctrine—this doctrine of an equal balance of the constitution—this doctrine of the strength of king, lords, and commons being equally poised in that House—it was not to be found in any of the books which treated of the law and constitution of the country. It was a new dictum, and, he conceived, a very dangerous one. How could they tell whether that balance, supposing it to exist was or was not correctly struck? But, if it were struck accurately, it was quite evident that a very trivial matter would unsettle that balance. The creation of the slightest additional debt—the appointment of an office—the sending forth a commission—these, and a thousand other circumstances, equally trifling, would at once overthrow this vaunted balance, and overthrow it, too, without any person being aware of the fact. The right hon. gentleman, speaking of the present state of the constitution, observed, that the country was accustomed to certain inconveniences which were connected with it, and had grown out of the lapse of time and the change of circumstances. The right hon. gentleman then went on to ask, "Would you reform the constitution on new principles, or bring it back to what it was at some former period?" In his opinion, the first question was not fairly put. The question ought to be "Do you wish to establish the constitution on old principles?" Supposing the question to be put fairly, he was inclined to think that the principles contended for by most radical reformers did obtain in other days—not perhaps in form, but certainly in principle. He had very good authority for asserting this. Mr. Prynne, speaking on this subject, observed, that before the 28th of Henry VIII., when a 40*s.* freehold was declared to be the lowest qualification for a county elector, every inhabitant and commoner in a county had a right to vote at each election, whether he had 1*d.* 6*d.*, or 1*s.* a year, in the same manner as the 40*s.* freeholder had at present. So that universal suffrage, which some gentlemen were pleased to denominate "universal confusion," though he did not join in the propriety of the designation, was, it appeared, formerly allowed. Previous to the time of Henry VIII., universal suffrage did exist in the counties. The right hon. gentleman asked with respect to cities whether the election of members to represent them was ever materially different from what it was at present? Now, there were grave authorities to show, that the right of voting in cities and boroughs was formerly intrusted to a much larger body than it now was. In favour of this doctrine they had a resolution of that House, in 1626, in which it was declared, "that the elective franchise did of common right belong to all commoners, and nothing could take it from them but prescription or ancient usuage." The celebrated antiquary, Mr. Cotton, Mr. Selwyn, and chief justice Coke, agree to the interpretation put by parliament on the documents to which this resolution referred; Dr. Brady, objected to it. He denied that those learned men translated the words communitas civitatum et burgorum correctly; alleging, that they did not understand the meaning of the word communitas, which they took in too extensive a sense. This was the way Dr. Brady got out of the dispute.

The right hon. gentleman had further observed, that there could not be a pure democracy in a limited monarchy like ours, because, if there were, it would overthrow the other estates. On this point he reasoned, and he endeavoured to produce instances to prove his proposition. Now, it would be a misnomer to denominate that a democracy which was not a pure democracy. It must be either a pure democracy or no democracy at all; if not a pure democracy, it degenerated into an aristocracy or an oligarchy; and he should like to know, where the book was to be found in which it was laid down, that there were not three estates forming the English constitution—a king, an hereditary aristocracy, and an elective democracy. The right hon. gentleman then adverted to the state of things which, in his opinion, the reformers wished to introduce; and he asked, triumphantly, was this a mere idle theory of his? To show that it was not, he referred to the difficulties into which the parliament of 1648 had plunged the country, and observed, that the proceedings of that day showed what a radical parliament would do. Let the House consider what that parliament really did. They, undoubtedly, perpetrated some atrocious acts. The attainder of the earl of Stafford and the murder of the king were amongst the number; but they also perfected many good measures. In their first session they passed an act abolishing the high court of star-chamber. [Much interruption by coughing and cries of "hear."]. Gentlemen could not suppose that he would cease in the middle of his observations. Many of the acts which this parliament passed in its first years were declared to be of such a nature that "uncorrupted posterity would reverence those by whom they were matured." If their early measures were good—so good that the people thanked the king, in the beginning, for assenting to them—the people of the present day had a right to thank that parliament for some of the measures which it adopted at its close, particularly for the navigation act. As the conduct of that parliament had been of a mixed character—as it had done some good and some bad acts—it was not fair in the right hon. gentleman to hold it up as an object for undivided blame. The right hon. gentleman had stigmatised it with a title of a "radical parliament;" but it remained to be seen how far that epithet could fairly be applied to it. With respect to the election of that parliament, he had not had an opportunity of searching the records to discover whether it was more popular than elections had usually been at that time. He had, however, no reason to suppose that it was more popular; but that, on the contrary the court party exerted themselves to procure favourable returns in different places. In one point it was most irradical; for it was the only parliament that ever affected perpetuity. They had heard of parliaments which sat for twelve, or thirteen, and even for twenty years; but this was the only one that aimed at perpetuity. They passed an act declaring that "they could not be dissolved, except by their own consent."—The noble lord then proceeded to expatiate on the mischiefs which arose from the want of a proper check on the conduct of parliament. Where such a check did not exist, parliament soon became irresponsible; and all power, without responsibility, was tyranny. This was a strong argument in favour of short parliaments. He would ask the right hon. gentleman how he could reconcile it to himself, professing as he did, that he was a friend to the whole constitution, to the privileges of the peerage, and to the rights of the people—how he could reconcile it to himself to support the present state of things, as he described them, when the House of Commons had swallowed up the power both of the King and the House of Lords? In opposing the sentiments of the right hon. gentleman, he was also opposing prejudices in which he had himself been reared, and opinions which he had formerly entertained. He conjured the House to consider the motion seriously; convinced as he was, that the people would not long put up with those sufferings and privations to which they had been exposed for a protracted period, unless parliament turned a favourable ear to their complaints.

Mr. Duncombe said, that the plan of Mr. Pitt went to reduce the rotten boroughs, but that great statesman had strongly deprecated annual parliaments and universal suffrage. He could never consent to hazard the fate of the country upon wild theoretic plans, and would therefore oppose the present motion.

Mr. Wynn rose amidst cries of "question." He said, that he should not trespass on the House at any length; but as, after a debate of five hours, not one half hour had been consumed by those who were desirous to oppose the motion, he thought it but fair that some opportunity should be allowed for the statement of their objections. He had also reasons of a more personal nature for wishing to occupy their attention, after the attack which the noble mover had thought proper to make upon him. The noble lord had said, that whether he went among Whigs, or Tories, ministers or radicals, the Grenvilles were equally the abhorrence of the country. He was not disposed to shrink from a comparison with the noble lord—he was not ashamed to stand upon his own character, but would fearlessly oppose that character to the character of the noble lord. The noble lord could urge no pretence to the opinion and confidence of the country which he (Mr. Wynn) could not advance with equal claims. This might be called vanity; but something was due to the injured feelings of an individual who had always pursued a direct and straight-forward course. The noble lord had stated, that he (Mr. W.) and his friends, when they accepted of office, and had vacated their seats, had no constituents by whom they could be called upon to explain and justify their conduct as a condition of their re-election. To this he would reply, that he was returned by as large and respectable a body of constituents as the noble lord. After he had accepted of office, he went down to that body, and having informed them of his appointment, and explained his reasons for again demanding their suffrages, he received their unqualified approbation, and was elected without opposition. He was sorry to be obliged to obtrude any account of his personal concerns or personal conduct on the House; but every man's character was dear to himself, and the attack which had been made upon him justified him in attempting to repel insinuations which he scorned, by appealing to his parliamentary life for evidence of his political consistency. When he first obtained a seat in parliament in 1797, he was directly opposed to these who occupied the opposition benches, many of whom were the same gentlemen who now sat there. And, why was he opposed to them? Because he was convinced that, under the name of liberty, they advocated licentiousness—because he thought that, under the idea of supporting the friends of freedom, they were encouraging and strengthening the enemies of the constitution. After the party whom he then opposed agreed in the necessity of prosecuting the war against the enemies of real freedom, the differences between him and them ceased; and without changing his principles, he voted generally with them. In 1817, he found nearly the same state of things as when he first entered the House. He found the same system of combining against the constitution, the same system of secret meetings for illegal purposes, the same disposition to tumult, and the same feelings of disaffection. The gentlemen opposite maintained the same conduct on the latter as on the former occasion. He did not complain of them for supporting their own consistency; but if they were consistent in adhering to their side, he could not be called inconsistent for reverting to his former opinions. In these circumstances he found the difference between himself and the gentlemen who sat on the benches opposite growing greater and greater every day. This was particularly manifested in the different views which they entertained on the question of reform, and the necessity of the six acts of 1819, which, in his opinion, were indispensable for the salvation of the country. The noble lord had supposed the case of his (Mr. W.'s) being called to answer questions on the hustings, relative to his reasons for joining an administration which he had formerly opposed; and he thought he could satisfactorily reconcile this apparent inconsistency. He had been opposed to ministers on the question of the currency. That question had been set at rest by a measure in which ministers and the House cordially concurred. All obstacles to an union on this topic had therefore been removed. After the peace, he had been opposed to ministers on the subject of the standing army. He resisted their original estimates in 1816, because he thought they manifested the adoption of a military system—objectionable, on account of its expense, but more objectionable from the dangers with which it threatened the constitution. Such was the military establishment which he opposed in 1816; but he had since seen that military establishment reduced below any estimate which he could previously have formed. The noble lord had adverted to his votes on the proposed repeal of the salt-tax at different periods, as evidence of his inconsistency; but these likewise admitted of a satisfactory explanation. He was opposed to that tax before he accepted of office: he was so still. He thought it highly objectionable; and was of opinion that it ought to be repealed as soon as possible, consistently with the public welfare. The gentlemen opposite had many of them opposed the income tax before their friends accepted of office, and when in office they had continued and increased it. In this they were not inconsistent; neither was he in voting against the immediate repeal of the salt-tax, of which he as highly as ever disapproved. When the question came lately before the House, he was of opinion that, in the face of the pledges of parliament to maintain a sinking fund of a certain amount, and during the progress of a great financial operation, the success of which depended on the fidelity with which parliament observed those pledges, he could not consent to the immediate surrender of so great a portion of the public revenue as this tax supplied. On the question of Catholic disabilities, he still maintained every opinion which he had ever expressed. The question was so important, the interests which it involved were so momentous, that he was willing to incur every sacrifice to accomplish the measure; and if he had been of opinion that by refusing office he could have promoted its success more than by accepting it, he would not have hesitated for a moment to adopt the former course. With these views, it was pleasing to him to reflect, that a noble marquis, whose views on this subject were similar to his own, had been placed at the head of the Irish government, and that a right hon. friend of his (Mr. Plunkett) had likewise come into office. These appointments he regarded as a pledge, that, though that great measure itself might not be immediately carried, it was only postponed; and in the mean time afforded the country a security, that the laws would be administered with impartiality, and that the privileges which the Catholics of Ireland had already obtained, would not remain a dead letter, but would be executed in their true spirit, and to their full extent. The noble lord had laid too much stress on the circumstance of some of his (Mr. W.'s) friends not having constituents, when he brought it forward as a disqualification for office. Suppose there should be a change of ministry tomorrow, and the two hon. members for Knaresborough (sir J. Mackintosh and Mr. Tierney) were promoted to office, would it be any reason against their appointment that they could not be examined by their constituents? Having said thus much in answer to the noble lord's observations respecting him and his family, he would now say a few words on the subject of the motion before the House. But he would first revert to a part of the charge against him which he had nearly forgotten. He was accused of not only accepting office himself, but of bringing in two of his friends to the board of control along with him. He could assure the House, that nothing would have given him greater pleasure than that his right hon. friend (Mr. S. Bourne) should have remained at the board; but when he had long previously resolved to resign, it surely could not be justly made the subject of charge against him (Mr. W.) that he advised the appointment of two of his friends, with whose talents and assiduity he was best acquainted.—With respect to the motion itself, he saw no advantage that could arise from it. If a hundred members for boroughs were to be taken off, the effect would be to deprive the House of some of the most useful men in it. He could not agree with those who thought that the business of that House might be done well enough by experience alone, without any assistance from knowledge. He should be very unwilling to try such experiments. It always appeared to him a great advantage that professional gentlemen, who had no parliamentary influence of their own, should have opportunities afforded them of displaying their talents in that House. He could not admit, with the noble lord, that the basis of representation was narrowed, at the same time that the population increased. The system of representation was become lately more popular. As a proof of this he might refer to the boroughs of Aylesbury, Shoreham, Cricklade, and Grampound. It always appeared to him unwise to remove existing institutions, without first providing a substitute. If this motion were agreed to, was it to be supposed that it would content the advocates for reform? No! The noble lord who spoke last had manfully declared himself the friend of annual parliaments and universal suffrage. Now, the effect of such changes would be, to alter completely the constitution of the House of Commons. He objected to the motion, on account of its general and indefinite nature. When any practical proposition was submitted to the House, he should give it his best attention but a general motion of this kind, he would always oppose.

Mr. Robinson presented himself to the House, and continued on his legs, amidst loud cries for Mr. Canning. He could assure the House, that he would not have interposed between its natural impatience to hear his right hon. friend, and his right hon. friend's speech, had it not been for a personal explanation. The noble lord had adverted to some expressions of his in a former debate, and had adduced them as a motive for adopting the important change which he recommended in the system of our representation. The use thus made of his expressions made him anxious to explain them; for what he had anticipated at the time that he uttered them had actually taken place. His words had been made to bear a meaning which he never intended. He was described as an advocate for parliamentary corruption, though no one who considered the argument in which he used the perverted words could justly impute such sentiments to him. He was accused of saying, that the general diffusion of knowledge made it necessary to maintain useless places as a counterbalance to the influence which knowledge created. Now, he had said no such thing. In speaking of the influence of the Crown, he had said, that before measures were taken to reduce it, it was necessary to consider what that influence was; because offices which at one time and under certain circumstances gave an undue influence, might at another time, if destroyed, endanger the just influence of the Crown. His argument was, that in the diffusion of knowledge, an infinitely greater check on the influence of the Crown existed in our days, than in former periods of our history; and that if the House proceeded to abolish an office to decrease that influence, they were taking a false estimate of its extent. But, did he argue against the diffusion of knowledge? Good God! could he be so preposterous! No. He said, the diffusion of knowledge was a blessing; and among other reasons, because it was a check on power. He would not argue the merits of the question; but he would say to the noble lord (Folkestone), that, if he had taken time to consider of the alteration which his opinions had undergone, he (Mr. R.) knew not why he should not be allowed time to consider why he should change his opinions. The noble lord had given, as a strong reason for the measure which he had proposed, the great change which had taken place in the public mind; and he (Mr. R.) would refer to that change, as a reason why the House should pause ere it adopted any such propositions. He would allow that on this question of reform a very great change had taken place in the public mind. There was a time when many thought that there was no salvation but in annual parliaments and universal suffrage. Now, the hundreds, or thousands, or millions, who held these opinions had come down to the more temperate reform proposed by the noble lord. He thought this change on the part of the public, a conclusive reason why the House ought not to be in a hurry. A very great portion of the people had already changed their minds upon the subject; and it would be but fair to wait, in order to see whether they would not change their minds still further.

Several members then rose at the same time; but the cry for Mr. Canning was so loud and prevalent, that they gave way. Upon which,

Mr. Canning rose and said *:—In obeying the call which the House has done me the honour to make upon me, I should be unwilling to occupy their attention for any length of time, upon a subject with respect to which my opinions are sufficiently notorious, were it not for the pointed manner in which I have been alluded to by the noble lord Folkestone who has lately addressed them. That noble lord has challenged me either to support my old opinions by new arguments, or to abandon them. He describes himself as having been converted by my former arguments against parliamentary reform, to an opinion in favour of it: and in his own conversion to a creed which he had before rejected, he fancies himself entitled to carry me with him, and to make me a proselyte against myself. Those arguments of mine which have produced this unfortunate and unforeseen effect upon the noble lord's understanding have been long before the public; and I have no disposition to complain that the noble lord has referred to them as pointedly and particularly as if they had been uttered in the debate of this night. It was natural too, perhaps, that the noble lord, with the ardour of a convert, should flatter himself that his new-born zeal would extend to all around him: but I must beg leave to say, that the noble lord has carried his expectations a little too far, when he desires me to read my own speeches backwards; and to avow myself, if not a confirmed democrat, at least a friend to moderate reform. With the permission of the House, I will state in as few words as possible, the grounds on which I continue to hold the same opinions which I have heretofore professed; and to draw from them the same conclusion.

Never, Sir, could those opinions be advanced under more favourable auspices—never could a conviction of their truth and justness be expressed with better assurance of a favourable reception than on the present occasion; when we have just been informed by the noble marquis of Tavistock in presenting a petition for parliamentary reform, that the whole body of the nobility, of the gentry, of the clergy, of the magistracy, of the leading and opulent commercial classes—in short that the great mass of the property and intelligence of the country,' is arrayed against that question. To this singular and valuable admission of the noble marquis (singular as to the opportunity chosen for declaring it, and the more valuable for that singularity) have been added others not less striking, on the part of the noble proposer of the motion. That noble lord, while contending for a change which he declares to be necessary for the salvation of the state, but which he admits to be a change serious and extensive in its nature, has acknowledged, that under the existing system the country has grown in power, in wealth, in knowledge, and in general prosperity. He has detailed accurately and laboriously the particulars of this gradual and sensible improvement; and he has further acknowledged, that in proportion to the progress of that improvement a silent moral change has been operated upon the conduct of this House—which is now, he allows, greatly more susceptible of the influence of popular feeling and of the impressions of public opinion, than it was a century ago.' Nay, he has gone farther still. He has, in anticipation of an argument which I perhaps might have used, if the noble lord had not suggested it, but which I am glad to take at his hands, expressed a doubt, or at least has shewn it to be very doubtful, whether a more implicit obsequiousness to popular opinion on the part of the House of Commons, would produce unqualified good;—avowing his own belief that if the composition of the House had been altered at the Revolution, the purposes of the Revolution would not have been accomplished; the House of Hanover would never have been seated upon the Throne. 'The composition of the House of Commons is now precisely what it was at the time of the Revolution. Whatever change there may be in its temper, is, by the noble lord's acknowledgment, towards a more ready obedience to the public opinion.' But if the House of Commons had at the time of the Revolution, been implicitly obedient to the people—in other words, if the House had been then entirely composed of members popularly elected—that great event, to which I am as willing as the noble lord to attribute the establishment of our liberties, would, according to the noble lord's declared belief, have been in all probability defeated.

Surely these admissions of the noble lord are in no small degree at variance with his motion. Surely such admissions if not ample enough of themselves to overbalance the direct arguments which the noble lord has, in the subsequent part of his speech, brought forward in the support of that motion, do at least relieve me from much of the difficulty and odium which might otherwise have belonged to an opposition to Parliamentary Reform. If I contend in behalf of the constitution of the House of Commons such as it is, I contend at least for no untried, no discredited, no confessedly pernicious establishment. I contend for a House of Commons, the spirit of which, whatever be its frame, has, without any forcible alteration, gradually, but faithfully, accommodated itself to the progressive spirit of the country; and in the frame of which, if an alteration, such as the noble lord now proposes, had been made a hundred and thirty years ago, the House of Commons of that day would, by his own confession, have been disabled from accomplishing the glorious Revolution and securing the fruits of it to their posterity.

Thus fortified, I have the less difficulty in meeting the noble lord's motion in front; in giving, at once, a plain and direct negative to the general resolution, which is the basis of his whole plan. I do not acknowledge the existence of the necessity, which by that resolution is declared to exist, for taking into consideration, with a view to alteration and amendment, the present state of the representation of the people in the House of Commons—knowing as I do, that what is in the contemplation of many persons who are calling for Reform, could not be adopted; and not knowing what may be the ideas and designs of others; feeling an equal repugnance, both from what I know and what I do not know upon this subject, to a doubtful and equivocal proposition, which would have the effect of binding this House to enter into the consideration of an endless succession of schemes for purposes altogether indefinite; I object in the very outset to the noble lord's general resolution, independently of any objection which I may feel to his particular plan.

Not, however, that the plan itself is not abundantly fertile of objections. So far as I understand it, that plan is little more than to make an addition of 100 members to this House, to be returned by the counties and larger towns; and to open the way for this augmentation, by depriving each of the smaller boroughs of one half of the elective franchise which they now enjoy. This plan the noble lord has introduced and recommended with an enumeration of names whose authority he assumes to be in favour of it. Amongst those names is that of Mr. Pitt. But the House must surely be aware that the plan brought forward by Mr. Pitt differed widely, not only in detail, but in principle, from that propounded on this occasion by the noble lord. True it is, that the object of Mr. Pitt's plan was, like that of the noble lords, to add 100 members to this House: but this object was to be attained without the forcible abolition of any existing right of election. Mr. Pitt proposed to establish a fund of 1,000,000*l.* to be applied to the purchase of franchises from such decayed boroughs as should be willing to sell them. This fund was to accumulate at compound interest, till an adequate inducement was provided for the voluntary surrender, by the proprietors, of such elective franchises as it might be thought expedient to abolish. There was throughout the whole of Mr. Pitt's plan a studious avoidance of coercion; a careful preservation of vested interests; and a fixed determination not to violate existing rights in accomplishing its object. It was hoped, that by these means every sense of injury or danger would be excluded, and that the change in view would be brought about by a gradual process, resembling the silent and insensible operation of time. Here then, I repeat it, is a difference of the most essential kind between the two propositions of Mr. Pitt and of the noble lord; a difference, not superficial, but fundamental; as complete, indeed, as the difference between concession and force, or between respect for property and spoliation. I am not, however, bound, nor at all prepared to contend for the intrinsic or absolute excellence of Mr. Pitt's plan; and still less to engage my own support to such a plan, if it were to be brought forward at the present time. But placing it in fair comparison with the noble lord's, I must entreat the House to bear in mind that Mr. Pitt never lost sight of the obligation to preserve as well as to amend; that he proposed not to enforce any reluctant surrender; nor to sacrifice any other than voluntary victims on the altar of practical improvement.

The noble lord has cited other grave authorities in favour of his projected reform. Now, I hold in my hand an extract from a work which probably will be recognised, as I read it, but the title of which I will not disclose in the first instance. Hear the opinion of an eminent writer on the right of parliament to interfere with the elective franchise.—"As to cutting away the rotten boroughs, I am as much offended as any man, at seeing so many of them under the direct influence of the Crown, or at the disposal of private persons. Yet I own I have both doubts and apprehensions in regard to the remedy you propose. I shall be charged, perhaps, with an unusual want of political intrepidity, when I honestly confess to you, that I am startled at the idea of so extensive an amputation. In the first place, I question the power de jure of the legislature, to disfranchise a number of boroughs, upon the general ground of improving the constitution."—"I consider it as equivalent to robbing the parties concerned of their freehold, of their birth-right. I say, that although this birth-right may be forfeited, or the exercise of it suspended in particular cases, it cannot be taken away by a general law, for any real or pretended purpose of improving the constitution."—Is it from sir Robert Filmer—is it from the works of some blind, servile, bigotted, Tory writer, that I quote the passage which I have now read? No; it is from an author whose name, indeed, I am not enabled to declare, but the shadow of whose name is inseparably connected, in our minds, with an ardent if not intemperate zeal in the cause of political freedom. It is Junius, who thus expresses his fears on the subject of interfering with the existing franchises of election, even for the purpose of effecting what he deems, with the noble lord, a beneficial change in the construction of the House of Commons.

The plan devised by Mr. Pitt, and the sentiments of this celebrated writer, equally furnish a contrast to the proposition of the noble lord; which is in effect forcibly, to take away the elective franchise from one body of the people for the purpose of giving it to another: and to inflict forfeiture without guilt and without compensation.

But, even if I, and others who think like me, could be won over to this plan, by its vaunted moderation—by the circumstance of its going only half the length of the more sweeping reform deprecated by Junius—it does much surprise me that the noble lord should imagine that such half-measures would appear satisfactory to reformers. Surely, surely, that class of persons upon whom the noble lord reckons for support, and whom he considers as having of late so greatly increased in numbers look for a very different measure of alteration, from that which seems to bound the noble lord's present intentions. How happens it, for instance, that the noble lord, notwithstanding the accuracy of research with which he has apparently studied the subject in all its parts, has omitted any mention of Burgage tenures? He cannot but know that it is against that species of election that the popular clamour has been most loudly directed. Yet, amidst all the noble lord's enumeration of rights and modes of election, of freehold and copyhold, of large towns, and small towns, and counties, and villages, the words "Burgage Tenure," have never once escaped his lips! Does the noble lord mean to take away Burgage tenure, or does he not? If he does not, I will so far most cordially join with him; but let not the noble lord, in that case, expect the support of those reformers with whom he has recently allied himself. If he intends to pursue a double or a doubtful course; if he proposes to mitigate his violation of franchise in the hands of the present holders by taking only half away, and hopes by giving only half, to propitiate the new acquirers—it may be very presumptuous in me to pronounce an opinion upon a scheme which the noble lord must no doubt have turned and viewed in every light before he made up his mind to adopt it—but I do venture to opine, that in thus endeavouring to keep terms with both parties, he will in the end satisfy neither. The one will be as little contented with what is granted to them, as the other will be reconciled to what they lose. Needs there any further argument to show that whatever may be the feasibility of other plans of reform, this of the noble lord is one which cannot possibly be useful to any purpose, because it cannot be palatable to any party?

It being plain then to demonstration that the noble lord's plan cannot succeed, the House must prepare itself, if his first resolution should be carried, to enter immediately upon the discussion of a variety of schemes; upon a concurrence of opinions in favour of any one of which, it would be vain to speculate. Plan will follow plan; all unlike each other in every respect, except in their tendency to destroy the present frame of the constitution. It is affirmed, indeed, that a great change has lately taken place in the public mind; that the sentiment in favour of reform is diffused more widely, while the violence and exaggeration of that sentiment in particular minds is much abated; that more people wish for a reform; but that there is a greater disposition to be satisfied with a moderate one:—that in proportion as a practical alteration has become more generally desired, the wild and visionary theories heretofore prevailing, have been relinquished and discountenanced. This may possibly be so; but on what ground am I to rest my belief of it? I have seen nothing in the course of the last two years, during which the noble lord on the floor (Folkstone) has been meditating on my speech at Liverpool, to lead me to think that those who two years ago entertained wild and visionary notions of reform have since relinquished them. If my speech was, as the noble lord declares, calculated only to make proselytes to the persuasion that the present House of Commons is inadequate to the discharge of its functions, and if such be in consequence the views which that noble lord has adopted, how can he entertain the notion that the small alterations proposed by the noble mover will satisfy genuine reformers? Let him be assured that he must go far deeper into democracy before he can hope to satisfy the cravings of reform; nay, without the hope of satisfying them—though the constitution may be sacrificed in the experiment.

Sir, if the House looks only to the various plans of reform which have at different times been laid upon its table, not by visionary speculatists, but by able and enlightened men, some of the ornaments of this and the other House of Parliament, how faint and flat is the noble mover's present plan in comparison with them? Let us take for example that one of the plans which had the greatest concurrence of opinions, and the greatest weight of authority in its favour. A petition was presented to this House in 1793, which may perhaps be considered as the most advised and authentic exposition of the principles of parliamentary reform, that ever has been submitted to the consideration of this House or of the public. Those principles are developed by the petitioners, with singular clearness and force, and expressed in admirable language. It was presented in 1793, by a noble person, now one of the chief lights of the other House of Parliament, as the petition of the "Friends of the People, associated for the purpose of obtaining a Reform in Parliament." In that petition, certain distinct propositions are laid down as the basis of a reform, which, to my recollection, have never yet been disclaimed, either on the part of the petitioners, or of those who have succeeded them in the same pursuit. The petitioners complain, in the first place, that there is not an uniform right of voting;—secondly, that the right of voting is in too small bodies;—thirdly, that many great bodies are excluded from voting;—and, fourthly, they complain of the protracted duration of parliaments.* Does the noble lord believe that all these notions are forgotten? that no persons still cherish them as the only means of effecting the salvation of the country?—or, does he subscribe to them all, although he may not think this the time for pressing them upon the House?

For my part, Sir, I value the system of parliamentary representation, for that very want of uniformity which is complained of in this petition; for the variety of rights of election. I conceive, that to establish one uniform right would inevitably be, to exclude some important interests from the advantage of being represented in this House. At all events the noble lord's plan does not cure this objection. The rights of voting would remain as various after the adoption of his plan, as before; and a new variety would be added to them. Even of burgage tenures, the most obnoxious right of all, and the most indignantly reprobated by the petition of 1793, the noble lord would carefully preserve the principle—only curtailing, by one-half, its operation.

* See Parl. Hist. v. 30, p. 789.

It must be admitted that this alleged defect of variety in rights of voting, was much more directly dealt with by the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Lambton), in the last session; when he brought forward, with great ability, and with the utmost temper and moderation, his specific plan of reform.* That hon. gentleman proposed to treat the constitution of the House of Commons as a rasa tabula, and to reconstruct the system of representation altogether upon an uniform plan—abating without scruple every right and interest that stood in his way. His plan differed as materially from that of the noble lord, as the noble lord's differs from that of Mr. Pitt, and from the project of 1793. I do not mean to say—(I shall not be so misunderstood, I trust) that I approved therefore, of the hon. member for Durham's plan; or thought it either practicable or tolerable. Certainly, no conqueror of an invaded country ever parcelled out with a more unsparing hand, the franchises and properties of individuals and communities. But that plan had at least one merit which the noble lord's has not: it cured the alleged evil of diversified rights, and tended to produce the desired uniformity of representation.

Then, Sir, as to the duration of parliament. Triennial parliaments, it is averred by the petitioners of 1793, would be greatly preferable to septennial. The House would become a more express image of its constituents, by being more frequently sent back to them for election; deriving like the giant of old, fresh vigour from every fresh contact with its parent earth. But the noble lord, if I understand him rightly, admits that this particular reform would be rather an aggravation of inconveniences—other defects in the constitution remaining unchanged. Nothing indeed can be more clear than this proposition. One of the main objections to close representation, at present, is, the advantage which the member for a close borough has over one chosen by a popular election. The dissolution of parliament sends the popular representative back to a real and formidable trial at the bar of his constituents. For the representative of a close borough there is no trial at all; he sits still, and is returned without any struggle or inquiry. It is obvious that the proportion of this comparative disadvantage must be aggravated by every repetition of a general election.

But further. What is the original sin of septennial parliaments? Why, that the Septennial bill was a violent measure. Granted: it was so. But this allegation, however just, applies only to one enactment of the act, not to its general policy. The violence of the Septennial act did not consist in the prolongation of the duration of parliaments in time to come: for to do that, the supreme authority of the state was undoubtedly as competent, as it was to shorten the duration of parliaments by the Triennial act, some twenty years before. The violence consisted in prolonging the duration of the then existing parliament—in extending to seven years, a trust confided but for three. This, and this alone, is the questionable part of that act—questionable, I mean, as to right. I will not now enquire how far the political necessities of the time justified so strong an act of power. It is quite enough, for any practical purpose, that the evil, whatever it was, is irremediable; that its effect is gone by; that the repeal of the Septennial act now cannot undo it; and that, therefore, how grave soever the charge against the framers of the act might, be for the arbitrary injustice of its immediate operation (a question, into the discussion of which I have said I will not enter), the repeal of it would have no tendency to cure the vice of that enactment which has given the Septennial act its ill name; but would only get rid of that part of it which is blameless at least, if not (as I confess I think it) beneficial in its operation. But however much the duration of parliaments may be entitled to a separate discussion, it is not to that point that the noble lord has called our attention to night. A change in the constitution of the House of Commons, is the object of the noble lord's motion.

That such a change is necessary, the noble lord asserts—and I deny. I deny altogether the existence of any such practical defect in the present constitution of this House, as requires the adoption of so fearful an experiment. The noble lord has attempted to show the necessity of such a change by enumerating certain questions on which this House has, on sundry occasions, decided against the noble mover's opinion, and against the politics and interests of that party in the state, of which the noble mover is so conspicuous an ornament. But if such considerations be sufficient to unsettle an ancient and established form of political constitution, how could any constitution—any free constitution—exist for six months? While human nature continues the same—the like divisions will arise in every free state; the like conflict of interests and opinions; the like rivalry for office; the like contention for power. A popular assembly always has been and always will be exposed to the operation of a party-feeling, arraying its elements and influencing its decisions;—in modern as in ancient times; in Great Britain, in this our day, as heretofore in Athens or in Rome. No imaginable alteration in the mode of election can eradicate this vice—if it be a vice;—or can extinguish that feeling, be it good or bad, which mixes itself largely in every debate upon the public affairs of a nation—the feeling of affection or disfavour towards the person in whose hands is the conduct of those affairs. I am not saying that this is a proper and laudable feeling: I am not contending that partiality ought to influence judgment; still less that when judgment and partiality are at variance, the latter ought, in strict duty, to preponderate. I am not affirming that in the discussion of the question —"What has been done?"—the question —"Who did it?"—ought silently to dictate or even to modify, the answer;—that the case should be nothing, and the men every thing. I say no such thing. But I do say, that while men are men, popular assemblies, get them together how you will, will be liable to such influence. I say that in discussing in a popular assembly the particular acts of a government, the consideration of the general character of that government, and the conflicting partialities which lead some men to favour it, and others to aim at its subversion, will, sometimes openly and avowedly, at other times insensibly even to the disputants themselves, control opinions and votes, and correct, or pervert (as it may be) the specific decision. I say that, for instance, in the discussion upon the Walcheren expedition, which has been more than once selected as an example of undue influence and partiality, there was notoriously another point at issue beside the specific merits of the case; and that point was—whether the then administration should or should not be dismissed from the service of their country? Never, perhaps, was the struggle pushed farther than on that occasion; and that vote substantially decided the question "in what hands should be placed the administration of affairs." I am not saying that this was right in the particular instance—I am not saying that it is right in principle. But right or wrong, such a mode of thinking and acting, is, I am afraid, essentially in the very nature of all popular governments; and most particularly so in that of the most free.

The noble lord has himself stated that in the instance of the Revolution the parliament did wisely in setting at nought the immediate feelings of its constituents. There cannot indeed be the slightest doubt that had the nation been polled in 1688, the majority would have been found adverse to the change that was then effected in the government: but parliament, acting in its higher and larger capacity, decided for the people's interests against their prejudices. It is not true, therefore, that the House of Commons is necessarily defective, because it may not instantly respond to every impression of the people.

In the year 1811, I myself divided in a minority of about forty against an overwhelming majority, on the question relating to the depreciation of the currency. It would be idle to deny that the majority, which sturdily denied the fact of that depreciation, then spoke the sentiments of the country at large; they certainly did so; but who will now affirm that it would have been a misfortune if the then prevailing sense of the country had been less faithfully represented in the votes of this House? What a world of error and inconvenience should we have avoided, by a salutary discrepancy, at that time, between the constituent and the representative! Eight years afterwards, but unluckily after eight years' additional growth of embarrassment—in 1819, the principles which had found but about forty supporters in 1811, were adopted unanimously, first by a committee of this House, and then by this House itself. But the country was much slower in coming back from the erroneous opinions which the decision of this House in 1811 had adopted and confirmed. In 1819, as in 1811, if London and the other principal towns of the kingdom had been canvassed for an opinion, the prevailing opinion would still have been found nearly what it was in 1811. Yet is it necessary to argue that the decision of the House in 1819 against the opinion of the country, was a sounder and wiser decision than that of 1811 in conformity to it? Never then can I consider it as a true proposition that the state of the representation is deficient, because it does not immediately speak the apparent sense of the people—because it sometimes contradicts, and sometimes goes before it. The House, as well as the people, are liable to err; but that the House may happen to differ in opinion from the people, is no infallible mark of error. And it would, in my opinion be a base and cowardly House of Commons, unworthy of the large and liberal confidence without which it must be incompetent to the discharge of its high functions, which having, after due deliberation, adopted a great public measure, should be frightened back into an acquiescence with the temporary excitement which might exist upon that measure out of doors.

Upon another great question which I have much at heart, I mean the Roman Catholic question, I have not the slightest doubt that the House has run before the sense of the country; which is now, however, gradually coming up to us. I have no doubt that in all our early votes on this most important question, we had not the country with us; but I am equally confident that the period is rapidly advancing, when the country will be convinced that the House of Commons has acted as they ought to have done. If on such questions as these—questions before which almost all others sink into insignificance—the House of Commons have been either against, or before, the opinions of the country, the proposition that the representative system is necessarily imperfect because it does not give an immediate echo to the sentiments of the people, is surely not to be received without abundant qualification. On this ground, therefore, there is no foundation for the noble lord's motion; unless the free expression of an honest and conscientious opinion, when it may happen to differ from that of its constituents, be inconsistent with the duty and derogatory to the character of a representative assembly.

To return to the other noble lord (Folkestone), who has no sooner renounced his former faith and adopted a new one, than he seats himself in the confessional chair, and calls upon me for my recantation;—that noble lord has desired me to explain and defend the proposition which I have heretofore laid down, that those who wish to reform the House of Commons must intend to reform it upon one of two principles:—either to construct it anew, or to bring it back to the state at which it existed at some former period. Before I consent to be thus catechised by the noble lord, I might reasonably ask him in what third sense the word reform can be understood—except that in which it is sometimes applied to a military corps; which means to disband and cashier it altogether? Short of that mode of disposing of the House of Commons (for which I presume the noble lord is not yet altogether prepared) there is, so far as I know, or can conceive (until the noble lord shall further enlighten me), no other way in which a reform can take place, than those which I have specified. Between those two modes then, I must still desire the noble lord to make his choice. If his choice be another construction—a totally new scheme of House of Commons—is it unreasonable in me that, before I pin my faith upon that of the noble convert, I desire to behold that beau idéal—that imaged perfection of political good by which his reason is fascinated, and which his inventive fancy has pictured to him as the standard of parliamentary purity? If the second of my proposed alternatives, be that which the noble lord prefers, the inquiry that I have then to make of him is merely historical; and surely he can be at no loss for an immediate answer to it—what is the golden era at which the House of Commons was precisely what you would have it?

Simple, however, as this latter question is, I have never yet met with the reformer, who did not endeavour to evade it. I must endeavour, therefore, to collect the best answers that I can from such partial indications of opinion as are scattered up and down among the general arguments for reform. Some theorists are fond of tracing back the constitution to the twilight times of history, where all that can be clearly discovered is, that when a parliament met, it usually set about a fortnight, granted a subsidy or two, and was forthwith dissolved. It is not to this infancy of our institutions that any one will soberly refer, for the likeness of such a House of Commons as would be competent, in the present age, to transact the business of the country and to maintain its due importance in the constitution. But, the House gradually attained a more matured existence; it has grown into a co-ordinate, and is now the preponderant element of the constitution. If the House has thus increased in power, is it, therefore, necessary that it should also become more popular in its formation? I should say—just the reverse. If it were to add to its real active governing influence, such an exclusively popular character and tone of action as would arise from the consciousness that it was the immediately deputed agent for the whole people, and the exclusive organ of their will—the House of Commons, instead of enjoying one-third part of the power of the state, would, in a little time, absorb the whole. How could the House of Lords, a mere assembly of individuals however privileged, and representing only themselves, presume to counteract the decisions of the delegates of the people? How could the Crown itself, holding its power as I should say, for the people, but deriving it altogether as others would contend, from the people—presume to counteract, or hesitate implicitly to obey, the supreme authority of the nation assembled within these walls?—I fear the noble lord (Folkestone) is not prepared to answer these questions. I do not presume to say, that they are unanswerable; but I affirm that, since they were propounded in my obnoxious speech at Liverpool, they have yet received no answer here or elsewhere. In truth, they admit of no other answer than one which I happen to have fallen upon within these few days, in the report of a debate on parliamentary reform which took place about thirty years ago; and for which, in the absence of any answer of his own, the noble lord will undoubtedly be very thankful. It is in these words:—"It has been said, that a House of Commons, so chosen as to be a complete representative of the people, would be too powerful for the House of Lords, and even for the king: they would abolish the one, and dismiss the other. If the king and the House of Lords are unnecessary and useless branches of the constitution, let them be dismissed and abolished: for the people were not made for them, but they for the people. If, on the contrary, the king and the House of Lords are felt and believed by the people to be not only useful but essential parts of the constitution, a House of Commons freely chosen by and speaking the sentiments of the people, would cherish and protect both, within the bounds which the constitution had assigned to them*." These are reported to have been the words of a man, the lustre of whose reputation will survive through distant ages, and of whom I can never intend to speak but with feelings of respect and admiration: they are the words of Mr. Fox. That the report is accurate to a letter, I am not entitled to contend; but the substance of an argument so strikingly important, cannot have been essentially misapprehended. I quote these words with the freedom of history; not with the design of imputing blame to the speaker of them, but because they contain a frank solution (according with the frankness of his character) of the difficulty with which, in these days, I have not found any one hardy enough to grapple. So then—a House of Commons freely chosen by the people, would, it seems, "cherish and protect" the House of Lords and the Crown, so long as they respectively kept within the bounds allotted to them by the constitution. Indeed! cherish and protect!—but cherish and protect, if so and so:—and how, if not so and so?—How, if the House of Commons in its reformed character, should happen to entertain a different opinion with respect to the "bounds" to be allotted to the Crown and to the Lords, under the new constitution? What would then be substituted for cherishment and protection?—A fearful question! but a question which must be answered, and much more satisfactorily than I can anticipate, before I can consent to exchange that equality and coordination of powers among the three branches of our present constitution, in which its beauty, its strengh, its stability, and the happiness of those who live under it, consist—for a constitution in which two of those powers should confessedly depend for their separate existence on the disposition of the third to "cherish and protect" them. This new constitution might be very admirable: but it is not the constitution under which I live; it is not the constitution to which I owe allegiance; it is not the constitution which I would wish to introduce; and in order not to introduce a constitution of this nature, I must not consent to the reform of the House of Commons.

* Parliamentary History, vol. 30, p. 921.

If this House is adequate to the functions which really belong to it—which functions are, not to exercise an undivided, supreme dominion, in the name of the people, over the Crown and the other branch of the legislature—but, checking the one and balancing the other, to watch over the people's rights, and to provide especially for the people's interests: if, I say, the House is adequate to the performance of these its legitimate functions, the mode of its composition appears to me a consideration of secondary importance. I am aware that, by stating this opinion so plainly, I run the risk of exciting a cry against myself; but it is my deliberate opinion, and I am not afraid to declare it. Persons may look with a critical and microscopic eye into bodies physical or moral, until doubts arise whether it is possible for them to perform their assigned functions. Man himself is said by inspired authority to be "fearfully" as well as "wonderfully made." The study of anatomy, while it leads to the most beneficial discoveries for the detection and cure of physical disease, has yet a tendency, in some minds, rather to degrade than to exalt the opinion of human nature. It appears surprising to the contemplator of a skeleton of the human form, that the eyeless skull, the sapless bones, the assemblage of sinews and cartilages, in which intellect and volition have ceased to reside—that this piece of mechanism should constitute a creature so noble in reason, so infinite in faculties, in apprehension so like a God; a creature formed after the image of the Divinity—to whom Providence

> "Os—sublime dedit: cœlumque tueri
> "Jussit, et erectos ad sidera tollere vultus."

So, in considering too curiously the composition of this House, and the different processes through which it is composed—not those processes alone which are emphatically considered as pollution and corruption, but those also which rank among the noblest exercises of personal freedom—the canvasses, the conflicts, the controversies, and (what is inseparable from these) the vituperations, and excesses of popular election—a dissector of political constitutions might well be surprised to behold the product of such elements in an assembly—of which, whatever may be its other characteristics, no man will seriously deny that it comprehends as much of intellectual ability and of moral integrity as was ever brought together in the civilized world. Nay, to an unlearned spectator, undertaking for the first time an anatomical examination of the House of Commons, those parts of it which, according to theory, are its beauties, must appear most particularly its stains. For while the members returned for burgage-tenure seats, or through other obscure and noiseless modes of election, pass into the House of Commons unnoticed and uncriticised, their talents unquestioned, and their reputations unassailed; — the successful candidate of a popular election often comes there loaded with the imputation of every vice and crime that could unfit a man, not only for representing any class of persons, but for mixing with them as a member of society. The first effect of a reform which should convert all elections into popular ones, would probably be, to ensure a congregation of individuals, against every one of whom a respectable minority of his constituents would have pronounced sentence of condemnation. And if it be so very hard that there are now a great number of persons who do not directly exercise the elective franchise, and who are therefore represented by persons whom others have chosen for them; — would this matter be much mended when two-fifths of the people of England should be represented not only without their choice, but against their will; not only by individuals whom they had not selected, but by those whom they had declared utterly unworthy of their confidence?

Again;—should we have no cause to lament the disfranchisement of those boroughs which are not open to popular influence? How many of the gentlemen who sit opposite to me, the rarest talents of their party, owe their seats to the existence of such boroughs? When I consider the eminent qualities which distinguish, for instance, the representatives of Knaresborough, Winchelsea, Wareham, Higham-Ferrers, I never can consent to join in the reprobation cast upon a system which fructifies in produce of so admirable a kind. No, Sir, if this House is not all that theory could wish it, I would rather rest satisfied with its present state, than by endeavouring to remedy some small defects, run the hazard of losing so much that is excellent. Old Sarum, and other boroughs, at which the finger of scorn is pointed, are not more under private patronage now than at the periods the most glorious in our history. Some of them are still in the possession of the descendants of the same patrons who held them at the period of the Revolution. Yet in spite of Old Sarum, the Revolution was accomplished, and the house of Hanover seated on the throne. In spite of Old Sarum did I say? No: rather by the aid of Old Sarum and similar boroughs; for the House has heard it admitted by the noble mover himself, that if the House of Commons of that day had been a reformed House of Commons, the benefits of the Revolution would never have been obtained.

The noble lord, in his opening speech, made some allusion to the constitutional history of ancient Rome, and called upon my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Bankes) as the most recent historian of that republic, to vouch for his facts, and for the application of them. Let me follow the noble lord into his Roman history, to ask him a single question. How was the senate of Rome composed?—I doubt whether even my hon. friend opposite can inform us. All that is certainly known on the subject is, that one and by far the most usual way of gaining admission to the senate—(this has not a very reforming sound)—was through office. Yet that senate dictated to the world, and adequately represented the majesty of the Roman people. History blazons its deeds; while antiquarianism is poring into its pedigree.

But have the defects imputed to the composition and constitution of the House of Commons increased with time? are they grown more numerous or more unsightly? I believe the contrary. I believe, Sir, that in whatever period of our history the composition and constitution of the House of Commons are examined, not only will the same alleged abuses as are now complained of be found to have prevailed; but I will venture to say, prevailed in a degree which could not be now avowed in debate without a violation of our orders. There is great difficulty in speaking on this delicate part of the subject. It has been made an article of reproach by the reformers, that the enemies of reform treat these matters with shameless indifference; that we now speak with levity of transactions the bare mention of which, according to the dictum of once the highest authority in this House, was calculated to make our ancestors perform certain evolutions in their graves.

Now it is very hard that the want of shame should be imputed to those who are upon the defensive side of the argument. They who attack, scruple not to advance charges of gross corruption in the grossest terms; and they who defend are reduced to the alternative either of affecting to be ignorant of the nature of those charges, or of admitting notorious facts, and accounting for or extenuating them; and if they take the latter course, they are accused of shamelessness. Be that as it may, however, it may be curious, and perhaps consolatory, to show to the moralists who are so sensitive upon these subjects, that corruption—as they call it—that (in plain words) influence in the return of members to parliament, if it be a sin, is not one for which their own generation is exclusively responsible. The taint, if it be one, is not newly acquired, but inherited through a long line of ancestors. The purge, or the cautery, may be applied to the present generation; but I can show that the original malady is at least as old as the reign of Henry 6th—a period beyond which the most retrospective antiquary will not require of us to go back in search of purity of election.

Sir, in the reign of Henry 6th the duchess of Norfolk thus instructed her agent as to the election of members for the county of Norfolk:—"Right trusty and well beloved, we greet you heartily well; and forasmuch as it is thought right necessary, for diverse causes, that my lord have at this time in the parliament such persons as belong unto him, and be of his menial servants—we heartily desire and pray you, that at the contemplation of these our letters, ye will give and apply your voice unto our right well beloved cousin and servants John Howard, and sir Roger Chamberlayn to be knights of the shire. Framlingham Castle, this 8th day of June, 1455."

What follows probably related to the same election; it is addressed (by lord Oxenford) to the same individual as the preceding extract. "My lord of Norfolk met with my lord of York at Bury on Thursday, and there [they] were together till Friday, nine of the clock, and then they departed; and there a gentleman of my lord of York took unto a yeoman of mine, John Deye, a token and a sedell (schedule) of my lord's intent, whom he would have knights of the shire, and I send you a sedell inclosed of their names in this letter; wherefore methinketh it [were] well done to perform my lord's intent.*

The next extract which I shall read to the House is of seventeen years later date than the preceding ones. It is from a letter addressed by one of the duchess of Norfolk's household, to the bailiff of the borough of Maldon; and is dated in the year 1472, the 11th of Edward 4th: "It were necessary for my lady and you all (her servants and tenants) to have in this parliament as for one of the burgesses of the town of Maldon, such a man of worship and of wit as were towards my said lady; and also such one as is in favour of the king and of the lords of his council nigh about his person; certifying you, that my lady for her part, and such as be of her council, be most agreeable that all such as be her farmers and tenants and well-willers, should give your voice to a worshipful knight and one of my lady's council, sir John Paston, which stands greatly in favour with my lord Chamberlain; and what my said lord chamberlain may do with the king, and with all the lords of England, I trow it be not unknown to you."†

It appears from the following letter that the said member-elect for the borough of Maldon, sir John Paston, (to whom it is addressed) had expected to be nominated a knight of the shire; but that his patrons had ordered it otherwise;—"My lord of Norfolk and my lord of Suffolk were agreed, more than a fortnight ago, to have sir Robert Wyngfield, and sir Richard Harcourt; and that knew I not till Friday last past. I had sent, ere I went to Framlingham, to warn as many of your friends to be at Norwich as this Monday, to serve your interest, as I could; but when I came to Framlingham, and knew the appointment that was taken for the two knights, I sent warning again to as many as I might, to tarry at home; and yet there came to Norwich this day as many as their costs drew to 9*s.* 1½*d.* paid and reckoned by Peacock and Capron, and yet they did but break their fasts and departed."—"If ye miss to be burgess of Maldon, and my lord Chamberlain will, ye may be in another place; there be a dozen towns in England, that choose no Burgess, which ought to do it,"—(this will surely propitiate the reformers):—"ye may be set in for one of these towns, an if ye be befriended."*—Such was reform in those days!

In the reign of queen Elizabeth, the era to which, habitually and almost instinctively, the mind of Englishmen recurs for every thing that is glorious, I could shew the House, that the earl of Essex, her mighty favourite, dictated without scruple or reserve the returns to parliament, not only for the county of Stafford, but for every borough in the county. Unluckily I have not the documents at hand; but I can aver it on the most unquestionable authority.†

Passing over the reign of James 1st and his unfortunate successor,—and not dwelling upon the cavalier treatment which Cromwell bestowed upon his own purified and reformed House of Commons, I come to the reign of Charles 2nd; where I find, not amid scarce manuscripts and treasures of ancient lore, but published, in a hundred popular books, in sketches of biography and lessons for youth, the famous letter of that most famous woman Ann countess of Pembroke; who, amongst her other great titles and possessions, was undoubted patroness of the then, I presume, free and independent borough of Appleby. This great lady writes thus to sir Joseph Williamson, secretary of state to Charles 2nd, in answer to his suggestion of a member for the borough of Appleby. "I have been bullied by an usurper; I have been ill treated by a court; but I won't be dictated to by a subject; your man sha'nt stand.—Anne Countess of Dorset, Pembroke, and Montgomery."

Now, Sir, I should be curious to know which generation of our ancestors it is, that the exercise of political influence in the

† Among the documents alluded to in this passage are the following letters from Robert Devereux, earl of Essex, to Richard Bagot, esq. high sheriff of the county of Stafford; of which the originals are in the possession of lord Bagot.

1. Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex, to Richard Bagot, Esq.—"After my verie hartie comendacions; I cannot write severall letters to all those that have interests in the choyse of the knights of the shere, to be apoynted for the parliament intended to be held verie shortlie. To which place I do exceedingly desire that my verie good friend, sir Christofer Blount may be elected.—I do therefore comend the matter to your friendlie sollicitacons; praying you to move the gentlemen, my good friends, and yours in that countie; particularly in my name, that they will give their voice with him for my sake; assuring them, that as they shall do it for one whome I hold deare, and whose sufficiencie for the place is well known to them; so, I will most thankfullie deserve towards them and yourselves any travell, favour, or kindeness, that shall be showed therein. Thus I commit you to God's good protection. From Hampton Court, the 2nd of January, 1592." "ESSEX."

"I persuade myself that my creditt is so good with my countrymen, as the using my name, in so small a matter, will be enough to effect it: But I pray you use me so kindlie in that as I have no repulse."

2. From the same to the same.—"After my verie hartie comendacions. As I have by my late letters comended unto you sir Christofer Blount to be elected one of the knights of that shire for the parliament to be holden verie shortlie, by your friendlie mediacion; so I do with no less earnestness intreate your like favoure towards my very good frend sir Thomas Sherrard, for the other place; praying you that you will employe your creditte, and use my name to all my good frends and yours, there, that they will stand faste to me in this requeste, and that my desire may be effected for them. They cannot give me better testimonie of their love and affection, because they are both such as I hold deare, and you may assure all such, as shall join with you in election that I will most thankfullie requite their readines, and furtherance them by any good office I can. So I comitte you to God's best protection; from Hampton Court, the 9th of January, 1592." "Your assured Friend," "ESSEX."

"I should think my credite little in my owne countrie, if it should not afford so small a matter as this. Expessalie the men being so fitt. Therefore I commend you all (as I have interest in your labours) effectuallie in it."

3. From the same to the same.—"After my verie hartie comendacions. I have written severall letters to Lichfield, Stafford, Tamworth, and Newcastle, for the nomination and election of certain burgesses of the parliament to be held verie shortlie. I have named unto them, for Lichfield, sir John Wyngfield and Mr. Boughton. For Stafford, my kinsman Henrie Bourgher and my servant Edward Reynolds. For Tamworth my servant Thomas Smith. For Newcastle Dr. James. Whome because I do greatlie desire to be preferred to the said places, I do earnestlie pray your furtherance, by the creditt which you have in those towns. Assuring them of my thankfulness if they shall, for my sake, gratifie those whom I have comended; and yourself that I will not be unmyndful of your curtesie therein. So I commit you to God's good protection. From Hampton-Court, the last of December, 1592. Your assured friend," "ESSEX."

"I send unto you the severall letters, which I praye you cause to be delivered according to their directions."

elections of the present day, so lamentably disquiets in their graves. Is it the cotemporaries of the duchess of Norfolk, and of the worthy electors of Maldon, who were to be careful to choose members so properly "towards" my lady?—or those who tasted the sweets of uninfluenced election under queen Elizabeth?—or those who contemplated with equal admiration the countess of Pembroke's defence of her castles against the forces of the usurper, and of her good borough of Appleby against secretary Williamson's nominee? Pity it is that the noble lord (Folkstone), the convert to reform, did not live in the days of one or other of these heroines! Their example could hardly have failed to reconvert him to his original native sentiments upon the subject of influence in elections and the fit constitution of a House of Commons.

But I have not yet done with my list of patronesses: nor has interference in elections, and female interference too, been coupled with no great name in the unquestioned good times of the constitution. The noble lord who made this motion will pardon me for referring him to the published letters of his great ancestress, the lady Russell; in which he will find the lord steward (the duke of Shrewsbury), and lord keeper Somers—tendering to her, for her son lord Tavistock, then a minor, the representation of the county of Middlesex, upon the single condition that lord Tavistock would consent but to show himself to the electors for one day under the name of lord Russell.* The offer was not accepted on account, so far as appears, of lord Tavistock's minority; though instances are adduced by the makers of the proposition to convince her ladyship that that need not be an objection. But what would be said now-a-days—and what would be the agitation of our buried ancestors—if a lord chancellor and a lord steward were to concur in offering a seat in parliament for a county to some young nobleman yet under age?†

Now here let me guard myself against misrepresentation. It must not be imputed to me that I am saying that all this was right: I am only saying that all this was so. I have been dealing (be it observed) with the second of my two questions:—not with the question, whether the House of Commons should be reconstructed?—but with the question whether it should be recalled to some state in which it formerly stood? I have been endeavouring to dispel the idle superstition that there once existed in this country a House of Commons, in the construction of which the faults that are attributed to the present House of Commons, and attributed to it as a motive for inflicting upon itself its own destruction, did not equally exist: and not only exist equally, but exist in wider extent and more undisguised enormity. I have been shewing that if the present House of Commons is to be destroyed for these faults, it has earned that fate not by degeneracy, but by imitation; that it would in such case expiate the misdeeds of its predecessors, instead of suffering for any that are peculiarly its own. I have been endeavouring to prove, that of the two options—"do you mean to restore?—or to construct anew?"—no reformer who has carefully examined the subject, can in sincerity answer otherwise than "to construct anew:"—for that to restore the times of purity of election—that is, of election free from the influence, and a preponderating influence too, of property, rank, station, and power, natural or acquired—would be, to restore a state of things of which we can find no prototype, and to revert to times which in truth have never been.

That the proposition "to construct anew" is the much more formidable proposition of the two, is tacitly admitted by the very unwillingness which is shewn on all occasions to acknowledge it as the object of any motion for reform. Yet to that must the reformers come. To that, I venture to tell the noble lord—he, with all his caution and all his desire to avoid extravagance and exaggeration, must come; if he consents to reform on principle. By reforming "on principle," I mean, reforming with a view not simply to the redress of any partial, practical grievance, but generally to theoretical improvement. I may add that even "on principle" his endeavours to reform will be utterly vain, if he insists upon the exclusion of influence, as an indispensable quality of his reformed constitution. Not in this country only, but in every country in which a popular elective assembly has formed part of the government, to exclude such influence from the elections, has been a task either not attempted, or attempted to no purpose. While we dam up one source of influence a dozen others will open; in proportion as the progress of civilization, the extension of commerce, and a hundred other circumstances better understood than defined, contribute to shift and change, in their relative proportions, the prevailing interests of society. Whether the House of Commons in its present shape does not practically, though silently, accommodate itself to such changes, with a pliancy almost as faithful as the nicest artifice could contrive, is, in my opinion, I confess, a much more important consideration, than whether the component parts of the House might be arranged with neater symmetry, or distributed in more scientific proportions.

* "At the general election which took place in October, 1695, it was proposed to her in the most flattering manner, by order of the duke of Shrewsbury, then lord steward, and the lord keeper Somers, to bring her son into parliament as member for the county of Middlesex."——"Life of Lady Russell," 8vo. p. 120.

† "It is to be remarked that in those early days of our renovated constitution, the objection of lord Tavistock's age was considered merely in relation to himself, and as no obstacle to the success of his election. Mr. Montague, in his letter to the duke of Bedford, to obviate any scruple in the duke's mind, mentions that lord Godolphin's son was to be chosen in Cornwall, and lord Leicester's in Kent, who were neither of them older than lord Tavistock: and Mr. Owen, in a letter to lady Russell, tells her the duke of Albemarle's son had been allowed to sit in parliament under age." Ibid, p. 123.

But am I, therefore, hostile to the reformation of any proved cases of abuse, or to the punishment of mal-practices by which the existing rights of election are occasionally violated? No such thing. When any such cases are pointed out and proved, far be it from me to wish that they should be passed over with impunity. When the noble mover himself brought forward, two years ago, a bill for transferring to other constituents, the right of election of a borough in which gross corruption had been practised, he began, as I thought and think, in the right course. When he proposed the disfranchisement of Grampound, I gave him my support; and if other cases of the same description occurred, I should be ready to do so again. That, Sir, is the true way of reforming the House of Commons: by adding strength to the representation where we can do so certainly and definitely, and without incurring a risk of evils greater than those we cure. In the principle of that proposition of the noble lord I concurred: and if I curred with those who suggested the substitution of the county of York for the town of Leeds, as the recipient of the franchise to be detached from Grampound. —I did so, not because I was apprehensive that Leeds would abuse the privilege; but because for the last forty years the want of a greater number of members for the county of York had been the standing grievance complained of in every petition for reform. "Shall the great county of York have no more members than the little county of Rutland?"—is the language of the petition of 1793. "Shall so great, and populous, and manufacturing a county, be no more numerously represented in the House of Commons than the borough of Shoreham, or Cricklade, or Midhurst, or finally than Old Sarum?"—are the apostrophes which have added zest to every debate, and a sting to every petition, from the year 1780 to the present day. Well! here was an opportunity of meeting this master-argument, and quieting for ever the perturbed solicitude for Yorkshire representation. I thought, therefore, that it would be a pity to lose such an opportunity;—the House fortunately was of the same opinion;—and lo! the grievance of grievances, the subject of forty years' clamour, is redressed. But, to be quite ingenuous, I will own that I was not without expectation that when the reformers had gained this point, they would find out that they had not gotten exactly what they wanted. So indeed it has happened. Since the bill passed, I have heard of no congratulations on the event; but I have heard of much regret, and of many fears lest great inconvenience should result from the measure to the county of York itself. This, to be sure, would be exceedingly to be deplored: and to remedy so unlucky a result of the first effort at reform, I understand that it is now in contemplation to bring in a bill for the purpose of dividing the county into two parts; assigning to one the old and to the other the new representation.—We shall see how this expedient will be relished. For my own part, I apprehend that every true Yorkshireman will object to it as a sort of converse of the judgment of Solomon; and that the two old members especially, will rush forward and implore that their ancient parent may be permitted to survive whole and unmutilated. In that case, I shall unquestionably oin them in the vote for keeping Yorkshire in undivided magnitude, with its augmented representation; affording, as it will do in that state, a conclusive reply to near half a century of remonstrances and lamentations.

I do not recollect in the speech of the noble mover any other topic on which I feel it necessary to remark; having already I think touched upon all the main principles, if not upon all the details and illustrations of his motion; and having, I am well aware, trespassed largely upon the indulgence of the House. A few words more upon the more general topics, which belong to this debate; and I have done. It is asked over and over again whether the House of Commons ought not to sympathize with the people? I answer, undoubtedly yes; and so the House of Commons at present does, finally and in the result. But I also maintain that this House does not betray its trust, if on points of gravity and difficulty, of deep and of lasting importance, it exercises a wary and independent discretion;—even though a momentary misunderstanding between the people and the House, should be created by such difference in opinion with the people. I do not believe that the change proposed by the noble lord would infuse into the House of Commons a more wholesome spirit. I do not believe that, to increase the power of the people, or rather to bring that power into more direct, immediate, and incessant operation upon the House,—(whether such effect should be produced by rendering elections more popular, or by shortening the duration of parliaments, or by both,)—I do not believe, I say, that this change would enable the House to discharge its functions more usefully than it discharges them at present. With respect to the plan of universal suffrage and annual parliaments, it seems to be pretty generally agreed, that it would deprive the government of all consistence and stability. Most of the advocates for reform disclaim these doctrines and resent the imputation of them. I am glad of it. But I confess myself at a loss to understand how any extension of suffrage on principle, how any shortening of parliaments on principle, can be adopted without opening the whole scope of that plan: and I confess myself not provided with any argument satisfactory to my own mind, by which, after conceding these alterations in principle I could hope to control them in degree. I am still more at a loss to conceive, in what way such partial concession could tend either to reconcile to the frame of the House of Commons those who are discontented with it as it at present stands, or to enable parliament to watch more effectually over the freedom, the happiness, and the political importance of the country.

Dreading therefore, the danger of total, and seeing the difficulties as well as the unprofitableness of partial alteration, I object to this first step towards a change in the constitution of the House of Commons. There are wild theories abroad. I am not disposed to impute an ill motive to any man who entertains them. I will believe such a man to be as sincere in his conviction of the possibility of realizing his notions of change without risking the tranquillity of the country, as I am sincere in my belief of their impracticability, and of the tremendous danger of attempting to carry them into effect. But for the sake of the world as well as for our own safety, let us be cautious and firm. Other nations, excited by the example of the liberty which this country has long possessed, have attempted to copy our constitution; and some of them have shot beyond it in the fierceness of their pursuit. I grudge not to other nations, that share of liberty which they may acquire: in the name of God, let them enjoy it! But let us warn them that they lose not the object of their desire by the very eagerness with which they attempt to grasp it. Inheritors and conservators of national freedom, let us, while others are seeking it in restlessness and trouble, be a steady and shining light to guide their course, not a wandering meteor to bewilder and mislead them.

Let it not be thought that this is an unfriendly or disheartening counsel to those who are either struggling under the pressure of harsh government, or exulting in the novelty of sudden emancipation. It is addressed much rather to those who, though cradled and educated amidst the sober blessings of the British constitution, pant for other schemes of liberty than those which that constitution sanctions, other than are compatible with a just equality of civil rights, or with the necessary restraints of social obligation;—of some of whom it may be said, in the language which Dryden puts into the mouth of one of the most extravagant of his

"They would be free as nature first made man,
"Ere the base laws of servitude began,
"When wild in woods the noble savage ran."

Noble and swelling sentiments! but such as cannot be reduced into practice. Grand ideas! but which must be qualified and adjusted by a compromise between the aspirings of individuals, and a due concern for the general tranquillity; must be subdued and chastened by reason and experience, before they can be directed to any useful end! A search after abstract perfection in government, may produce, in generous minds, an enterprise and enthusiasm to be recorded by the historian and to be celebrated by the poet: but such perfection is not an object of reasonable pursuit, because it is not one of possible attainment: And never yet did a passionate struggle after an absolutely unattainable object fail to be productive of misery to an individual, of madness and confusion to a people. As the inhabitants of those burning climates, which lie beneath a tropical sun, sigh for the coolness of the mountain and the grove; so (all history instructs us,) do nations which have basked for a time in the torrent blaze of an unmitigated liberty, too often call upon the shades of despotism, even of military despotism, to cover them,

— "O Quis me gelidis in vallibus Hæmi
"Sistat, et ingenti ramorum protegat umbrâ!"

a protection which blights while it shelters; which dwarfs the intellect, and stunts the energies of man, but to which a wearied nation willingly resorts from intolerable heats and from perpetual danger of convulsion.

Our lot is happily cast in the temperate zone of freedom: the clime best suited to the developement of the moral qualities of the human race; to the cultivation of their faculties, and to the security as well as the improvement of their virtues: a clime not exempt indeed from variations of the elements, but variations which purify while they agitate the atmosphere that we breathe. Let us be sensible of the advantages which it is our happiness to enjoy. Let us guard with pious gratitude the flame of genuine liberty, that fire from heaven, of which our constitution is the holy depository; —and let us not, for the chance of rendering it more intense and more radiant, impair its purity or hazard its extinction!

The noble lord is entitled to the acknowledgments of the House, for the candid, able, and ingenuous manner in which he has brought forward his motion. If, in the remarks which I have made upon it, there has been any thing which has borne the appearance of disrespect to him, I hope he will acquit me of having so intended it. That the noble lord will carry his motion this evening, I have no fear; but with the talents which he has shewn himself to possess, and with (I sincerely hope) a long and brilliant career of parliamentary distinction before him, he will, no doubt, renew his efforts hereafter. Although I presume not to expect that he will give any weight to observations or warnings of mine, yet on this, probably the last, opportunity which I shall have, of raising my voice on the question of parliamentary reform, while I conjure the House to pause before it consents to adopt the proposition of the noble lord— I cannot help conjuring the noble lord himself, to pause before he again presses it upon the country. If, however, he shall persevere—and if his perseverance shall be successful—and if the results of that success shall be such as I cannot help apprehending—his be the triumph to have precipitated those results—be mine the consolation that to the utmost, and the latest of my power, I have opposed them. [Loud cheers.]

Mr. Denman observed, that the whole of the right hon. gentleman's argument was founded in fallacy. He assumed that a quotation from a speech of Mr. Fox was correct, although it was most likely the reverse; and, upon that, he founded an argument against the expediency of a reformed House of Commons. After quoting several papers of rather ancient date, he at last brought some bombastic lines of Dryden to bear against the reformers. The hon. and learned gentleman then commented upon the observations which the right hon. gentleman had made upon the subject of the sympathy which existed between the House of Commons and the people, and contended, that the general conduct of the House was opposed to the wishes of the people. The right hon. gentleman had himself furnished some proofs of this; and he could produce another in the case of the late queen. He did not think that the House should blindly obey the wishes of the people, whether they were proper or not; but, in such a case as that to which he had last referred, when not only the whole mass of the people in this country, but the whole of Europe, were unanimous in condemning the proceedings which were instituted against her majesty, not to pay some deference to the wishes of their constituents, betrayed, on the part of the House, a contempt for public opinion which never ought to be exhibited in a free state. Dear as the emancipation of the Catholics was to every one who valued civil and religious liberty, he would not have it carried without the concurrence of the people. He believed the people approved of it. They ought not to dictate changes to that House; but the House ought to regard their disposition and temper. The judgment formed by posterity of the conduct of the House ought to be considered, and not the bias manifested by contemporaries. Let them now reflect what decision was irrevocably passed upon the measures of the House of Commons in former periods—upon the measures of those

what was now the settled judgment formed upon that most important question the American war? The House had then addressed the Crown by a large majority; and from some strange change, on which it would be now vain to speculate, they went up soon afterwards with an address of quite a contrary description. The present time confirmed the judgment of the opposition, and condemned the base acquiescence of the majority in every instance. But, the moral evil of the present system, independently of its effects, was itself quite dreadful. Could any thing be more disgusting than the shuffling answers, and the suspicious silence, of persons brought to their bar charged with corruption at elections? He knew not if human nature ever appeared baser than when persons stood at their bar with a knowledge of facts which it was their whole study to conceal by prevarication. Another view of human nature was indeed still lower—it was that presented by the members of that House who had been the means of all this corruption and perjury, and who sat wishing success to the most loathsome falsehoods. Was it not a dreadful evil to see persons sent to gaol for what they were compelled, and properly compelled, to declare before the committees? This foul and disgusting disease was no anatomical nicety. If the examinations before their committees were generally distributed and understood, the country would be still louder in demanding reform. If the evil were latent, it might be imprudent to reveal it; but that question was no longer open to doubt or cavil. The right hon. gentleman had ingeniously put it to the advocates of reform, to refer to the period when the representation had been such as they would now have it. Suppose there had been no such period, were they therefore precluded from reforming a flagrant and intolerable abuse? This question was not asked when a bill was brought in to reform any other abuse. The people of England had a right to be fairly, fully, and freely represented. Was it not a grievance to be remedied, that, in a season of distress, when hunger stimulated to sedition, the people should be left a prey to any demagogue who could point to the state of the representation, and the character of that House? It was, too, a most pernicious evil, both in a moral and political point of view, to see a species of consecration given to sacrifice of principle, dereliction of character, and venal barter of opinions. Corruption thus

"Mounts the tribunal, lifts her scarlet head,
"And sees pale Virtue carted in her stead."

What was that influence, which they heard openly avowed and defended, but, in plain, homely, intelligible language, that members of that House should be bribed by the possession of places to vote contrary to justice and public policy? The Cash Resumption bill of 1819 had been referred to. Let them refer to the imposition of new taxes in 1819, and say whether that was an act of wisdom for the interests of the people. But, the great evil was the preservation of useless places to enable gentlemen to vote against the people. It might be said that they approved of the measures which they supported; but if they did, it was an insult to say that they must be paid for supporting what they approved of. There was a degree of absurdity in gentlemen passing from one side to the other, and talking of purity of motives, as the right hon. gentleman who had spoken for himself had done. The disfranchisement of boroughs, as recommended by the right hon. gentleman, would never apply to the representatives of peers. The corruption of the House did, in fact, dispense with the exercise of the other two branches of the legislature, on the very ground of the right hon. gentleman. That House was become the influenced organ of every act of government, without the confidence of the public, and even without the respect of government; for a right hon. gentleman had told them last night, that he would set at naught the unanimous vote of that body. He was ashamed to have occupied so much of their time; but he could not refrain from offering a few observations in support of a motion which had his most hearty concurrence.

Mr. Peel merely rose to take some notice of an allusion which had been twice made, to an observation which had fallen from him last night. He did not rise to explain away or retract, but to repeat and uphold what he said with reference to the case of Mr. Hunt. He informed the House last night, that he had advised the Crown not to exercise what he considered the peculiar, exclusive, and almost sacred prerogative of mercy, in the case of Mr. Hunt. He had declared, at the same time, that if the House should determine unanimously to address the Crown in behalf of Mr. Hunt, he would not be the instrument for carrying such a recommendation into effect. This sentiment he now repeated. He did not use it as a menace. He felt himself called upon to make that declaration, from a conscientious conviction as to the merits of the case; and he should consider himself unworthy of the place he held, if any circumstances could induce him to become the instrument of carrying into effect a purpose which he felt to be inconsistent with his conscientious sense of duty.

After a short reply, the House divided: Ayes, 164; Noes, 269.

Monday, April 29.

Scarcity of Provisions in Ireland.] The Earl of Darnley expressed his surprise that no proposition had yet been submitted to the House respecting the state of Ireland. He did not now mean to enter into any discussion on the moral or political state of that country, but he thought himself bound to notice the great distress which, according to the best information, prevailed throughout Ireland. The noble earl opposite must be aware that there was an increasing distress in that country from the actual want of provisions. His object in mentioning this lamentable state of things was, to learn from the noble earl whether the attention of government had been called to the distress prevailing in Ireland, and whether any measures of relief had been adopted.

The Earl of Liverpool said, he had no hesitation in stating, that government had received information that distress for the want of provisions was great in some parts of Ireland. The subject, however, had not been overlooked by government, and measures, conformable to precedents established on former occasions and found sufficient, had been resorted to. With regard to the general question of relief in such cases, he must say, that nothing, except in extreme cases, could be more improper than the interference of government with the subsistence of the country. Such interference was far more likely to cause famine, than to give relief in times of difficulty. What ought to be done by the government with respect to the whole country might be illustrated by the reply made to a foreigner who expressed his surprise that so great a city as London should be so well supplied without any regulations. He was answered, that the reason of its being so well supplied, was precisely because there were no regulations for that purpose. The course to be followed in the present case was the same which had been adopted on former occasions. He appealed to the noble peers who had lately returned from Ireland, whether they were not satisfied, that whatever could be done to relieve the present distress, would be done, and was doing?

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, April 29.

Agricultural Distress.] Mr. Gooch presented a petition from several considerable land owners in Suffolk, complaining of agricultural distress. The petitioners prayed, that such a reduction of public expenditure might be effected as would justify a further reduction of taxation; but they expressed an apprehension, that no immediate relief could be derived from that source. He viewed with great dismay the distressed state of the agriculturists. A remission of taxation he knew would assist them; and as far as a reduction of establishment could enable that to be done, he would do it. He had felt it his duty to move in the last session, that some notice should be taken of the numerous agricultural petitions on the table of the House. In the committee which was appointed, he was nominated chairman, and he would not flinch from any of the responsibility that might attach to him on that account. It had been thought proper that that committee should be re-appointed this year; but he was sorry to say, that their report contained nothing satisfactory to the country. It proposed no measures calculated to afford immediate adequate relief. It should, however, be borne in mind how difficult it was to discover any such remedy for the present evils. The markets were glutted to the extreme, and corn must either be removed from the market, or more money must be brought into it for that purpose. A prohibitory duty on the importation of corn was what would be most beneficial to the farmer. When the ports were opened in 1820, by means of a fraud, 700,000 quarters of oats were admitted; and with an average consumption of 30,000,000 a-year, it was surprising the effect which that importation had in lowering the prices. He agreed in the system of duties, but not as to the quantum: the duties recommended by the report were not sufficient. This country could not maintain her station in Europe if its agriculture were allowed to sink. The petitioners, amongst other remedies, prayed for a reform in parliament. In this he did not agree with them, being satisfied that reform would not put one shilling into the pocket of the farmer.

Mr. Hume observed, that this was not the first time that the hon. member had expressed his anxiety to relieve the distress of the agriculturist. But in the numerous motions which had been made for the remission of taxes, and the reduction of expenditure, he did not recollect having had the pleasure of having the hon. member in the minority. What was the use, then, of presenting petitions of this kind, and talking about raising the price of corn, if he would not assist in lowering and abolisking useless establishments, in order to effect that which he acknowledged to be the only remedy? The only way to relieve the country was, to reduce the price of production, and to export the surplus corn to other countries. Up to the year 1760 or 1770, this was an exporting country. He hoped the hon. member, by his future conduct, would make up for his past omissions.

Mr. Coke presented a petition from the hundred of Earsham, in the county of Norfolk. He stated the distress in that part of the country to be such, that many farmers were quitting their farms, and giving up agricultural pursuits altogether. He believed most firmly that no relief was to be expected from the noble marquis who had so long managed that House and the country. This was the opinion of the petitioners, all of whom went further than formerly, and called for reform in that House as the only remedy for the existing distress. He agreed with them that the only perfect remedy for the evil was to be found in a reform in that House, and he hoped the example set by these petitioners would be followed by every hundred in the country. If this were done, it would be impossible for the government to resist the public voice. Ultimately, the public voice would make itself heard; but he feared that it would be in some other way than through the medium of that House. He complained of the manner in which the complaints of petitioners had hitherto been treated. Some years ago, on a petition being presented, the noble lord opposite had remarked on the "ignorant impatience of taxation" which prevailed. Perhaps similar language might be held on the present occasion; but, whatever might be said, it was most afflicting to see the county to which he belonged, and which was so closely identified with that noble science to which his life had been devoted, reduced by the burthens under which it laboured almost to a state of beggarry. Relief ought to be given without delay. No attention, however, was paid to the distresses of the petitioners. They complained of the distress which had fallen on them, and prayed for that protection to which the British farmer was entitled. They prayed for a reform in that House, and a system of fair and equal representation, of which property should be the basis. They demanded retrenchment in every department, and called for the reduction of sinecures, and all useless offices. The petition he presented with pleasure, as he was always gratified when his constituents called for reform in firm but constitutional language. In the hundred from which this petition came, there were but two magistrates, both of whom were clergymen. On the propriety of placing clergymen in such situations he offered some remarks, and commented on their conduct in withholding their sanction from the meeting at which this petition had been voted, and thus attempting to interpose an obstacle to the exercise of the right of petitioning.

Mr. Wodehouse said, that with respect to the report, he thought it right to say, that it had proved generally unsatisfactory to the country. It did not protect the farmer against the importation of foreign grain; but he had no hesitation in saying, that effectual relief could not be afforded till the great pressure of the public burthens had been mitigated. As the language he held was thought inconsistent with his conduct in some instances, he was anxious to explain his reasons for voting in favour of keeping up the sinking fund, and for opposing the repeal of the salt-tax. Whether in the present state of the country it was wise to preserve the sinking fund was certainly questionable. But he could not make up his mind to dispense with it: as it was difficult to calculate what effect this might produce on public credit. When the question on the salt-tax was brought forward, he had looked at the peculiar situation in which the government was placed. They had lost by the malt-tax, which had been given up, 2,000,000*l*. The repeal of the salt-tax would have taken from them another million; and this too at a time when the government was engaged in paying off the 5 per cents. Under these circumstances, he had not thought it right to vote against ministers on that occasion. He had now a few words to offer on what had fallen from his hon. colleague on the subject of the meeting at which this petition had been voted. He had alluded to the refusal of the magistrates to sanction it on the requisition being first proposed. After the language which had been held at some of the meetings he did not wonder at there being a reluctance on the part of the magistrates to comply with the requisition. He felt it incumbent on him to explain more particularly the situation in which the county had stood. They had unfortunately had two men executed in it, who, at the moment of their leaving the world, had declared, that the outrages which they had committed had no object but to frighten the farmers into increasing the allowances of those in their employ. The House might recollect that at the meeting in Surrey, lord King had held forth at some length on the merits of Mr. Cobbett. That speech had been printed in handbills, and circulated in Norfolk. Norfolk was held to be the best place to circulate this paper, because it was known that great distress prevailed there. Now, when a peer of the realm thought proper to bestow unqualified praise on a man, who, it was known, had no regard for the rights to property, he could not but think such conduct dangerous. In his opinion, it was most improper—most unkind to the country, and most unworthy of the situation which that noble lord held in society. He had been taunted with having voted last year, first against reducing the army by 10,000 men, and then against taking 5,000 from its numbers. Now, he looked back on the votes which he had given on those occasions with much satisfaction, and regretted the reduction which had taken place. If the effect of this reduction were properly explained to the public—if it were seen by them, that men who had been twenty years in the service of their country, were sent out again to rot in places where they ought not to have been called upon to serve any more, he thought the public would be inclined to say, "a fig for such retrenchment." When gentlemen were so fond of taunting others with inconsistencies, he must remind them of their own. After calling for the reduction of the army, when the first question of the present session was brought forward relating to Ireland, the first words uttered were, "Why not proclaim martial law?" To him there appeared no small inconsistency in declaring against a standing army, and then, on the first appearance of disturbances, of calling for martial law.

Mr. Bennet said, that he was present at the Surrey meeting alluded to, and would observe, that if lord King had not so spoken of Mr. Cobbett, he (Mr. B.) would have said, what he now declared, that Mr. Cobbett was entitled to the thanks of the country, for the able and clear manner in which he investigated many interesting subjects. But if lord King had thought proper to make such a statement, what right had the hon. member to condemn him in his absence? The opinion of the noble lord was as good as that of the hon. member. There was in that noble lord that quickness and acuteness of intellect which, while he was by birth a descendant of the great Locke, was a further proof of his claim to the honour of which he had so much reason to be proud.

Mr. Wodehouse said, he believed the words used by lord King with respect to Mr. Cobbett, were to the effect, "that he was the most able and intelligent writer of this or any former time, on political subjects." Mr. Cobbett had been a good deal in the county of Norfolk of late. His exertions during the last year had been directed to persuade the people of England that the farmers were the greatest brutes in nature. To hear such a man held up as an object of admiration was shocking; and therefore it was that he had made the observations which had fallen from him.

Ordered to lie on the table.

SCARCITY OF PROVISIONS IN IRELAND.] Sir E. O'Brien said, that before the House proceeded to the important business of the day, he wished to point out to the gentlemen around him, the very dreadful and calamitous situation to which a great portion of his countrymen were reduced. There were at that moment thousands of persons in Ireland, who, in consequence of the failure of the late potatoe crop, were reduced to a single meal a day, and that meal generally consisted of oatmeal and water. It was well known that, generally speaking, the whole population of the South of Ireland lived, during a great portion of the year, upon potatoes; but, during the last year, the incessant rains which prevailed, had totally decayed and destroyed that vegetable in the ground. At the late assizes in his county, the distressed state of the people was taken into consideration, and a representation of that distress was made to the lord lieutenant. He had no doubt of the benevolent intentions of the noble lord who now filled the office of lord lieutenant, but it was impossible to extend relief to that poor and suffering country, without the interference and aid of parliament. It was a lamentable fact, that at that moment the counties of Cork, Kerry, Limerick, Mayo, and Roscommon, in fact, the whole provinces of Munster and Connaught, were in a state of actual starvation. If the counties of Lancaster, or Warwick, or Stafford, were suffering as Ireland now was, what, he would ask, would be the feelings of that House? What were the people of that unfortunate country to do? How were they, deprived as they were of money, of any resource, to relieve themselves from the difficulties under which they laboured? He well remembered the situation in which Ireland was placed in 1817. Great as the distresses of the country were at that period, there was still a circulation of money, and a high price of corn, which afforded many openings of relief. But, what was the situation of the country now? There was scarcely a town in the south of Ireland; in which hundreds of strong, able-bodied men, were not to be seen walking about without any means of getting employment. The question for the consideration of the House was—what had produced this state of things? One-third of the respectable people of the county of Clare had been reduced to absolute distress; they had neither money nor means to relieve themselves. He was aware that there was plenty of corn in the market; but, what did that do towards relief, when the distressed parties had no money to buy? It was true that the gentry of the county were, in many instances, ready to co-operate with the magistrates in affording relief; but how was it possible for a few individuals to afford permanent relief to 150,000 men? In making this statement, he did not appear before the House as a mendicant on the part of his country. All he asked was, that government would make advances to relieve the present distresses of unfortunate Ireland. For these advances the county rates could be pledged, and the money might be laid out in repairing roads, or in such other manner as might be best calculated to afford relief. It was well known to many of his friends, that thousands were at that moment dying from famine in Ireland. He was most anxious to make this statement at the earliest period, with a view to draw the attention of government to it; for unless relief was promptly afforded, the unfortunate population must suffer the last stage of misery. A short time ago, potatoes, the principal food of the peasantry of Ireland, were sold at from one penny to three halfpence per stone; during this year they were sold at 6½*d.* per stone. And, while this general article of Irish consumption was so raised, oatmeal had also risen from 13*l.* to 15*l.* per ton. The hon. baronet, after pointing out with great feeling the other distresses under which the people of Ireland laboured, adverted to the fact of the poor people in Ireland being actually obliged to rob for their subsistence. He had himself been informed by the head police officer in his county, that if they were to commit all the persons who took provisions for their support, no gaol in the country could hold them; nay, farther, that the parties so arrested, if they could get their families around them, would think that they had made a happy exchange in getting into prison. The hon. baronet concluded by expressing a hope that parliament would take into its serious consideration the suffering state of Ireland.

Mr. Becher corroborated the hon. baronet's statement, and expressed his fear that, in a very short time, even the scanty subsistence now on hand would be altogether expended.

Mr. Goulburn expressed his surprise that the hon. baronet should have taken that premature opportunity of calling upon the House to enter into the consideration of the state of the peasantry in Ireland. He was the more surprised at this course, as the hon. baronet had been in daily communication with him upon the subject of this distress, and must have known that, if he had hitherto refrained from stating the views of the Irish government, it was not from any want of sympathy for the sufferers, nor from the slightest inclination to withhold whatever relief the government of Ireland could practically afford; but from a firm conviction, that the agitation of the subject would augment rather than alleviate the evils which the hon. baronet had so feelingly deplored. Supposing the distress to be as general in the south of Ireland as the hon. baronet had depicted it to be, and the condition of the resident gentry so reduced as to render them unable to mitigate the condition of their peasantry, to whom, the hon. baronet asked, but to the government, could the people look up for relief? The Irish government were, however, first bound to consider to what extent they had the means of administering relief; and the House might form some estimate of the probable amount which would be required generally from the government, to meet the demands likely to be made upon them, if they once took upon themselves the responsibility of subsisting the people, from this single fact, that the amount of relief claimed from the hon. baronet's county alone was for 400,000*l*. The government could not, he thought, be considered much to blame, if they paused at the outset, and forbore from hastily admitting a precedent, which would encourage a liability for a repetition of those demands from various quarters of the country. The case he believed, was really this—that, in some parts there was a great deficiency in a particular crop, which constituted the chief subsistence of the peasantry of Ireland. But, though the potatoe crops had, in many places suffered, yet in others there was an abundant supply of corn; and at the very time when the scarcity had enhanced the price of potatoes in the most distressed market, the price of oatmeal continued lower than it generally was, throughout the empire. The rise in the latter article was not for some time more than 2*s*. in the cwt., although he admitted the advance had increased to 12*s*. or 13*s*. during a part of the last week. In answer to the hon. baronet's inquiry, why the government had not sent down a commission to inquire into the extent of the distress, he had only to inform the House, what the hon. baronet previously knew, that Mr. Warburton, who came up to Dublin to communicate the opinions of the gentlemen of his county, was immediately charged by the lord lieutenant with a commission, to return and ascertain first, in a more detailed form, the degree of pressure which was apprehended; next, to what extent the gentlemen of the county could contribute to the relief of their peasantry; and that then it would remain for government to take into their consideration the measures of co-operation which they could administer. His letters from Dublin that day announced the return of Mr. Warburton; and that the lord lieutenant was then in a situation to decide how far government could afford any relief.

Sir E. O'Brien disclaimed imputing the slightest neglect to the Irish government, but repeated that he thought parliament alone capable of meeting the evil. He had no intention of throwing his countrymen upon Great Britain as paupers; but only asked an advance upon the county rates to enable them to provide for themselves by their own industry.

Agricultural Distress, and the Financial and other Measures for its Relief.] The House having resolved itself into a committee to consider farther of the Report of the Committee on the Agricultural Distress,

The Marquis of Londonderry rose and addressed the committee as follows:*

I rise, Sir, in conformity to my notice, to call the attention of the committee to the Report from the select committee appointed to inquire into the allegations of the several petitions presented to the House, in the last and present sessions of parliament, complaining of the distressed state of the Agriculture of the United Kingdom. Sir, I am sure that I should much disappoint the feelings and wishes of the House, if, before I proceed to explain the particular measures which I am about to propose, I did not call their attention to the question, out of which that Report has mainly sprung;—I mean, the severe distress of the agricultural interest, which has led to the presentation of so many petitions to parliament, in the last as well as in the present session, from the various bodies connected with it throughout the country. I am anxious to do so, as well for the purpose of expressing my own opinion on the nature and extent of the existing distress, as of giving some information to the committee, preparatory to a full statement of the course which his majesty's government mean to take on the subject; and I shall also communicate several further suggestions, as to the relief which it may be practicable to afford to the agricultural interest; and to which I did not advert, when I formerly had the honour to address the House on this important topic.

About ten weeks have elapsed since I last submitted my sentiments on this question; and, if I now thought I had taken, at that period, an inaccurate view of the general nature of the evil, or of the description of remedy of which it may be susceptible, there is nothing that would make me unwilling to come forward and acknowledge the error into which I had fallen. But, on the contrary, I must now declare, that the opinions which I had then formed appear to me, on the most deliberate reflection, to be substantially correct. I then stated, that I believed the question of distress might be considered as confined to the agricultural interest. I lamented the existence of that distress most deeply. I thought as seriously on the consequences of it as the hon. member for Norfolk himself can think. But, entertaining most sincerely that feeling, I nevertheless deemed it essential to bear in mind, that the general situation of the country, with the exception of what belonged to agriculture, might be regarded as prosperous. As far as I have since been informed, it unquestionably appears, that our manufactures and commerce are in a state of progressive prosperity; and I have the satisfaction to add, that the revenue continues to improve. Since I last addressed the House on this point, the amount of the quarter's revenue, as compared with the corresponding quarter of last year, has shown an increase of between 400,000*l.* and 500,000*l.*: and I have the satisfaction further to state, that the accounts, for three weeks, which have been made up since the last quarter day, exhibit an increase of 283,000*l.*, as compared with the corresponding period in the last year; so that it appears, that subsequently to the last quarter's account, which showed so much improvement, the revenue has gradually continued to increase, as compared with that of last year, at the rate of above 90,000*l.* a week. I do not adduce this fact as conclusive, but only as presumptive evidence of the improving condition of our manufactures and commerce; and it is consoling, when so much stress is laid, and very properly laid, on the present pressure upon agriculture, to be enabled to advert to a criterion which justifies us in presuming that, although a great and important interest of the country certainly suffers severely, that suffering is not so universally diffused as some persons seem to imagine.

As to the mode by which it might be practicable to relieve the agricultural distress, I then stated my opinion—an opinion to which I still adhere—that, according to the best information which I was enabled to procure, that distress arose chiefly from causes which were not within the reach of any legislative remedy, and was the result of various circumstances influencing the market; that it was occasioned by an excess of produce brought to that market; and that, until the supply adjusted itself to the demand, so as to afford a fair profit on the capital employed in agriculture, all attempts to correct the evil by legislation must prove abortive. I contended, and I now repeat, fortified considerably by the discussions which have since taken place on the subject, and more especially by the sanction and confirmation which the opinion I expressed has received in the able work which has recently been published by the hon. member for Portarlington (Mr. Ricardo), than whom it is impossible for the House on such questions to have higher authority;—that the remission of taxes, although highly desirable as a relief to the consumer generally, and to the agriculturists only in common with all other consumers, is not calculated to reach the disease in the shape of an effectual remedy.—I admitted, that it might act as a palliative, and as such be applied rather to soothe the feelings of those whom it concerned, than to relieve their actual wants; but I insisted that to hold it out as a remedy for the depression and distress of the corn market, was to practise one of the worst delusions that could possibly be imposed upon the country. And, Sir, I do now conscientiously believe, that the intelligent portion of the community, even amongst the farmers themselves, are convinced that, if the whole of our taxation could by possibility be relinquished, the necessary relief would not be thereby afforded to that most important branch of the national industry. At the same time I distinctly stated, that I considered it to be our duty to look at all the circumstances connected with the landed interest—in order to see if it were possible to devise any thing, which, though not a direct remedy, might nevertheless afford relief collaterally, and facilitate the efforts of individuals engaged in agriculture, by giving to them the means of advantageously employing capital; and I added, that in a country abounding in active exertion like this, it was impossible, by judiciously relieving any one branch of the national interests, not thereby to benefit the whole.

Sir, I then ventured to call the attention of the House to various measures, which seemed, in the opinion of his majesty's government, to deserve the serious consideration of parliament. Those measures naturally divided themselves into three classes; first, measures of a financial character;—secondly, such as are connected with the state of the currency of the country; and, thirdly, those calculated to relieve agriculture, as far as relief is to be found in advances to be made to the agriculturist, on adequate security. I now beg leave to recal the attention of the House to these particular measures, and to state the grounds on which his majesty's government are now prepared to act, with reference to each of the three great branches of the question which I have just described.

I will begin with that class to which I last adverted; and consider how far any pecuniary advances which the House may think it desirable to sanction, can be rendered available to the diminution of agricultural distress. When I formerly addressed the House on this subject, I stated the reasons why, after the fullest deliberation on the part of his majesty's government, it did not appear to them that it would be practicable or advantageous as a system of relief, to advance any sums by way of mortgage; or that in point of fact any effectual relief could be afforded, by such a course of proceeding as that of advancing money either on the landed property of the agriculturist, or on his own personal security. I stated, however, that there was another measure, by which we might facilitate the general object we had in view; and that was, the making certain advances to parishes on the security of the parochial rates, with a view of mitigating the immediate and extreme pressure of the poor-rates in many parts of the country. In describing that measure, however, I observed that, although his majesty's government thought it their duty to submit it to the consideration of parliament—as one which might perhaps be resorted to with advantage in the existing state of things, yet that we also felt it to be liable to considerable objections; and therefore that his majesty's government were desirous to keep it open for further consideration and discussion. In the agricultural committee I had an opportunity of ascertaining the general opinion on this subject of individuals of great practical knowledge and experience; and I have now to state to the House, that the difficulties in the way of the successful execution of this plan appeared to these individuals so much to preponderate over its advantages, that it is not the intention of his majesty's government to make any proposition to parliament with respect to this particular species of relief.—There is, however, another mode of advancing capital for the relief of the agriculturist, which stands on a different principle, and to this the committee have given their sanction; namely, an advance by government, not exceeding in amount one million sterling, on the security of British corn, to be stored for that purpose.—Sir, I never disguised from the House my opinion, that advances of this nature require great consideration, and are only justifiable under the pressure of extraordinary necessity. I stated to the House, on a former occasion, the reasons which induced me to think that such a measure ought not to be adopted as a general principle; but at the same time I observed that there might be circumstances which would render its adoption advisable; and I instanced, as a similar case which had already occurred, the advance of Exchequer bills a few years ago, on the security of manufacturing and commercial property. It is not my intention at present to enter into any detailed argument on the subject: I wish, however, to apprise the House, that this particular proposition in the committee did not originate with me; but that, as it has received the sanction of the committee, I feel it to be my duty to propose it for the consideration of the House; the more especially, as I understand that it is a measure from which the farmers themselves conceive that they shall derive considerable advantage. In deference therefore to the opinion of the committee, believing as I do that the farmers generally look to this measure with anxiety, as likely to tend materially to their relief—and anxious as I am to assist in carrying into execution any plan that may in its operation have a tendency to improve the condition of the great body of the agriculturists, I shall certainly submit to the House the propriety of adopting in this respect the recommendation of the committee.

If, Sir, I thought that the true character of this measure was such, as I know I shall hear it described by some hon. gentlemen, namely, one to raise the price of corn, I would not give it my support. But my impression with respect to it is, that it cannot fairly be so considered. Its effect will be, not to raise the price of corn above its just level, but to preserve that level, by rendering the distribution of the produce of the year more proportionate to the actual wants of the consumer; thus relieving the market, which, owing to present circumstances, is so inundated with produce, that the fair and natural competition, which in ordinary times exists, and which ought always to exist between the buyer and the seller, is, for the present, materially deranged. There probably never was a period in the history of the country, when the seller of corn laboured under such overwhelming disadvantages as at the present moment; arising from the market being supplied, as the returns will prove, with double its average amount of produce. The tendency of the measure recommended by the committee, is, not to raise the price of corn, but to distribute the supply more equally over the whole year; and to protect the markets from the effects of that excess, which, at the present moment, pours in upon and depresses them. When adopted, it may, or may not, come into action. It is not founded on the principle of any direct interference on the part of government with the market; but its operation will altogether depend on the view which individuals take of the state of that market, acting strictly on a calculation of their own interests. If those individuals do not believe that the market has been glutted at an early period of the year, to the excessive depression of price, so as necessarily to lead to higher prices as the year advances, they will have no inducement to enter into the speculation of borrowing a capital, which they will afterwards be called upon to repay with interest. But if, on the other hand, there be reason for the presumption, that the market having been glutted, corn will, under all the circumstances of the case, naturally obtain higher prices in the latter part of the year, it is surely desirable that the farmer should have the means afforded him, through the operations of the corn merchant, of a part of the year's produce being held over for a market, at a moment when, if brought to a sale, it must necessarily lower the price. It cannot therefore be truly said, that there is any thing so unsound, so unnatural, or so artificial in this proposal, as to render it prejudicial, under circumstances of much agricultural embarrassment; especially when adopted only as a temporary measure, and as a corrective of a system in itself artificial. If it should lead to no favourable result, at least it can do no harm;—and the general impression on the minds of the farmers being, as I understand, that it is likely to be beneficial to them, if, under such circumstances, the House should refuse to try the experiment, the farmers might hereafter say, that, had it been tried, it would have afforded them relief.—I really do not perceive that any aggravation of the existing evil can by possibility arise from this measure, and I shall therefore certainly submit it for the consideration of the House.

The sum which his majesty's government propose shall be thus advanced is, as I have before stated, one million sterling; and I will presently call your attention to the fund out of which it is intended that that sum shall be so advanced. But there is another application of the credit of the country, which, under the present circumstances, his majesty's government mean to recommend to parliament. Had the hon. baronet opposite (sir E. O'Brien) delayed for a short time the communication which he this evening made to the House, with respect to the distresses which unfortunately oppress the population of the south and west of Ireland, he would have found that those distresses had already engaged the anxious attention of his majesty's government; and he would have been informed, that, with a view to enable the lord lieutenant of Ireland, liberally, but at the same time cautiously, to relieve the most urgent of those distresses, it is the intention of my right hon. friend, the Chief Secretary for Ireland, shortly to propose a vote of credit (similar to that which was agreed to in 1817), placing at the disposal of the lord lieutenant funds, by which he will be enabled to make those local and appropriate advances, which may tend, as in the former instance, materially to mitigate the existing evil. With respect to the second object of the hon. baronet, that of employing the poorer classes, I have to state that it is in the contemplation of his majesty's government, to propose an additional vote of one million sterling, to be applied, under the present commissioners, in the forwarding of public works, where there is a prospect of a profit which will indemnify the public for the advance. Such an application of capital will, while it gives useful occupation to the poor, have the effect of assisting improvements of great national benefit. These two sums—the advance on British corn stored, and that for carrying on public works, will amount to about 2,000,000*l*. of capital; of course to be advanced only upon adequate security, and subject to repayment with interest.

Sir, the next great branch of the question to which I wish to direct the attention of the committee is, the state of the circulating medium of the country. When I mentioned this subject on a former occasion, I opened to the House the opinion entertained by his majesty's government with respect to the most convenient mode in which the advances, which it is proposed to make, can be effected, so as to afford the most general benefit; and I stated, that his majesty's government were engaged in a negotiation with the Bank of England for an advance of 4,000,000*l*. on Exchequer bills, at the moderate interest of 3 per cent, subject of course to the approbation and decision of parliament. I also stated, that the object which his majesty's government had in view was in some degree to relieve the pressure upon the money circulation; and thereby to produce a general and important benefit to the country, independent of any particular and individual advantage; and I declared that I should be prepared to urge parliament, should all schemes of local application be abandoned, still to adopt measures by which the sum in question might find its way into general circulation. Sir, his majesty's government adhere to the views on this subject which I then described; and I have now to state that they have concluded an arrangement with the Bank of England for the purpose of carrying those views into effect.

I have already observed that 1,000,000*l*. will be necessary to execute the proposed measure of making advances on the storing of British corn; and another 1,000,000*l*. for the intended application to public works generally; which latter sum will include a sufficient fund for the purpose of mitigating the particular distress existing at the present moment in the south and west of Ireland. I have now the satisfaction to inform the House, that since these subjects were last discussed in parliament, the Bank of England has consented to advance, at an interest of 3 per cent, a sufficient sum to pay off all the holders of navy 5 per cents, who have dissented from subscribing to the proposal for an exchange into the 4 per cent stock; which sum will somewhat exceed 2,600,000*l*. I therefore suggest the expediency, in conformity to the view which his majesty's government take of the subject, of throwing these sums into general circulation; namely, the 2,000,000*l*. to which I have already alluded, which will enter the circulation by particular channels;—and the 2,600,000*l*. which in July next will find its way into direct circulation, by paying off those holders of navy 5 per cents, who were not disposed to become parties to the late arrangement respecting that stock.

I will now call the attention of the committee more pointedly to the general state of the circulation, and to the various circumstances by which it is affected. The House are aware that the act, empowering private bankers in the country to issue notes under 5*l*. in value, will expire in the year 1825; and that consequently, if parliament do not interfere, by extending the operation of that act, all the small paper currency of the country—all that currency which consists of notes under 5*l*. in value—must be put out of circulation, and its place be supplied by a metallic currency. Now, we are approaching so nearly to the period of the expiration of that act, that it is essential parliament should, without loss of time, decide with respect to the course of policy which it may be most expedient to pursue. Either we should at once determine to extend the law for a further period, or we should give the parties concerned fair notice that we intend to allow it to expire. This becomes the more necessary, as there is reason to believe, that the country bankers, with the termination of the present law in view, have, for some time past, been contracting their issues in order to meet that event. There is reason to believe that, no longer indulging in speculation, the country bankers are not acting even up to the natural scale of the credit to which the property they possess entitles them, in consequence of the measures which they think it necessary to adopt, in order to be prepared for the total suppression of their small paper currency. If, therefore, it be the intention of parliament to allow the act for the regulation of country bank paper to expire, that intention ought now to be declared, in order that still more extensive efforts may be made to procure an adequate supply of the precious metals to replace that paper. If, on the other hand, this operation can be dispensed with, it should, without further delay, be discouraged, as the effect of such an importation, in the interval, would be, to augment the pressure upon our circulation, by a large, and in that case unnecessary, accumulation of gold. It is for parliament to consider whether a metallic currency alone is sufficient to satisfy all the wants of the country. It is for parliament to consider whether, looking at the general circulation, with respect both to this country and to the world at large, it would be sound policy, that the whole of that circulation should be filled up, in its details, by a metallic currency. I am sure the House will go along with me in feeling, that the time has arrived when we are bound to come to some conclusion on this most important question. And here I have to state, that after the best consideration which his majesty's government have been able to bestow on the subject, they are satisfied that, under all the circumstances of the case, it will be prudent and expedient, not only to extend the duration of the act in question, but to extend it for a considerable number of years, by making that duration concurrent with that of the charter of the Bank of England, which will not expire until the year 1833.

I am sure the House will feel, that if, even at this moment, it be the fact, that we are suffering an unnecessary pressure, resulting from the efforts which had been made to bring gold into the country, and to hold it in the coffers of the Bank of England, in order to effect the great object of returning to our ancient metallic standard;—if that be the case, and I really believe it so to be, it is imperative upon us to consider how much the evil will be needlessly aggravated, if to the gold which has been accumulated for that purpose, is to be added the gold which it will be necessary to provide, in order to replace the small country notes, should they also be withdrawn. If it be not necessary to our credit to do away with those notes, why should the country bankers be exposed to the obligation of keeping by them a large dead capital in gold, which has, in many points, been found inconvenient in the detail of general circulation? It is indispensable, therefore, that we should now decide this important question; and, in truth, we come to the decision with some intimation from the country of what we ought to do. It is a curious fact, that the great efforts which the Bank of England have considered it their duty to make, for the purpose of introducing gold generally into the circulation of the country, have, in a great measure, failed; for no sooner do they issue sovereigns, than those sovereigns are returned to them in payments; which is certainly the strongest possible indication that the country prefers a paper currency, founded on a basis of satisfactory security. If parliament, therefore, should refuse to renew the act to which I have alluded, it will force a gold currency upon the country, against its wishes, at a moment when, to sustain it, we must injudiciously draw on our resources; and when the accumulation of vast masses of that precious metal, must inflict on this country, and all the other countries of Europe, a great and unnecessary inconvenience. For these reasons, and without troubling the committee at present with further details, I have now to state, that his majesty's government, having to choose between the alternatives, have determined, under all the circumstances of the case, to recommend to parliament to permit the circulation in question to continue to be carried on in paper, to rest on the credit of the parties by whom that paper is issued. Of course, the bill by which it is proposed to continue the present act, will contain the existing provisions for the security of the public; and it is also intended to introduce a provision that private bankers issuing such small notes, shall not be considered as failing in their obligations if they pay them in Bank of England notes; these latter being of course payable, as at present, in cash, at the Bank of England. Unless the country bankers are so protected, they will not be able to issue their notes with safety.

It has been the anxious wish of his majesty's government to couple with the extension of the present permission to country bankers to issue small notes, some regulation which may have a tendency to provide against an excessive issue of such notes upon inadequate security. It is certainly true, as has been justly observed by an hon. gentleman opposite, that this matter may be left to be dealt with by the natural precaution of the community; yet, if any unexceptionable security could be combined with that precaution, it would be so much clear gain. His majesty's government had at one time some idea of requiring a deposit of actual property as a security; but the details of such measures were, on examination, found to be so difficult and complicated, that we were induced to abandon it. In lieu thereof, and in order to increase the effect and stability of those banking operations, by augmenting the number of persons embarking in them, it has been thought fit and proper to open a negotiation with the Bank of England, for the purpose of obtaining from them such a relaxation of the Bank charter, as may enable individuals who are so disposed, to establish private banks, consisting of a greater number of partners than six, the number to which they are at present limited by the provisions of the Bank of England charter. It is not intended, however, that this shall take place immediately within the sphere of the Bank of England—not in London, or in the neighbouring districts, but at such a distance from London as shall not materially affect the operations of the Bank of England, while it undoubtedly will greatly add to the convenience and security of the public. Sir, his majesty's government are persuaded, that, if the important object could be obtained of limiting the exclusive privilege of the Bank of England to a distance of sixty-five miles from London, leaving it every where else open for any joint stock company that chose to do so, to set up a banking establishment, such a measure would give great solidity, as well as facility to the circulation; and very materially strengthen the credit of the country. The object has been to assimilate, as far as may be, the country banks in England to those in Scotland, which have long carried on all their dealings with the greatest correctness, and advantage to the public, and with the most unshaken credit. In Scotland there are twenty-six banks, three only of which are chartered banks; the remaining twenty-three are of the description of those which his majesty's government are desirous of enabling individuals to establish any where in England, beyond the distance of sixty-five miles from the metropolis. Several of those Scottish banks are joint stock companies of a very extensive nature, consisting of a great number of partners: the average number of partners of which those companies are composed is between fifty and sixty. Let the House consider what an increase of security it must afford to the public when so many individuals combine in the responsibility of a banking concern, and render themselves liable to be sued by their legal representative. In order to induce persons to enter into them, the banks of Scotland lay down principles of banking so sound and safe, and so opposed to all illicit speculation, that in that country, where the people are certainly not much inclined to hazard their property unwisely, numbers of persons are always found ready to embark in them. In the last hundred and twenty years, during which period the pressure of circumstances has occasioned the failure of so many banking establishments in England, not one such failure has occurred in the whole of Scotland until the other day, when there was a rumour of the failure of a Scottish bank; whether true or not, I have not since been informed. Something beneficial there must be in a system which has passed so long and so safely through the many tremendous shocks to which banking property has necessarily been exposed. By bringing the system on which the banks of Scotland are founded into this country, we shall indirectly give a great increase of strength to our paper circulation, without restraining private bankers from rendering their capital a source of profit to its utmost extent. I ought to have mentioned before, and in its proper place, that, in order to induce the Bank of England to consent to the surrender of this portion of their chartered rights, it is proposed to extend their charter for ten years, merely in as far as it is applicable to the local circulation of London and its neighbourhood, without affecting, however, any of the subsisting arrangements between the Bank and the public.

Having stated so much to the committee on two of the great branches of this subject namely the measures which it is proposed to take for the mitigation of the agricultural distress, and those in aid of the general circulation of the country; and having, as I hope sufficiently opened the views of his majesty's government on those points, I proceed now to call its attention to what has been done, and to what it is in contemplation further to do, in regard to our financial arrangements. In the first place, Sir, let us look at what has been the result of our legislative enactments in the present session, on the subject of finance, the consideration of which will pave the way for a statement of the further measures which his majesty's government mean to propose, growing out of the support that parliament has so wisely given to public credit; for it is unquestionably true, that the present state of the money market and of credit generally, arises from the course of policy which parliament lately pursued, and which was dictated by so enlightened and uncompromising a spirit.

Sir, it is fresh in the memory of the committee, that his majesty's government having reduced the estimates for the year by the sum of two millions; parliament, after satisfying itself of the existence of an effective surplus of five millions of revenue, over all the ordinary, and even over all the extraordinary charges of the year; and of the consequent realization of the object which had long been contemplated, and out of which it was foreseen would grow a solid and improving condition of public credit, did, after further, and most mature examination of the subject, the result of which was a corroboration of its former opinion with regard to the expediency of applying that surplus to the maintenance of a sinking fund, pledge itself so to apply that surplus, thereby effectually supporting the public credit, with which all the best interests of the country are inseparably connected.

On the faith of the determination taken by parliament upon this subject, his majesty's government felt that it might be permitted to my right hon. friend, the chancellor of the exchequer, to embark in one of the most gigantic enterprises of finance of which the history of the world affords an instance; namely, that of paying off 155,000,000*l.* of the public debt, either by actual payment, or, by means arising out of the public credit. I am confident that if, at any former period, it had been declared that, in the course of six weeks, a measure of such magnitude could be carried into effect, not only without any convulsion, but without any serious discontent or inconvenience—the assertion would have been treated as idle and illusory. Nothing has happened in the whole history of the country, which so clearly exhibits the powers of the nation, and the almost endless resources which result from the stability of its credit and the character of its government, when those resources are wielded under the sanction and authority of parliament, and are not broken down by unsound or speculative principles of policy,—than the fact we have lately witnessed, that such an extensive operation has been accomplished without the least apparent difficulty or embarrassment. By that single operation—by the conversion of so great a mass of our debt into a stock bearing a reduced interest—the people have been at once relieved from an annual burthen amounting to 1,300,000*l.* But that is not all. It is not the immediate fruits of the measure, great as they are, that are so important as the precedent which its execution has established, of a successful reduction of the interest of our debt. How much more easy comparatively, will be the task of my right hon. friend hereafter, or of any of his successors, when it shall be considered advisable to proceed further with the reduction of the interest of the debt, from their having such a precedent to refer to. In fact, the country may henceforward consider the reduction of the interest of its debt to be a safe and practicable operation, whenever the price of the funds, and the concurrence of favourable circumstances, may render such an undertaking again expedient.

I wish now to call the attention of the committee to a measure, the outline of which I am about to explain, not altogether resting on the same principle as that to which I have just adverted; but, still, one of the greatest importance, and which, I hope, the committee will consider to be fully warranted by present circumstances. My right hon. friend, the chancellor of the exchequer, has prepared certain resolutions, which he will move on Wednesday or Friday next, with a view of bringing this new measure, to which I have alluded, under the consideration of parliament. It is his wish, however, from its bearing upon the general state of the country, that I should open the outline of his plan this evening; and, previous to doing so, I feel that I ought to state why that measure is only now brought forward; and why, if it be one which his majesty's government think expedient and desirable, it was not introduced at an earlier period of the session.

Sir, the measure to which I have alluded can be proposed with a fair prospect of success, only at a period when the public credit is in a flourishing condition. The wisdom and magnanimity of the House of Commons having resisted all the shocks which have been levelled against public credit in the course of the present session, the country now reposes perfect confidence in the stability of that credit, which parliament has in so decisive a tone declared its determination to support.

Although, therefore, the principle of this new measure has been for some time under the consideration of my right hon. friend, he could not bring it forward sooner than at the present moment. It was not only impossible that he should submit it to the opinion of parliament before the public credit became fairly and unequivocally established, but it was also inexpedient that he should do so before the bill which was so mainly conducive to that end—I mean the bill for reducing the five per cents—had been completely carried into execution. For, Sir, it could not be foreseen what difficulties might have occurred in the execution of that measure, to contend with which, all the exertions of the state, and all the means which his majesty's government could bring forward, might have been exclusively necessary to be applied. Until, therefore, the provisions of that bill were executed, and until the money market had thereby become completely tranquillized, it was by no means advisable to embark parliament and the country in a new measure of the extent and complexity of that which, agreeably to the wish of my right hon. friend, I am about briefly to describe.

Sir, the committee will allow me to say, that I by no means wish them to consider this proposal as a parallel to that which has recently been adopted. The measure which has already been executed has been productive of an absolute saving to the country. By that great financial operation, the reduction of the interest of a large portion of the public debt, a positive annual saving has been effected, in behalf of the country, of above 1,300,000*l.* The plan which I am now going to describe, is a new and more convenient arrangement of our existing means, rather than a creation of new means.

The measure, then, which my right hon. friend intends to submit to the consideration of parliament, is—to place the liquidation of a large portion of the present expenditure of the country, namely, the dead expense, as it is called, of our naval and military establishment, on a different footing from that on which it now stands. The committee are aware that this dead expense is an immense annual charge, consisting of officers' pensions, retired allowances, the pensions of the widows of officers, and the half-pay, under the heads of navy, army, and ordnance; amounting altogether to about 5,000,000*l.* per annum. This amount is certainly liable to progressive decrease from the deaths of individuals; but having been granted by the liberality and gratitude of parliament to meritorious individuals, for services performed, it is a charge, generally speaking, which rests on the good faith of parliament, and which must be annually provided for as a debt of the state. It is, however, a debt which stands in a very inconvenient relation to the general arrangements of the country. I am sure the committee will feel that nothing is more calculated to mislead the public, or embarrass our discussions, than this vast charge of 5,000,000*l.*, which seems to belong to our annual expenditure; but which, in fact, has nothing to do with that expenditure, although, historically, it will be very proudly connected with the state. The effect of the actual arrangement is to make the public think that the national expenditure is seventeen or eighteen millions per annum, when in fact it does not exceed twelve or thirteen millions. If this charge, then, can be separated from the general expenditure; if it can be treated as a debt incurred rather than as a service to be provided for, although in that case the real amount of expenditure will be the same, yet things will be placed on their proper footing, and the public in this country; and the world, will better know what is the actual situation of our affairs. It is, I think, most desirable to look at the question of this dead expense in the view I have here explained; and parliament is, on all sound principles of prudence and policy, entitled to deal with it in a different manner from any other branch of the national expenditure. It has grown out of a war perfectly unexampled in history. The exertions of this nation, while that contest continued, were of a gigantic description. Those exertions were made for our own preservation, and for the deliverance of Europe; and they were made upon such a scale, that it cannot in all common probability be supposed, that England will ever be required to repeat them.

We are justified, therefore, in dealing with this charge on a distinct principle, applicable to itself alone. We are warranted in looking upon it as a debt sui generally not likely to recur, at least in any degree to the same extent. For some time past, his majesty's government have been anxiously employed in considering all the regulations and provisions out of which this dead expense has arisen; and although they have not the slightest intention—and I wish this to be most distinctly understood—of interfering with the interests of those who are already provided for by it; although they feel that the rights of the parties who at present enjoy a provision under this head should be held sacred, yet they do not consider themselves to be so fettered, as not to be entitled to propose such prospective modifications, consistent with sound principles of justice and of economy, as may hereafter prevent the charge from accumulating as it has latterly done, to an amount altogether incompatible with the beneficial administration of the affairs of this or of any other country.

This charge amounts (as I have already stated), at the present moment, to not less than 5,000,000*l*. If the committee will go back, and compare the present amount of it with its amount in 1792, that year with the expense of which it has lately been so much the habit to contrast our existing expenditure, they will find, by the Report of the Committee of Finance, which investigated the expenditure of the country at that period, that the like expenditure did not exceed 650,000*l*., notwithstanding all the increase which it had necessarily received during the American and the preceding wars. The committee, then, must see how rapid has been the growth of this charge during the last war, as compared with its increase during former wars. Nine years after the termination of the American war, it amounted only to 650,000*l*.; at the present moment, the country has to sustain a burthen, consequent on the late war, of 5,000,000*l*. arising in a great degree, certainly, out of the peculiar circumstances of the contest in which we were engaged, but also mainly (and I state it without intending to convey obloquy or imputation on any one) from the nature of the regulations which were adopted during that war, in regard to pensions and allowances. It is, therefore, clearly the duty of his majesty's government to protect the country from the future growth of so burthensome a system; and we feel, in consequence, the more justified in dealing with this charge in the way which I am about to describe.

In the first place, Sir, let us consider what the precise nature of the charge is. It is an annuity of 5,000,000*l*. on the lives of numerous parties, some of whom are young, and some old; and it is, therefore, an annuity of varying amount and uncertain duration. It may be considered, in fact, as an annuity beginning at the sum of 5,000,000*l*.; but subject of course to the usual decrease, according to the calculations contained in tables of the value and duration of human life, it appears that this annuity may be carried on to a period of seventy years; although, towards the close of that period, as the number of individuals living would be very few, the payments would of course materially decrease. Now, the nature of the operation which I am about to suggest to the House is, that parliament should make provision for a change in the mode of these payments, by entering into a contract with parties, who, in consideration of a fixed annual payment on the part of the public, shall agree to supply such a sum in each year as, upon calculation, may be required to effectuate to the survivors the payments which they will be entitled to receive. This species of operation, the committee will observe, is purely financial, and will in no degree alter the position of individuals at present receiving pensions and allowances, in their relation to parliament or to the Crown. I should most strongly deprecate, upon constitutional grounds, the adoption of any proposal, the effect of which would be to render those individuals the pensioners of any large commercial company. Such a change would entirely destroy the true constitutional character of the connexion of those individuals with the Crown. If, also, the arrangement in question were in any way to affect the functions of parliament in its control over the national expenditure, or to supersede its power of voting these public charges annually, it would certainly be highly objectionable. But, Sir, the plan to be proposed by my right hon. friend, is not open to any of these objections. It is strictly a financial arrangement, not in any degree changing the position of the parties interested, in no degree interfering with the constitutional control of parliament over the public expenditure, but merely altering the mode in which the public resources are to be obtained, and by which the charge in question is to be defrayed and distributed equally over an extended period of years, instead of falling with excessive pressure on the earlier years of the series.

His majesty's government then conceive that, under the very peculiar circumstances of this case, they shall be justified in proposing an exception from the usual practice, if, on sound financial principles, they can adopt some system, the effect of which will be to distribute this charge over a certain number of years, and thereby to lighten its immediate pressure. The number of years which it is proposed to take as the proper extent of time over which the charge may be advantageously distributed, is forty-five. That is the number of years which was recognised by Mr. Pitt as the period within which, by the reservation of one per cent on the capital of every loan, the debt created by that loan would be liquidated. This period, then, being fixed at forty-five years, it remains to be determined what sum the public ought to pay during that time; or, what equal and invariable sum the public ought annually to pay for five and forty years, to induce any parties contracting to undertake to pay annually the unequal and variable amount of the charge under consideration.—I should add, that it is not in the contemplation of his majesty's government to contract for a longer term than forty-five years; because, after the expiration of that term, the annual payments upon the surviving lives must of course be so small, that it is not worth while to embarrass the present transaction by any reference to them.

I am sure the committee will feel that I cannot be expected at the present moment to state very accurately the details which are connected with this part of the subject; I will content myself with endeavouring to give the committee a notion of what will be the probable working of the plan. It would appear that, by granting a fixed annuity for forty-five years of from 2,500,000*l.* to 3,000,000*l.*, if parliament shall think fit to sanction the measure, a contract may be made, for the payment every year into his majesty's Exchequer of the sum reasonably necessary to defray the charge in question, according to a schedule to be constructed from the table of lives. The effect of such an arrangement with respect to the public will be this—that if the fixed annuity to be so granted by parliament should, for instance, amount to 2,800,000*l.*, the present total of the charge being 5,000,000*l.*, the immediate saving to the country would be 2,200,000*l.*; and consequently parliament would be enabled to dispose of that saving of 2,200,000*l.* at its discretion. The operation of the measure will be that for the first sixteen years the contractors will have to make good the difference between the fixed payment of 2,800,000*l.* and the sum required to discharge these payments, as set forth in the schedule, thereby pro tanto operating a relief to our annual expenditure. About the sixteenth year it will probably become a balanced account between the sums received by the contractors and the sums to be paid by them;—and from the sixteenth to the forty-fifth, or last year, the payment by the contractors, as lives fall in, will very much diminish, and they will be reimbursed for the great advances made by them at the commencement of the transaction.

Sir, I am the more anxious for the success of this measure, because, if parliament think fit to sanction it, and his majesty's government should be enabled to carry it into execution, I am very sanguine in the hope that we may be at once enabled to realize the project which the hon. member for Corfe Castle proposed to the House at an early period of the present session. I confess I am very much inclined to go along with that hon. gentleman in his opinion, that unless we are enabled to tie up the 5,000,000*l.* of sinking fund, to accumulate at compound interest, until it shall amount at least to a sinking fund of one per cent on the whole capital of the debt, which was the principle proposed by Mr. Pitt at its formation, we shall very imperfectly execute the intentions of parliament as expressed in repeated declarations, and very much fall short of the original object for which that fund was destined.

I am sure, then, it must be very satisfactory to the House to learn, that the period may not be very remote, when the public will begin to reap those salutary advantages, every year increasing in value, which always result from transactions like those to which parliament has lately given its sanction, founded on justice and good faith, and conducted with prudence and honour. By a calculation which has been recently made, it appears that, if parliament shall determine that the 5,000,000*l.* is to increase at compound, instead of continuing to go on at simple interest, it will arrive, in the course of ten years, at the maximum which it is at present intended it shall attain, namely, one per cent on the whole of the national debt. In ten years, the sinking fund at compound interest, will amount to about 7,400,000*l.*; which will be full one per cent on the capital of the debt, because by that time the operation of the sinking fund will have reduced the debt above seventy millions of its present nominal capital, which will then be about 730,000,000*l.*, instead of 800,000,000*l.*;— after the tenth year there will be a surplus on the sinking fund, at the disposal of parliament, of about 290,000*l.*, in every year, applicable to any purpose to which parliament may choose to destine it; at the conclusion of the forty-five years, that sum will amount to about 10,000,000*l.* of clear annual revenue. The country, therefore, will have from the tenth to the forty-fifth year of this period, a growing surplus, accumulating from that fund, of about 290,000*l.* a year; making in the whole about 10,000,000*l.*; and in the thirty-eighth year of that period the existing long annuities amounting to 1,300,000 per annum, will fall in. With these prospects before them, I conceive that there can be no hesitation on the part of the House, in tying up the present sinking fund, so that it may accumulate at compound interest.

The question next to be considered is —what will it be prudent and advisable for parliament to do with the annual saving that will be effected by the proposed plan? Supposing that the sum should be that which I have already stated (but in stating which I beg not to be understood as absolutely pledging myself to accuracy in the amount), supposing that by making a contract for a fixed annuity of 2,800,000*l.*, the arrangement should be completed, and should leave at the disposal of parliament 2,200,000*l.* of annual revenue, in what way ought that sum to be disposed of? Now, Sir, with all my anxiety, and with all the anxiety of my right hon. friend, to remit taxes whenever it becomes practicable to remit them, I am not prepared to say that we can safely go so far as to propose the remission of taxes to the full amount of 2,200,000*l.* By the adoption, however, of the proposed measure by parliament, they will be enabled to give, even in the present session, considerable relief to the country. Sir, God forbid that I should attempt to delude the House by stating that the remission of 1,800,000*l.* of taxes, which is the amount that it is probable my right hon. friend may propose to remit, appropriating the remaining 400,000*l.* in the manner which I shall afterwards explain, can effect any thing like a complete relief to the agricultural interest. It is gratifying, however, to know, that such a remission must be very beneficial to consumers generally, and to the agriculturist therefore among the rest, in his character as a consumer. In that way it certainly will operate as a relief to the agriculturist, whose distress has never been denied by his majesty's government, and which distress it has always been, and still is, their most anxious wish to diminish. When, therefore, I say that, in the event of the adoption of the proposed measure, parliament, may, even in the present session, afford relief to the country to a considerable extent, I mean a moderate and a rational relief. I do not mean that we are competent to work miracles, by which alone the distress in question could be immediately and completely removed; but I mean, that we may give such aid as will be very generally beneficial, at the same time that it will not prejudicially affect those great financial principles, the maintenance of which parliament has already declared to be indispensable to the national welfare and prosperity.

Having thus stated to the committee the relief which his majesty's government earnestly hope may with prudence be afforded, I must again conjure the House not to look at the question of remission of taxation otherwise than through the medium of this measure; from which a clear surplus will accrue, disposable by parliament, after having set apart, without prejudice to the sinking fund, adequate funds for meeting the dead charge throughout the entire period of forty-five years; adhering strictly to this principle, I have no doubt but that the plan may be satisfactorily carried into effect in the course of the present session of parliament, and that the legislature may thereby be enabled to relieve the country from taxation to the amount which I have mentioned.

My right hon. friend is not, as I before stated, at present prepared to appropriate the whole of the 2,200,000*l.* to the remission of taxation; because, by so doing, he would violate justice and good faith. For, although it is perfectly true that

5,000,000*l.* is the present amount of the dead expense, yet the whole of the saving which will arise by the death of the parties now entitled to these pensions, will not accrue to the public even upon the present system, for it is obvious that pensions must, from time to time, be granted to individuals who served in the late war; to the widows of officers who may die whilst on half-pay; and to the widows even of those who have married since the peace. His majesty's government, therefore, feel that they should not act in a way at all consistent with a due regard to principle, if, in their haste to afford that relief to the country which they are bound to give when the opportunity is offered to them, they were to omit to make the necessary provision for meeting this growing expense. We propose, therefore, out of the sum of 2,200,000, which I have taken as the whole saving on the measure, to make the necessary provision for the growing expense which will probably arise between the present moment and the end of the period of the next ten years; at which time, if parliament shall now agree to tie up the 5,000,000*l.* of sinking fund at compound interest, it will arrive at its maximum, yielding, as I have already stated, an annual surplus of about 290,000*l.*; and, in two or three years from that time, the amount of surplus revenue so liberated will be sufficient to provide for the charge of the growing expense above mentioned, without interference with any other financial measure calculated to support the public credit.

His majesty's government have considered this question with as much accuracy as is possible on an abstruse point of calculation, in which there are no very precise data to go upon; and we have reason to believe that an annuity of from 300,000*l.* to 400,000*l.* for forty-five years, will completely cover the dead expense that is likely to accrue over its present amount in the course of the next ten years. If that be so, the general result will be as follows:—The present dead expense is 5,000,000*l.* If we can contract for a fixed annuity of 2,800,000*l.*, the saving will be 2,200,000*l.*; from which, if we deduct the 300,000*l.* or 400,000*l.* which has been estimated as the sum that will be sufficient to meet the growth of the said expense for the next ten years, there will remain between 1,800,000*l.* and 1,900,000*l.*, which may be devoted to the repeal of taxation, without the abandonment of any principle which ought to be maintained. But here I must again entreat the House and the country to recollect, that this remission of taxes can be afforded only, if the arrangement which my right hon. friend will have the honour to propose can be carried into effect.

Sir, it would be highly objectionable were I to say any thing as to the particular taxes which, in that case, it may be desirable to repeal. This is a point which ought always to remain undecided until the very moment at which the repeal is proposed. Many suggestions will no doubt be made on the subject; but it would be an act of the grossest injustice, and leading to the most unfair and injurious speculations upon particular articles of commerce, if any member of his majesty's government were, in this stage of the proceeding, to drop a hint upon the subject. And, indeed hon. gentlemen who are not members of his majesty's government, ought to be very cautious how they prematurely raise an argument upon this point, lest they should unwarily occasion similar mischief. If, however, parliament shall sanction the proceeding which his majesty's government recommend to them; if we are thus enabled to relieve the country to the amount which I have described, the hon. and learned gentleman opposite will find that the total amount of taxes which will then have been remitted in the course of two years, will not fall very far short of what was contemplated in his own plan. Parliament have already repealed the husbandry-horse tax, amounting to nearly half a million; and a shilling a bushel on the malt-tax, amounting to a million and a half; and if, in addition to those sums, we are enabled, without any violation of principle or good faith, to take off 1,800,000*l.* more, that will make a total remission of taxes of above 3,700,000*l.* in the course of two years. It must also be recollected that, if these effects should result from the proposition of my right hon. friend, they will so result, not only without any thing having been taken from the sinking fund, but coupled with the determination to tie up that fund at compound interest, until it shall reach the amount of one per cent on the nominal capital of the debt. What a picture does this statement present of the resources of the country!

In making it, Sir, I have not referred to our increasing revenue, nor to any further diminution of expenditure. On this latter point, however, I beg leave to say that, notwithstanding the reduction which has already been made in the present year, of two millions sterling, his majesty's government are not disposed to relax their efforts at retrenchment, although, in truth, the expenditure has been pared down too closely to warrant us in holding out the hope of relief to any great extent from that quarter. When, to the above statement I add that we have the prospect of being able, at no very distant period, to effect a farther reduction in the interest of the higher portions of the national debt, it is evident that, if parliament will but remain true to itself, and to the best interests of the country, by resolutely maintaining the public credit, we may look forward, in the course of a certain period of years, to a very considerable diminution indeed of the public burthens.

Sir, it remains for me to proceed to those topics which it more particularly belongs to us to discuss on the present occasion; and to offer such suggestions to the committee as grow out of the report of the select committee on the distress of agriculture. I shall now do this as shortly as I can; as there will be other opportunities for entering more fully into the details of the subject.

The first question which must naturally attract our attention is, whether this be a seasonable time for bringing under the consideration of parliament a subject of so much difficulty, and on which there exists so great a variety of opinions? Even the committee themselves seem to have entertained considerable doubts on this point; as they have not charged their chairman to make any proposition to parliament, grounded on their report. For myself, however, I must say, that when, on a former occasion, I ventured to state to the House that I thought it highly desirable that such a committee as the agricultural committee should be re-appointed, it was not with the slightest wish on my part to throw off from the shoulders of his majesty's government the responsibility attached to the duty which naturally belongs to them, of proposing to parliament any measures, however difficult or great their importance, which the welfare of the country might seem to require; but I did so rather with a view of taking the benefit of the discussions in that committee; in order that his majesty's government might be enabled to form a more accurate and comprehensive judgment with respect to the details of any measure which it may become necessary to propose, and that they might also have an opportunity of ascertaining and carrying along with them, the sentiments of those hon. gentlemen who are most competent to form an opinion on such subjects. That, Sir, was the object which I had in view in proposing to parliament the re-appointment of the agricultural committee; and I had no disposition whatever to impose on that committee the task of submitting, from themselves, any proposition to the House.

I certainly feel, not only as one of that committee, but as a member of his majesty's government, that, whatever inconvenience there may be in undertaking to make any proposal on the subject, I should not discharge my public duty if I were to shrink from the task: and I hope that, in coming forward on this occasion, I shall be considered by the House with the less disfavour, from my having received many pretty strong hints in the committee, as several of the members thereof can testify, that it would be considered an extraordinary dereliction of public duty, if his majesty's government were to suffer such a report as the agricultural report to lie on the table of the House of Commons, without proposing to parliament the adoption of some measure founded upon it. In fact, Sir, I hold this to have been most sound and correct advice; for, although there undoubtedly exists, both within and without these walls, much difference of opinion on this important and interesting subject, yet I am persuaded that we can never hope to bring the public mind to the consideration of it with more calm and temperate feelings than at the present moment. Sir, at this moment, it is purely a speculative question. The existing law prohibits the importation of corn until the price in this country shall be eighty shillings a quarter. It is now below fifty shillings; and there are no indications whatever of any sudden rise. So that what is now before us is rather an abstract contemplation of what it may be expedient to provide for some remote and uncertain period, than a proposition from which any of the parties interested can expect to derive immediate benefit, or to suffer any present inconvenience.

A noble lord opposite has this evening called the report of the agricultural committee paltry and powerless; and has spoken of it altogether in very contemptuous terms. Now, the House will do the committee, and will do me the justice to recollect, that, when I first opened the subject to parliament, I said that I was quite aware the legislature could do nothing to remedy the immediate disease—that they could do nothing to affect the present price of corn, which was the evil complained of; that the only ground on which I recommended any interference at all, was, that there were circumstances in the existing law which might work much mischief at some future period, if they were not altered; and that this was the time to alter the law, when there was no conflict of immediate interests.

If, Sir, there be this strong motive for making a change in the law, I certainly continue to think that there never was a moment at which the subject could be discussed with more temper, with a greater absence of heat, and with less embarrassment from strong and interested feeling. Not that I deny that strong feelings may be entertained on this question. On the contrary, I know that very strong, and I will add very erroneous impressions, exist with respect to it; but, were it only to give the good sense of the country an opportunity of manifesting itself on the subject, I should be ready to bring it under the consideration of parliament. I am by no means disposed, even if I had the power, to do violence to public feeling, or to propose any thing in the expediency of which the public mind would reluctantly acquiesce; but it is absolutely necessary that the country should be undeceived with respect to the numerous false principles and false impressions that have gone abroad on this subject; for never have I known a question on which there has appeared such a mass, not only of mistaken principles, but of inaccurate assertions of fact. [illegible] the strong motive to which I have already alluded for endeavouring to [illegible] some measure that may guard against the future contingent evil of the law at present in force. [illegible] opinion [illegible] I confess I [illegible] expected that, [illegible] session of parliament, [illegible] passed to avert the impending calamity; for I assert without fear of contradiction, that the degree of distress to which the existing law, if it remain unaltered, may, at some future period, give rise, cannot be rated lower than that of the most serious national calamity.

Gentlemen are aware that, as the law at present stands, the ports must necessarily open for the importation of foreign grain whenever wheat in this country shall reach the price of eighty shillings a quarter. Now, I believe there was not a second opinion in the agricultural committee, as to the evils which, in the present state of the continental market, must result from the unrestrained importation which, in that event, would immediately take place. No member of that committee went further in allowing the extent of that danger than the hon. member for Portarlington. If, in the present glut of the foreign markets, any unexpected occurrence were to open our ports, such might be the immensity of the supply poured into this country during the ensuing year—that supply being wholly unchecked and uncontrolled—that no man can describe or imagine the extent of agricultural ruin that might not be inflicted on this country; not merely for that year, but for years to come. Three, four, or five millions of quarters might be imported; indeed, it is impossible to calculate the amount of the influx. Cheap corn must be poured in with a profusion beyond all example; and, as the supply would thus be out of all proportion beyond the demand, there it would lie for many years to come, a dead weight on our agriculture, bearing it down to utter ruin.

This, however, is the most gloomy view of the subject. I do not mean to say, that there is much probability that corn in this country will soon rise to such a price as to open the ports and admit the influx of foreign corn. If the House were to ask me what I thought were the chances of such an event, I would reply, that undoubtedly they were largely against the ports opening in the course of next year; that the probability was that they would not open in the course of the following year, nor even in the year after. So [illegible] is the present [illegible] that, in my opinion, nothing can open the port short of that species of dearth which must [illegible] even if the protecting price were a hundred shillings instead of eighty. But, Sir, it is no answer to make to our [illegible] because the chances are against the agriculture of the country being ruined in the next or the following years, that therefore we will not make any provision for its safety. For, although there is at present every prospect of an abundant harvest, some circumstance may occur such as had very nearly opened the ports last year. If by any contingency the ports were next year to be thus opened, and if the import of foreign corn shall not be restrained in the mean time by some adequate regulation, the interests of agriculture must inevitably be ruined. It behoves parliament, therefore, not to slumber on its post, when there exists even the slightest possibility of such an event; and his majesty's government would abandon their duty, if they shrunk from the task of proposing measures to guard against its occurrence. However difficult and embarrassing that duty may be, I am satisfied that whenever a government throws itself upon the good sense of the people of England, it will make a safe passage through all obstacles, even in the worst of times. Whatever differences exist as to the details of the subject, they appear to me to lie in such a narrow compass, that if the House will agree to the general principle, and the question shall become merely one of the quantum of duty, I am prepared to agree to any of the various propositions made to us, rather than expose the country to the terrible visitation of an indefinite quantity of foreign corn being poured into it without check or limit.

I will now state, as shortly as possible, the grounds on which I entertain a sanguine expectation that all the differences of opinion which exist, are such as may be so easily grappled with and overcome, as to enable us to pass a bill upon the subject in the course of the present session of parliament. In fact, there is very little difference of opinion in the view taken of this subject by the intelligent part of the community. All agree in considering the existing law defective in this respect, that it allows a sudden transition from absolute monopoly to unrestrained importation; not to free trade, in the sense of the hon. member for Portarlington; for if that were its effect, I should not feel such weighty objections to it, being, as I am, the advocate of a free trade, as nearly as circumstances will permit, under such regulated duties as may protect this country from danger. We are all, then, agreed not to remain under the present regulations, and thereby continue to expose agriculture to the evils attendant on a sudden and unrestrained inundation of foreign corn. If, therefore, we are agreed upon that point, and also in the opinion that, to regulate the supply to be imported, by limiting the quantity, would be matter of extreme difficulty, the regulation by duty is evidently the only practicable principle of restraint that is left; and in truth, therefore, the main question is the quantum of duty which it may be fit and proper to impose. It really comes to little more than to decide how we shall, in the committee on the bill, fill up the blanks; and, however important I freely allow these clauses to be, I think they cannot open a very wide field for discussion. Sir, after attentively considering the subject, it appears to me that we may divide those who, although agreeing in the general principle of a duty differ with respect to its amount, into two classes; one class wishing to carry the duty from twenty shillings to forty shillings per quarter, while the other class is of opinion, that a duty of from ten shillings to twenty shillings per quarter will be sufficient. If I am asked in which class I place myself, I answer that, for reasons which I shall hereafter explain, I must, without hesitation, avow myself to belong to the latter class.

And here, before I observe upon the particular scale of duties which it may be proper to adopt, I ought to observe that there is another very important point upon which all parties seem to be agreed. We are all agreed that there is something in the present state of the corn-market, all over the world, which not only justifies but imposes upon parliament, the necessity of treating this great question upon a principle applicable to the present moment, although such a proceeding may be found to require a revision, when matters shall be restored to their natural condition. This principle was distinctly recognized by the agricultural committee of last session; it has also been distinctly admitted by the hon. member for Portarlington. It is enough for us to know that there is a glut of corn every where, not only to justify but enjoin us to act upon a system of adequate precaution. Under such circumstances, it becomes just and wise, and even indispensable, to legislate upon a scale of duties that certainly would not be applicable if the agriculture of the world were in its natural state.

Let us examine a little the history of the division of sentiment on this subject, and consider what it is that can make different minds, agreeing upon the general principle of affording protection to agriculture by a duty on the importation of foreign corn, nevertheless take so different a view of its application, that certain individuals shall propose a duty of from 10s. to 20s. a quarter; while others shall propose a duty of from 20s. to 40s. a quarter. Nay, there is a committee of gentlemen sitting, not far from this House, who call upon parliament to impose at once a duty of 40s.

Now, Sir, the individuals who thus call for a duty of 40s. a quarter must surely have entirely put out of their consideration that there are other charges affecting the importer of foreign corn, besides the charge to be imposed in the shape of duty. Let us consider what must be the charge on the importer of foreign corn before that corn becomes liable to the payment of any duty at all. This point was, I think, at first much underrated by the agricultural committee; and, in fact, it was the due consideration afterwards afforded to it, which gave a new bias to the opinions of a great portion of the members of that committee. I am sure I am justified in saying, that if foreign corn were brought to this country, and were to find a market immediately, it could not arrive under a charge to the importer of less than from 10s. to 12s. per quarter. Transport and insurance would amount to from 5s. to 7s. per quarter; and, allowing to the importing merchant the ordinary commercial profit of 10 per cent, that, assuming the value of the imported corn, including charges, to be 50s. per quarter, would amount to 5s. more. Such would be the charge upon the corn if it were to be sold immediately on its arrival in the ports of this country; but, if it were to lie in the warehouses only for a year (which on an average would be a very short period) a farther charge of 5s. per quarter would be incurred, and of course of 5s. per quarter more, for every subsequent year, during which it might remain unsold. Suppose, however, that we take 10s. as the minimum of the importer's certain expenses, and 5s. as the average contingent charge on the corn remaining unsold, can any persons who do not aim at effectuating a prohibition under the disguise of a duty, think of calling upon parliament to impose a duty of 40s. a quarter upon an article subject to a charge of 10s. or 12s., even if sold immediately, and which may lie two or three years in the warehouses, incurring a farther charge of five shillings a year? Parliament, I am sure, must be composed of materials very different from those which now constitute it, before it will lend itself to such a delusion upon the farmer as to impose a duty of that amount—a duty which it would be impossible to maintain. It would inevitably be repealed, at the very moment when the farmers might deceive themselves with the hope of its coming into operation. It is a proposition which stands on no practical basis; for, it would be as much as to say that we should never have any foreign corn, until corn in this country had reached a famine price of above a hundred shillings per quarter.

But, Sir, when we come to consider the question in connexion with the more moderate duty proposed, I am prepared to contend that that moderate duty will be much more effective and powerful than some gentlemen seem disposed to admit. There exists another delusion, against which I feel it necessary to protest. We have been told that foreign corn, at all times and under all circumstances, can be delivered in the London market, with a fair profit to the grower and importer, at 35s. per quarter. Whence, I ask, can so absurd a notion have originated? I do not mean to deny that, if you proceed to buy foreign corn at a very favourable moment, such as the present, when it is almost a drug in the market, you may be able to procure and import a limited quantity at 35s. per quarter. But can any body be so blind as to suppose that, if our ports were open, any considerable supply could be procured at such a price, or that the grower can have a profit upon it when it is sold at that rate? The truth is, that the foreign agriculturists are in the same state as our own. They are suffering at least as much as we do. The foreign agriculturist sells his corn at the present moment at a loss not less severe than that which is sustained by the English farmer, who sends his corn to Mark-lane, and gets only 47s. per quarter for it. It is a gross and dangerous delusion, therefore, to hold out to the country that, at all times, and under all circumstances, foreign wheat can be profitably imported at 35s. and persons who are not better informed on the subject, ought not to attempt to lead the public mind on this question. It is evidently impossible that the foreign growers can afford to furnish corn of a good quality at any such price. The average price of corn in the market at Dantzic, for the last seven years, without at all taking into the account the charge that must attend importation to this country, has been 48s. per quarter. Now, to impose upon the public, by asserting that there is any danger of a permanent competition with our own corn in foreign corn imported at the price of 35s. per quarter, is such an error, that if it were for nothing more than to undeceive those who have been thus misled, I should think it the duty of his majesty's government to bring the present subject under the consideration of parliament.

In reverting to the other, and, as I conceive, to the much more reasonable class of individuals, I must, in the first place, observe that a great and very natural doubt prevailed in the agricultural committee, whether, in point of fact, the state of men's minds upon this important question was not at present such as to render it difficult to do any thing that would be considered satisfactory. From that source arose the reluctance of the committee to instruct their chairman to propose to parliament any particular measure, however inclined they were to recommend that measure which I am now about to propose; and which they very generally agreed to be, at all events, preferable to the existing law.

The hon. member for Portarlington's proposition is, to impose a permanently fixed duty of 20s. per quarter, descending gradually to 10s., by a diminution of one shilling per quarter in each year. The proposal which I shall have the honour to submit to the House, is—to impose, in the first instance, a duty of 12s. per quarter, with an additional duty of 5s. during the first three months of importation, when the average price of corn is at, or under 80s.; and a duty of 5s., with a like additional duty of 5s., when the price of corn is between 80s. and 85s.; after which an increase duty of one shilling only to be taken. And I understand that a right hon. friend of mine near me has another suggestion to make, namely, to impose, at once, a permanently fixed duty of 15s. per quarter. The House will have the benefit of hearing the arguments of my right hon. friend on the point; and it will rest with them to decide whether this permanently fixed duty of 15s. is preferable to the fixed duty of 12s., with the additional floating duty of 5s. shillings, which I recommend; or better than the duty of 20s. descending annually by one shilling until it falls to 10s., proposed by the hon. member for Portarlington. For myself, although adhering in preference to my own, I am perfectly willing to adopt any one of the propositions, to which parliament may be disposed to give its sanction, as infinitely preferable to the existing law; and I am now desirous of making a few observations as to what will be the real effect of any of them in protecting the agriculture of the country.

Sir, we have heard so much of parliament having done nothing, and of the agricultural committee having done nothing, to give protection to agriculture, that one would really imagine the agricultural interest was, at this moment, suffering under an import of foreign corn, whereas the price of corn is 30s. per quarter below that at which the ports can be opened! It is very unfortunate that those persons who draw up the petitions which are presented to parliament on this subject, will still return, in so many instances, to those misconceptions and inaccuracies which ought no longer to exist. They seem to suppose that protection means price; and that parliament has some charm by which it can give them the price they desire. Parliament, Sir, does not possess any such magic power; and it is really almost time for the agriculturists to cease to reproach us for not affording them sufficient protection, when they are already secured to the extent of having the absolute monopoly of the home market, up to the price of eighty shillings.

To return to my present subject;—the only question now is, what scale of protection, in the nature of duty, we shall give to the agriculturists in the contemplation of such a state of things, as may open the ports? It is agreed on all hands that, under certain circumstances, the country at large ought to enjoy the benefit of the importation of foreign corn; but that it ought to be done under a duty, which shall be so regulated as to diminish [illegible] in proportion as the real [illegible] taking [illegible] it is obvious that, [illegible] to bring the corn [illegible] from the [illegible] the market, unless [illegible] prospect of its being immediately [illegible] considerable profit. Unless there be a strong presumption that it will be sold, no owner of foreign corn will deem it prudent to pay the duty upon it; a duty which, once paid, cannot afterwards be drawn back. It may then be brought to the verge of the market; but, when the owner of it has to pay a duty of either twelve, fifteen, or twenty shillings per quarter upon it, besides his previous outlays, which must have required a considerable capital, he will not send it into the market, unless he expect to cover his expenses and to obtain a reasonable profit. Large importations therefore may be made from abroad, but they cannot enter into injurious competition with our native produce. They will be thrown into warehouses; there the proposed duty will keep them until the supply is actually wanted, and thus the country will be protected from the influx of an inordinate quantity of grain; the foreign corn in warehouses, when the ports again close, being as much excluded from the home market, as if it were on the continent.

In considering the amount of the protection which will be afforded to agriculture; I will suppose that parliament adopts my proposition for imposing a fixed duty of 12s. and 5s. If I am correctly informed that the charge, including commercial profit upon the importation of foreign corn, cannot be less, as I have already observed, than 10s. or 12s. per quarter, (and I have the best authority for the statement), to that charge, we must add the 17s. of duty, making an abatement of from 27 to 29 shillings, in the price which the importer would obtain in the English market. Under the proposition of the hon. member for Portarlington, 3s. more, or from 30 to 32 shillings, per quarter, must be deducted; so that, when wheat is selling in the English market at 80, the foreign importer, even if he sold immediately, cannot hope to get above 50s. a quarter, all charges paid.

Now, I fear the House will begin to think that I have, notwithstanding what I before stated, placed myself in the position of proposing rather an inordinate duty than, on due consideration, I do not believe that this will be found to be so. Let me see what would be the effect of any of these duties on the market. It is perfectly fair to calculate upon the whole of the charges and duties, all outgoings to which the importer must be subject; for they will not operate upon the consumer here, in the first instance, but upon the importer and the foreign grower. Suppose, however, that an individual importing foreign corn, subjects himself to a charge and duty of 27s. per quarter, before he can receive the benefit of an English market. Suppose the price in the English market to be 70s. per quarter—at present foreign corn cannot be imported until the price is 80s.—but suppose the price to be 70 shillings, which the agricultural committee recommend to be the import price, taking 27 from 70, there would remain 43 shillings; which would be all that the importer would put into his pocket from the sale of his corn here. Now, although that price might afford a profit at the present moment, yet, if things were restored to their natural level in Europe, it would not do so. It must also be recollected that, if the ports of this country were to be open, even for the shortest time possible, the price of corn on the continent would immediately, and considerably, advance. At the present moment, the price of good corn in the ports of the Baltic is nearer 35 per quarter than 30. Such a duty, therefore, in ordinary times, would operate as a practical prohibition against the importation of foreign corn, until the price of corn in this country had reached 70s. per quarter or upwards. In former times, a duty of 25s. added to the price of corn, did in fact operate as a complete exclusion. Now, although I do not believe that a duty of 12s., with a floating duty of 5s., would operate in the same way at the present moment, on account of the abundance of corn all over the continent and its low price, yet I am convinced that such a duty would prevent any supply from reaching the market which could prove ruinous to our agriculture.

All these, however, are points which may be more fully and satisfactorily discussed when we come to the details of the measure. When the agreement in the principle of the proposition is so general, and when the difference as to the best mode of carrying that principle into effect lies in so narrow a compass, I do not despair of arriving at some proposition which shall command, not a mere majority, but the general concurrence of the House, and a great proportion of the public opinion in its favour. Whichever of the three plans before alluded to, may be adopted, I shall consider that by its operation we shall be placed in a state of absolute security, compared with the danger to which the country would be exposed, if, during the continuance of the existing law, any contingency should suddenly raise the price of corn to eighty shillings, and thereby open the ports to an unbounded importation of foreign corn, unrestricted by the imposition of any duty whatsoever.

Having stated thus much, my hope and belief is, that there are not many obstacles in the way of the general concurrence which I confidently anticipate. I know that there is in the mind of the hon. member for Portarlington, a great reluctance to adhere to 80*s*., as the price for opening the ports; and that the hon. gentleman wishes to frame such an arrangement as may allow us to make the opening price at once seventy. My right hon. friend, however, (Mr. Huskisson,) although not himself alarmed at the prospect of opening the ports, under proper regulations, at 70*s*., yet considers it very necessary to proceed with caution so as not to alarm the country. In that point I perfectly concur with my right hon. friend. If something can be yielded to the state of opinion in the country, so as to avoid creating an unnecessary apprehension, I hold it to be a moral duty on our part to make the concession. I am therefore prepared to agree with my right hon. friend, and to continue to consider 80*s*., in the first instance, as the price to which corn must reach before the ports can be opened, with the exception of the foreign corn now in the warehouses, to which (in consideration of its present claim, under the wording of the act of 1815, to come in at 80*s*., without paying any duty,) it is proposed to extend the option of entering for home consumption, when the average price of corn shall be 70*s*., paying, however, the duty. This privilege will of course not extend to any foreign corn hereafter to be imported, and will in fact prove an additional protection to the British grower, inasmuch as a limited supply of this nature may possibly prevent the ports from being opened to an indefinite influx from abroad.

With respect to the importance of returning hereafter to a fixed import price, the hon. member for Portarlington and my right hon. friend concur in recommending its entire abolition. My opinion is not so much against the principle of the change, as against the time they would select for its adoption. If, in ordinary times, and in a natural state of things, there would be no difficulty in fixing the quantum of duty necessary to protect the interests of agriculture, without reference to any import price whatever—in such circumstances, the duty, added to the expense of bringing the corn here, would amount to the same thing as fixing an import price; and would operate an adequate practical protection. But, in the present state of things, when corn is so abundant all over Europe, unless we fix an import price in order to shut the ports when the prices are unduly reduced, there would be the danger of an immense quantity of low-priced corn finding its way into the country, notwithstanding the proposed scale of duties. The present is not the moment to try such an experiment, for even were the hon. member for Portarlington, and the other hon. gentlemen who think with that hon. member, right in their opinion on this subject, they cannot persuade the country that they are so. It is far preferable, therefore, in my opinion, to satisfy the country that its interests are not hazarded, than to adopt a measure for which their minds are not yet prepared. In short, Sir, my opinion is, that, in the present unsettled state of the corn market every where, our safest course is, not to take our protection exclusively in import price as at present, or exclusively in duty, as these gentlemen would recommend; but to combine the operation of both principles in a due degree, so that a regulated intercourse may take place, subject, however, to prohibitions whenever that intercourse shall tend to lower the price beyond that point which is consistent with a reasonably remunerating price to the home grower.

Sir, I flatter myself that I have now performed the task I undertook; and that I have fully explained to the House the nature of the propositions which it is the intention of his majesty's government to submit to them. Those propositions grow out of the proceedings of the agricultural committee. The members of that committee know that, although resting on the same principles, they are not, in all their details, precisely the suggestions of my own mind. They know that, in the committee, I opened somewhat a different plan, which, however, I was perfectly ready to modify so as to obtain a general concurrence. I trust I am not making any unbecoming disclosure with respect to the proceedings in the committee, when I declare, that I never sat in a committee engaged in the consideration of a difficult subject, in which, after full deliberation, coincidence of opinion, as to the object in view, was more strongly marked. We all felt that some measure was indispensably necessary; and that, under the difficult circumstances of the case, the adoption of the present proposition would be much safer, than to leave the law on the subject as it now stands.

The first resolution that I shall have the honour to propose, will relate to the million to be applied in advances on British corn, to be warehoused under certain regulations—a measure, in the execution of which, time is valuable, if it is to be adopted. This resolution, it is therefore, desirable, should be first disposed of. The second resolution will be directed to the purpose of enabling persons having foreign corn warehoused under the king's lock, to grind it for re-exportation, under such regulations as may seem to parliament effectually to prevent any part of that foreign corn, so ground into flour, from coming into home consumption. My third proposition will assume the shape of several resolutions, which will go to alter the existing law, with respect to the importation of foreign corn, by establishing a scale of duties, to be levied upon corn imported; but, which will make no alteration in the price at which the ports are in the first instance to be opened—namely 80*s*. These resolutions will, however, provide that, after the ports shall have once been opened at the present price, the import price of 70*s*. shall be hereafter substituted for eighty; certainly not an unreasonable change, when we consider the material alteration which has been effected in our currency since the act of 1815 was passed, when 80*s*. was fixed as the import and remunerating price.

In addition to what I have already stated, it may be proper to call the attention of the House to the fact, that there is at present in the warehouses of this country a large quantity of corn, amounting to not less than between 8 and 900,000 quarters, of which 6 or 700,000 quarters are wheat. As this corn has been imported under the existing law, good faith requires, especially under the particular wording of the act of 1815, that if the parties require, it shall be considered as entitled to remain on the footing on which it was placed by the provisions of that law. When the ports are declared to be open, this corn will be entitled to a free admission, and all this grain might be thrown at once upon the market, without the restraint of duty. As the law now stands, not only will it be poured into the market, as fast as the warehouses can be discharged of it, but it will be brought there together with all the foreign corn that will be freshly imported. It is, therefore, a further object of my resolutions—in order to break this sudden and formidable influx of foreign grain, to allow the foreign corn already warehoused in the country, to come earlier into the market than any other importation of foreign corn, and to permit it to come there when the price shall be seventy. I am sure the House will feel, with the agricultural committee, that, to let in this foreign warehoused corn when the price is seventy shillings, subject however to duty, will not only not endanger the agriculture of the country, but will operate as a positive protection to it; as the influx into the market of this limited quantity already here may operate as a defence against the opening of the ports generally, and consequently against the influx of an unlimited quantity from without.

I have now, I believe, stated every thing necessary for the information of the House. I hope that the committee will allow the resolutions to be proposed and passed pro formâ to-night; with an understanding that they shall be printed and distributed among the members, and that the discussion upon them shall take place on the recommitment of the report; as that will, in all respects, be the most advantageous mode of proceeding. It is my wish to fix an early day for the presentation of the report. If my right hon. friend, the chancellor of the exchequer will take Wednesday for his financial resolutions, I think Friday will be a proper day for the purpose.—The noble lord then concluded, with moving the first of the following series of Resolutions:

1. "That it is the opinion of this Committee, that his majesty be enabled to direct Exchequer bills, to an amount not exceeding one million, to be issued to commissioners in Great Britain, to be by them advanced under certain regulations and restrictions, whenever the average price of wheat shall be under 60*s*. per quarter, upon such corn, the growth of the United Kingdom, as shall be deposited in fit and proper warehouses.

2. "That it is expedient to permit the holders of foreign corn now in warehouses, to have the same ground into flour, for the purpose of exportation, under such regulations as may guard against the fraudulent introduction of any part of the said corn for home consumption.

3. "That whenever foreign wheat shall have been admitted for home consumption, under the provisions of an act made in the 55th year of his late majesty, the scale of prices at which the home consumption of foreign corn, meal or corn, is permitted by the said act, shall cease and determine.

Mr. Western, after observing that he thought, the propositions made by the noble lord might be more advantageously considered in detail at a future period, confessed that he had been much astonished at the introduction in the noble lord's speech of many most important topics, which, in his opinion, were very much misplaced, and would have been much better in the hands of the chancellor of the exchequer. With respect to the resolution for issuing a million to be applied in advances on stored corn, he was persuaded it would not give any material relief. Indeed the noble lord himself did not hold out any hope of adequate relief to the agriculturist. In his opinion, speculations of that kind ought not to be made with the public purse. If they were to take place at all, they ought to proceed from individuals, and not from the government. All the other propositions of the noble lord tended to increase the circulating medium, but not in the manner that would be most advantageous. It had, however, been that night distinctly admitted by the noble lord, and indeed it was generally acknowledged and felt by every intelligent man in the country, that the contraction of the circulating medium was the cause of the present distress. That contraction did not press equally on all classes. The manufacturer was carrying on his trade with a fifth more profit than the agriculturist. The House and the country certainly did not expect the propositions which the noble lord had made to extend the circulating medium; but they were nevertheless of a futile nature. It was something, however, that the baneful operation of the act of 1819 began to be seen and acknowledged by all parties. It was an act which, in fact, was in operation in consequence of the preparations made for it, before it had received the sanction of parliament. It had reduced the country to a state which it was impossible to contemplate without dismay. From that condition it would be impossible to escape without retracing some of our steps. As to the proposition for extending the time of issuing country bank notes of a small value, the effect would be so to depreciate that paper, that it would not constitute a circulating medium satisfactory in its character to the country. Hundreds, nay thousands of victims had been sacrificed to the experiment of 1819. The act of 1819 had, by itself, lowered the price of corn below the sum which it invariably produced previous to the war. It was possible, that the price of corn might advance, but that advance could not be permanent. The diminution of the value of produce was not confined to agriculture: a similar diminution was to be found in the value of all other commodities, the produce of human industry. In 1818, the declared, which was the real value of exports, exceeded the official value in the proportion of 29 per cent: in 1821, the official value exceeded the real value at the rate of 12¼ per cent, making a depreciation in the price of manufactures, within that period, of 41½ per cent. Nothing but the repeal of the act of 1819 would give relief to the agriculturists.

Mr. Ricardo said, that, having a proposition which he wished to submit to the House, he offered himself thus early to the committee. He was desirous of laying his proposition before the House, as the noble lord had laid his, in order that the House might have an opportunity of judging of their several merits. The hon. member for Essex had said, that the noble lord's plan would have the effect of extending the paper currency. He cared not whether it would or would not; for he knew full surely that they had at present as extended a currency as the state of the country required. The present plan—however it might be disguised—was an attack upon the sinking fund. The sinking fund was in principle relinquished. He cared not whether the ultimate accumulation was to be 7,000,000*l*. or 9,000,000*l*.; the present plan was a breach of public faith, so far as the application of the sinking fund could be a breach of faith. There was, in fact, no longer any sinking fund. He solemnly protested against prolonging the charter of the Bank. They had repeatedly called on the chancellor of the exchequer not to enter into any engagement with the Bank for a renewal of their charter. Yet it was now said, that there would be an extension for 10 years, for an object for which it was totally insufficient. It would be a great improvement that the public should be allowed to enter into partnery concerns for supplying their own money transactions, instead of having them intrusted for 10 years longer to the Bank. He had hoped never to have heard of their charter being renewed. The benefit of the paper currency ought to belong to the public. No advantage could ever be derived from the Bank lending money to the public.—With respect to what the noble lord had said of their plans differing very little, he thought there was the most essential difference between them. He (Mr. R.) proposed that a duty of 20*s*. per quarter should be imposed on the importation of wheat when the price rose to 70*s*. The noble lord supposed that he (Mr. R.) had adopted this of choice; but instead of that, he considered it as forced upon him, and he consented reluctantly to this duty, on account of the distress which now existed, and only on that account. There was another very important difference. He proposed that this duty should be imposed when wheat rose to 70*s*., because agriculture was at present so extremely depressed. But the noble lord proposed 80*s*., 85*s*., 70*s*., and brought nearer all of them to the importing price, while he (Mr. R.) differed upon that point, and by imposing a duty of 20*s*. when the price was lower at home, afforded a greater relief to the farmer. He thought the farmers the most distressed class in the country, and the most cruelly used. When the prices rose in consequence of a short harvest, and when the farmers ought to have compensation, they diminished their profits, and let corn in from all parts of the world. This great evil the noble lord did not propose to remedy. If the price rose to 85s., it was only required to pay a duty of 1s., and the poor farmer might be inundated with foreign corn. But another difference between him and the noble lord was this —he (Mr. R.) contended, that there could be no security to the farmer while the price of corn was kept higher in this country than in foreign countries. This had been ably shown in the last year's agricultural report. Did the noble lord propose to relieve the agriculturists from this evil, or to afford any mitigation of it? No. Therefore they would be fully as ill off as now. According to his (Mr. R.'s) plan they would be sure that the prices here could not be much higher than they were abroad. He would read the propositions, which he hoped the noble lord would be prevailed on to admit with his own; if not, he hoped the House would decide respecting it. They were as follow:

1. "That it is expedient to provide that the foreign corn now under bond in the United Kingdom may be taken out for home consumption, whenever the average price of wheat, ascertained in the usual mode, shall exceed 65s. a quarter, upon the payment of the following duties:—Wheat 15s. a quarter; rye, peas, and beans, 9s. 6d. a quarter; barley, bear, or bigg, 7s. 6d. a quarter; oats, 5s a quarter.

2. "That whenever the average price of wheat, ascertained in the usual mode, shall exceed 70s. a quarter, the trade in corn shall henceforth be permanently free, but subject to the following duties upon importation:—Of wheat, 20s a quarter; rye, peas, and beans, 13s. 3d a quarter: barley, bear, or bigg, 10s. a quarter; oats, 6s. 8d. a quarter.

3. "That at the expiration of one year from the time at which the above duties on corn imported shall be in operation, they be reduced as follows:—On wheat, 1s. a quarter; rye, peas, and beans, 8d. a quarter; barley, bear, or bigg, 6d. a quarter; oats, 4d a quarter.

4. "That a like reduction of duties be made in every subsequent year, until the duty on the importation of wheat be 10s. a quarter; rye, peas, and beans, 6s. 7d. a quarter; barley, bear, or bigg, 5s, a quarter; oats, 3s. 4d. a quarter, at which rates they shall henceforth be fixed.

5. "That a drawback or bounty be allowed on the exportation of corn to foreign countries. On wheat, 7s. a quarter; rye, peas, and beans, 4s. 6d. a quarter; barley, bear, and bigg, 3s. 6d. a quarter; oats 2s. 4d a quarter; and that such drawback or bounty in like manner as the importation duty be fixed."

Mr. Brougham thought, that notwithstanding the very proper delay of the main question, it would not be improper to consider some of the minor points. He did not wish to argue whether the distress of which the agriculturists were complaining was peculiar to them, or whether it was less confined in its operation; whether it confined itself to them, or spread itself over the other classes of the community; whether, in short, the whole country was in a state of suffering, or that all which the agriculturists lost was gained by the other classes. He thought that the course of argument which he should adopt, when the great question came to be discussed, would be, that the whole country was suffering. The late events had shown this; and he could not help remarking, that no statesman, no government, could regard it in any other light. If the whole was suffering, then there was nothing to set off against the agricultural distress. He was not prepared to admit that the condition of any one class of the people was good. If the agriculturists were suffering more severely than the manufacturers and commercialists, still their distress was comparative. The others were not to be reckoned prosperous. Moreover, though wages were better, in reference to the high prices which had been formerly paid for provisions, yet the prospect for workmen was extremely precarious. The profits of those who employed workmen, too, were extremely moderate. If, then, in this state of wages and profits, any increase of prices should take place, the altered state of things would reduce others to that distress to which the farmer had fallen. One project which the noble lord had brought forward was a kind of substitute for one which had been on the point of emanating from the agricultural committee. He alluded to the project for the hiring of corn. He knew not who was the author of it. It was not the author of last year's report, he was sure; but if he saw him opposite to him, he congratulated him on one of the most ridiculous contrivances which had ever been invented. It was this signal device: "Whereas there is a difficulty in obtaining a demand for corn, and the farmer cannot sell, God forbid the government should come into the market as a corn-dealer, because the government ought not to become a purchaser, and particularly in corn; therefore, let not government become a buyer, but only a hirer of corn. God forbid that government should resort to corn-dealing; but let it betake itself to pawnbroking, and let the three golden balls be fixed in front of the Treasury." The noble lord had rejected that project, but had now brought forward a substitute for it. Government must not let, but the farmer might borrow. The government came forward as a money-lender; and for every cart-load of corn which he brought, the farmer could obtain the loan of so much money. He objected to this extraordinary project of the noble marquis, not only on account of its absurdity, but of its total inefficacy. The object which the noble marquis had in view with respect to the bankers was, as he understood it, the extension of the act to enable bankers to issue notes under 5*l.* to the year 1833. This measure was liable to many objections. He did not think it would tend to force paper into circulation. So long as the present act continued in force, by which the Bank would be compelled to pay in specie, and the country banks he supposed would also be compelled to adopt the same course, the power of issuing notes under 5*l.* for about 7 or 8 years would only operate as a permission to issue small instead of large notes, but still having the circumstance of their liability to be converted into specie at any time hanging over them. If, however, the proposed measure was not liable to the objection of causing a forced circulation, it would have a tendency to maintain paper money afloat, from the preference which would be given to small notes over coin; for he would admit that if a paper circulation were not liable to many important objections, which could not be alleged against a metallic currency, its advantage, as compared with the latter, on the point of convenience, was manifest. Among the disadvantages attending a paper circulation, was its liability to be forged. It ought also to be considered in what a situation we should be placed, in case of any alarm in the public mind, with a circulation filled with paper, instead of being scantily supplied with paper and nearly filled with gold. In case of a war, for instance, under what great disadvantages the country would labour in having a paper instead of a metallic currency. Even with a natural and healthy paper currency, such an event as he had alluded to would create great inconvenience; but with a currency composed principally of the small notes, which would be thrown into circulation by the permission which was proposed to be given to bankers, the consequences would be disastrous. In such a state of things, how dreadful was it to contemplate the occurrences of a similar event to that which happened in 1793, and which afterwards drove us to adopt measures in 1797, the end of the mischief resulting from which the present generation had not lived to see, and those who came after them would live long before they saw.—With respect to the extension of the charter of the Bank for 10 years longer, he was of opinion that the consideration to be given by the Bank was wholly inadequate to the extent of the benefit. It would have been much more advisable to have refrained from entering into such an improvident bargain for the attainment of a small benefit at the present moment. He had never seen the maxim that "the needy party always goes to the wall" better exemplified than in the projected bargain. He could not perceive any good effect which was likely to result from encouraging banking speculation all over the country. He knew that farmers found no difficulty in obtaining money, provided they could give security for it; but no banking firms, whether consisting of the present, or of an increased number of members, would make advances without receiving good security, which the farmers could not give. Over-trading was one of the causes of the present distress; and therefore any thing tending to increase the facilities of over-trading ought to be anxiously avoided. He would now endeavour to state the nature of the scheme which the noble marquis had, after so much preparation, laid before the House. The dead weight amounted to 5,000,000*l.* in the nature of annuities on many lives. As those lives dropped off the annuities would fall in. Consequently, the 5,000,000*l.* would dwindle gradually every year until at last nothing of that sum would remain. The noble marquis said, he would take 2,800,000*l.* and pay it equally and steadily, never exceeding or falling short of that sum, during the 45 years, to which the calculation extended. By this means he would set 2,200,000*l.* free. It was necessary, however, that the noble lord should get this money somewhere, and he applied to contractors, who were to pay it for the first 16 years, without deriving any benefit; after that period, they might calculate upon lives continually dropping in, and their gains would go on increasing every year, until at last, they would perhaps have to pay nothing, although they would continue to receive the same sum as before. The principle of the sinking fund, to which he could not agree, was, to relieve posterity at the expense of the present oppressed generation: and the principle of the noble marquis's plan was, to relieve the present generation at the expense of posterity. This scheme of farming out the invalids might be applied to any other fund: there was no limit to the application of the principle if once it were admitted. He did not doubt, that persons would be found to undertake the job; but the House might depend upon it that they would make the country pay smartly for it. And all this was done because ministers would not give up an empty name. They would saddle the country with all the expense of maintaining the clumsy machinery by which this scheme was to be carried on, in order to make the public believe that a sinking fund was in existence, when at the same time it was evident that there could be no sinking fund, but that arising from a clear surplus of revenue over expenditure. He had never said, that a sinking fund, on a sound principle, was not a great advantage. To a nation groaning under a debt of 800,000,000*l.*, it would be the best thing possible to have a clear excess of revenue over the necessary expenditure, and that that surplus should be employed every year in paying off a certain portion of the debt. But, were we at present in a situation to pay off any part of our debt? To pay the interest, which was all that we were bound by contract to do, was as much as the suffering people could perform. Until the surplus of revenue increased, and taxation was diminished, he would put a stop to the operation of the sinking fund.—With respect to the corn question, he thought the noble marquis was mistaken in supposing that the distinction between his plan and that of the hon. member for Portarlington consisted only in the difference of superstructure: the distinction was in the principle. The noble marquis proposed to relieve the distresses of the country by the operation of the sinking fund, and by the plan with regard to the dead weight; but of the diminution of expenditure the noble marquis had said not one word. The House would not do its duty if it suffered the session to pass, without forcing the noble marquis and his colleagues to have recourse to the only means of obtaining a true and wholesome income—namely, a rigid parsimony in the management of the public money.

Mr. Huskisson agreed with the hon. and learned gentleman, that the only real sinking fund was that which was composed of a clear excess of revenue over expenditure. He declared that he would object to the plan proposed, if he thought it in any way touched upon the principle of the sinking fund. Another part of his noble friend's plan, went to extend the period during which country bank notes, under the value of 5*l.* were to be allowed to circulate, and also to relieve the country banking-houses from their present limitation of partners. He had been surprised when the hon. member for Essex asserted, that government could not continue the circulation of those 5*l.* country notes, without repealing a part of Mr. Peel's bill. He begged to contradict that statement most decidedly. The present plan, so far from being suggested because the measure of 1819 was repented of, was at all points perfectly consistent with that measure; and he (Mr. H.) in the committee upon the bill of 1819, had actually proposed that the present plan should at that time be recommended to parliament. With respect to 1*l.* notes, whether those notes were issued by country banks under the old limitation, or by country banks with an unlimited number of partners, their credit was secured by their convertibility at pleasure into Bank of England notes or into cash. But he did not believe that, on the removal of the limitation, banks would start up like mushrooms, as the hon. gentleman had predicted. Let the House look at the state of the banks in Scotland, which were already free from limitation. Had any of those banks failed of late years from over trading? Was it found that they had made improvident advances among their own partners; or had it been found, as was too frequently the case in England, that men embarked in the banking business, in order to prop up other hazardous speculations? Yet the banks of Scotland issued one pound notes, and presented a fair example to justify the experiment. With respect to forgery, the number of trials for notes forged on the country banks was very inconsiderable, and he doubted whether in Scotland one man had been executed for many years. At all events, he was not to be deterred, by the existence of some objections, from the adoption of any measure involving a great national object. But, were not bills of exchange liable to be forged as well as bank-notes? And was not the number of persons tried for the issue of counterfeit coin to be looked to, when the hon. and learned gentleman laid so much stress on the prosecutions for forgery? He believed it would be found, that 280 convictions had taken place in the course of the last year, for the crime of counterfeiting the coin of the realm. The hon. and learned gentleman had said, that he did not consider the other classes of the community as being at all in a flourishing situation, and that even if they were, that circumstance could not console him for the distressed state of the agricultural classes. It was true that the evil was of a most appalling description; but still he could not agree that there was no consolation in seeing that the other classes were better off at present than they had been. He would admit, that it was no compensation to be told this; but surely it ought to console them in some measure. That the manufacturers, and the working classes generally, were in a state of comparative ease and comfort, was undeniable. He defied any man upon any other principle to account for the known fact, that the produce of the taxes upon consumption was gradually and steadily rising. The hon. and learned member had mentioned a plan, which he had placed in a ludicrous light, calling it a pawnbroking plan. He (Mr. H.) knew nothing of any such plan, but he would state to the House what had occurred in the last year's committee. An hon. friend of his, not now present (the member for Taunton), looking at the situation in which the country was placed, with a monopoly of corn, and a prohibition of trade in that article, had given it as his opinion, that no plan could give such effectual relief to the market, as that government should buy up the surplus in years of abundance, keeping it, to be dealt out in years of deficiency, and so suiting in both cases the supply to the demand. To that proposal he (Mr. H.) had objected upon principle. But, if a country chose to proceed out of the fair legitimate course of trade, and to take up and persevere in an artificial system, some measure, not in itself desirable, might become absolutely necessary as an antidote to the dangers of that system. If this country would place itself in the situation of having no free intercourse with other nations in the trade in corn, and still continued liable to the fluctuation of seasons, it followed of course, that a wise permanent system would be to try if possible to hoard the surplus of a year of plenty to meet the possible exigency of an unfavourable harvest. He (Mr. H.) did not recommend the plan which he was about to mention; but some measure was necessary both for the grower who would be ruined by an overstocked market in full years, and for the consumer, who would want protection against the scarcity of bad ones. He did not recommend the plan as good in itself; but he thought it less injurious than the plan of the hon. member for Taunton; and the plan he suggested was this:—It had long been the policy of England to give a bounty upon the exportation of corn; the suggestion was, to convert that which, according to old principles, had been a bounty upon exportation, into a small advantage upon the hoarding of corn. No money was to be advanced by government. No three balls were to be hoisted. It was merely giving something like the amount of the old bounty in another shape. He admitted freely that this system was a bad one, but it was a bad system growing out of a bad course of policy. The right hon. gentleman then alluded to the proposition as to the conversion of the annuity for lives into an annuity for a term of years. The hon. and learned gentleman had talked of the expensive machinery attendant upon that proceeding: he could assure the House that no arrangement could be more simple. He would not at that late hour detain the House by opening or explaining the resolutions which he intended to move. He would lay them on the table, and remain satisfied with their being printed. When the House met again on the subject, he would state the cause of the difference between the resolutions proposed by him and those proposed by his noble friend. The course he should suggest was, that the resolutions being put pro forma, the chairman should report progress upon the first resolution. The whole of the resolutions might then be printed, and handed about among the members. The right hon. gentleman was about to sit down; but several voices called for the reading of his resolutions. He accordingly read them as follow:

1. "That the ports of the United Kingdom were shut against the importation of foreign wheat, for home consumption, in the month of February, 1819, the average price being then 78*s.* 7*d.* a quarter, and that they have remained closed ever since; the average price of the year 1820 having been 65*s.* 7*d.*—of the year 1821, 54*s.* 5*d.*—and of the three first months of 1822, 47*s.* 9*d.* a quarter.

2. "That in the year 1819, the quantity of British wheat imported into the port of London was 300,416 quarters; in 1820, 390,009 quarters; and in 1821, 494,828 quarters; and that during the whole of this period of three years, the supply, in all the principal markets of the United Kingdom, appears uniformly to have exceeded the demand, notwithstanding the wants of an increasing population, and other circumstances, which have probably produced an increased annual consumption.

3. "That this excess of the supply above the demand must have arisen either from an extent of corn tillage more than commensurate to the average consumption of the country; or from a succession of abundant harvests upon the same extent of tillage; or from the coincident effect of both these causes.

4. "That in the fluctuation of seasons, the effect of the present corn law must be, to expose, sometimes the grower of corn to the losses incident to an over redundant produce, and at other times the consumer to the pressure inseparable from dearth; that the free importation of foreign corn (the remedy provided by the law for the latter evil), if wanted to a great amount, must be precarious in proportion as the demand is unusual; and that against the former evil the law affords to the grower no relief whatever.

5. "That the alternate evils of redundancy and scarcity cannot fail to be aggravated by the alternate excitement and depression to which the agriculture of the United Kingdom must be exposed, under the present system of our corn laws.

6. "That another evil effect of this system is, to convert farming into a hazardous and gambling speculation, which, however prudently managed, must occasionally involve great losses to the capitals engaged in agriculture.

7. "That a free trade in foreign corn, subject to certain duties on the importation thereof for home consumption, was at all times permitted, prior to the act of the 55th Geo. 3rd, c. 26.

8 "That since the passing of that act, by which such importation is prohibited until the average price of wheat shall have reached or exceeded, for a certain time, 80*s.* a quarter, and other grain in proportion, a great accumulation of foreign corn has taken place in the warehouses of this country, and of the continent.

9. "That to obviate the prejudicial effects of that act, and to ensure a regular supply of grain, at prices as much as possible steady and moderate, it is expedient to provide for the repeal of so much of the said act as prohibits, under certain prices, the importation of foreign grain for home consumption.

10. "That in order to render this repeal safe to the grower of British corn, and gradual in its operation, under the present accumulation of foreign grain in the warehouses of this country and in the ports of the continent, it is expedient to provide that the foreign wheat now under bond in the United Kingdom may be taken out for home consumption, upon the payment of a duty of 15*s.* per quarter, as soon as the average price of wheat, ascertained in the usual mode, shall exceed 70*s.* a quarter; and that at the expiration of three months from the date of such admission of warehoused wheat into home consumption, or so much sooner as the average price shall exceed 80*s.* a quarter, wheat from abroad may be admitted, upon the payment of the like duty.

11. "That the trade in foreign corn shall thenceforth be permanently free; but subject to the following duties upon importation, or when taken out of warehouse for home consumption:—wheat, 15*s.* a quarter, when the price shall not exceed 80*s.*; and when above that price, 5*s.*; and above 85*s.*, one shilling;—rye, peas, and beans, 9*s.* 6*d.* a quarter, when the price shall not exceed 53*s.*; and when above 53*s.*, one shilling;—barley, bear or bigg, 7*s.* 6*d.* a quarter, up to 40*s.*; and when above that price, one shilling;—oats, 5*s.* a quarter, up to 28*s.*: and when above that price, one shilling."

The chairman reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, April 30.

ROMAN CATHOLIC CLAIMS.] Mr. Peel presented a petition from the university of Oxford against the Roman Catholic claims.

Sir T. Lethbridge took that opportunity of declaring his opinion, that if the motion that night about to be made by a right hon. gentleman was carried, the whole object would have been accomplished. The reason why petitions had not been numerously laid on the table, was, that the great body of the people were so absorbed in the consideration of their own distresses as to be totally indifferent to all political subjects. He protested, however, against their silence being construed in favour of that motion. The people still continued decidedly hostile to the question. He trembled, however, at the probable effect of the right hon. gentleman's (Mr. Canning's) eloquence: he trembled, because he himself had too lately been an instance of its captivation. A few nights ago, he came down with the intention of voting with the noble lord (J. Russell), until he had heard the very eloquent speech of the right hon. gentleman. He had a right to argue, that the same influence which that eloquence had had over his mind, might, on the present question, be equally persuasive over the minds of others, and lead them from the true and strict path of their duty [loud laughing]. Being himself an instance, he thought it right that members should be cautioned. He did believe that the great body of the people required a more adequate share of the representation; and such a proposition he should support when brought forward in a manner more reconcileable to his feelings.

Roman Catholic Peers Bill.] Mr. Canning rose and said:*

Sir; if I could flatter myself with the expectation of conveying to the minds of those who hear me, the same conscientious conviction that is impressed upon my own, of the justice and expediency of the measure which I am about to recommend to the consideration of the House, I should approach this question with a feeling of confidence such as I have never before experienced. If I now approach it with feelings of a mixed nature; with much of hope, indeed, but with much of trepidation and anxiety, it is because, if my motion should unhappily fail of success, (I trust it will not fail) I have no refuge in the doubtfulness of my case, none in the paucity of arguments to be adduced in support of it, from the painful but unavoidable conclusion, that a cause unquestionably just will have been lost by the inability of its advocate.

Before I proceed to state the grounds on which I shall call on the House for the removal of the disabilities under which Roman Catholic peers labour with respect to their undoubted right of sitting and voting in parliament, it may be expedient to get rid of some particular and preliminary objections, which have been made, rather to the manner and form than to the principle of the proposition which I am bringing forward; some within the walls of this House, others in conversation out of doors.

The first objection which I shall notice, is one which was originally started by the hon. member for Bristol (Mr. Bright) and has been just now repeated by the hon. member for Somersetshire, that this motion for the admission or rather the restoration of the Roman Catholic peers to parliament, is an insidious attempt to obtain a partial decision on the whole of what is called the Catholic question. In contradiction to this objection comes another, which asserts, that the separation of one class of the Catholic community from the rest, must necessarily prejudice the whole. I might in fairness set these contradictory objections face to face, and leave the one to balance the other; but I will offer a word or two on each. If my measure be a step to advance the general question, it cannot prejudice that question; if it be, on the other hand, an obstacle to the success of the general question, then surely it must be hailed with delight by those who wish that question to be lost.

In one sense, I admit, the proposed measure would be of advantage to the general question; in as much as the gain of any one of the several parts of which that question consists, would be a deduction from the amount of the difficulties to be overcome in carrying the whole. There is another and a more general sense, in which the mere introduction of the present measure may be an advantage to the general question; I mean from the discussion which it will occasion. In all cases, founded in truth and in justice, frequent discussion is of itself an advancement; and those who would find fault with me on that principle, tacitly admit that their view of the subject will not bear the test of discussion. But it would not be enough for their purpose to suppress discussion alone. Unless they can check the course of thought and arrest the flight of time, every hour must bring us nearer and nearer to that establishment of truth upon which ultimate success depends. In any other sense, I deny that the present question can be considered objectionable, on the plea of taking an unfair advantage: and it has one great recommendation peculiar to itself, that it places the matter of dispute on a basis accurately circumscribed, relieving it from many complicated considerations, in which the more general question is necessarily involved. Hitherto it has been objected to the advocates of the Catholic question, that they did not confine themselves to law and fact;—that they assumed data, and wandered into generalities; soared to the highest regions of abstract principle, and ranged in the widest fields of remote analogy; but that they did not respect the limitations of statutes and the landmarks of the constitution. I trust that in what I am now about to submit to the House I shall be able to change place with my antagonists; to meet them on the very ground which they pride themselves upon choosing—the ground of fact and law; and, without undervaluing the general topics which belong to the general question, to adhere strictly to the matter of the notice which I have given; and to address myself no further to that general question, than the discussion of principles which belong to it as a whole, must, in the consideration of one of its parts, render necessary and unavoidable.

The other objection comes, I presume, from friends of the general question, who are so high-minded as to be indifferent to any progress towards success, unless the whole question can at once be carried; not because they think that this partial concession will confer valueless privileges, but that it will strip the general cause of many topics of declamation. Much as I am disposed to admit the efficacy of discussion, I confess myself not one of those who, to enrich future debates, would deprive myself of present practical advantage. If there be any force in such an objection, why not go back to the time when the penal code, with all its oppressive and odious inflictions, was in full, unmitigated operation;—when even the most jejune statements must have been powerfully eloquent, from the mere strength of the facts, the very amount of the sufferings which they had to detail? How must such objectors lament the removal of so many disabilities, under which the Roman Catholic has long ceased to groan! How must they regret, that from an early period of the late reign up to the present time so many of the most galling fetters have been gradually taken off, and leave little more than the mark of them now visible! How must they regret the act of 1778, which restored to the Roman Catholics the right of property; the act of 1791, which removed many vexatious disabilities, with respect to the exercise of religion, to professions, to civil, and in several important instances, political rights! How must they deplore the act of 1793, which gave to the Irish Roman Catholics—in many instances advisedly, distinctly, specifically—in all more remotely, and by sure implication—political power and consequence, in giving them the elective franchise! How must their sorrow have been increased by the measure which, five years ago, silently opened the army and navy to Catholic enterprize, bravery, and ambition! I suppose, Sir, all these boons are to be lamented; because if still withholden, they would have formed the ground-work of a most impressive speech, the topics of which are now comparatively reduced! I need not say how differently I view this matter, and how unwise I consider the opinion, that the advantage of better grounds of complaint would have been cheaply purchased at the expense of continued privations.

But another objection is coupled with the last, which entitles it to further consideration. It is suggested, that the noble persons interested in the present measure have some disinclination to the introduction of it, because it does not include all those who are connected with them by the same religion. I give those noble individuals credit for the most liberal feelings on this subject; but I will add, that I have never appeared in this House as the sworn advocate of the Roman Catholics (I may have used the word advocate, but if so, it was in its common and popular sense—not as implying any special commission from them—or consultation with them); I have never pleaded for them, except on public principles—on principles of state policy, and of national benefit. I seek not their thanks or their praise; nor can I ask their opinions on a parliamentary measure of relief; and least of all the opinions of those among them who have the most peculiar interest in such a measure. Such would be my answer, if I had reason to believe the suggestion to which I have referred, to be correct; but I am relieved from any embarrassment on this point, by a communication which I have this day received from the individual of the highest rank in the Catholic—indeed in the British—peerage, which I have permission to read to the House. I will not abuse that permission by reading the whole letter; it is sufficient to say, that after alluding to the reports which have been circulated as to the objections said to exist in the minds of some of the Roman Catholic lords, the letter concludes with these words, "I am to assure you, on their authority, that there is no foundation whatever for such report." I will not add any thing to this declaration, except only to repeat to a larger audience what I have before said in this House, and often in private—that as I did not think it any part of my public duty to consult the opinion of the parties interested in this motion, so I declare, upon my honour, that the proposition which I shall have the honour to move, has not been suggested to me directly or indirectly by them, or by any person connected with them. The responsibility is entirely my own; and if I call upon parliament to legislate in the case of a few individuals, I do so as little from any individual instigation as if that legislation were to embrace the whole Roman Catholic community, or the whole community of England.

Another objection which I have somewhere heard is, that there is something peculiarly improper in originating in the House of Commons, a measure which concerns exclusively the rights and privileges of the House of Peers. This is an objection, the validity of which must be mainly decided by precedent; and if I look to precedent, I find that the very act, the operation of which I now propose to correct, originated in the House of Commons. The disqualification which it created, was peculiar to the Peers. It imposed, indeed, on both Houses of parliament the declaration against transubstantiation, and so forth, which we still take, at our respective tables, in this House and in the House of Lords:—but up to the passing of the act of the 30th of Charles 2nd, the relative situation in which the Roman Catholic Peers stood with respect to Roman Catholic commoners was this; the commoners were already required to take the oath of supremacy; the peers were not. The Roman Catholic commoners, therefore, were disabled from sitting in parliament, so far as the oath of supremacy disqualified—the Roman Catholic peers held their seats unquestioned. Although it be true, therefore, that the act legislated in apparently equal terms with respect to both, it in effect only confirmed a disability under which Commoners before laboured, but created for the peers one to which they had not been subjected before. If that act, then, originated with the House of Commons, in the name of common sense, what reason can there be for supposing, that as the Commons originated the disability, they may not also originate the relief?

But why need I confine myself to this particular act? The act of the 5th Elizabeth originated with the House of Commons. The act for disqualifying the bishops originated with this House in 1641; an evil time, undoubtedly—an evil example, therefore, if it stood alone; but peculiarly applicable to the present argument, since twenty years afterwards the Commons repaired the outrage inflicted through that act, by originating the act of the 13th Charles 2nd, by which the bishops were restored to their seats in parliament. When I have such precedents before me, what need have I to go farther? or how can it be maintained for an instant, that there is any thing disrespectful to the other House of Parliament in originating a measure in which their privileges are concerned? much less that it is disrespectful that the same House which created the grievance, should in an hour of late but proper penitence, suggest the relief?

This last objection reminds me of another which may appear to be countenanced by the speech of the hon. member for Somersetshire—a speech so flattering to myself, that I am bound to acknowledge it with thankfulness, at the same time that I venture to dispute the inference to which it might seem to lead. I have been told that I am guilty of inconsistency in introducing a principle of reform in the House of Lords, while I persevere in opposing a reform in the House of Commons. This being merely an argumentum ad hominem, I may not perhaps be justified in taking up the time of the House to refute it; but as it has been at all times deemed excusable if not important, that the proposer of any measure should endeavour to stand well as to his motives before those to whom he proposes it, I will say a few words on this subject. It often happens very provokingly, that the point on which a man piques himself most, is that which is selected for a charge against him. Now, I really do flatter myself, that instead of being liable to this charge of inconsistency in bringing forward the present motion, I can show it to be perfectly consistent with every principle on which I have resisted parliamentary reform. In resisting parliamentary reform, I have always contended, that it behoves the proposer of such a measure distinctly to define his meaning; whether he aims at constructing the House of Commons anew?—or at restoring it to a particular state or condition in which it was at some former period? If the former, I require the nature of the meditated change and its principle and extent to be fully described. If the latter, I ask at what time the House of Commons was precisely such as the reformers wish to make it?—These I hold to be necessary tests of any measure of reform; and by these tests am I willing to have my own proposition tried.—To the first question I answer, that my object is not to reconstruct the House of Lords, but to bring it back to a state in which it formerly existed; and if desired to point out the period at which it did exist in the state to which I wish to restore it, I point to the period which terminated on the 30th Nov. 1678; on which day the royal assent was given to the act, by which Roman Catholic peers were excluded from the House of Lords. Up to that day, by immemorial custom, peers had held their seats in parliament unquestioned, and without disqualification on account of religious opinions; and in the 5th Elizabeth,* that right was recognized by special statute. The principle of my measure, therefore, is not innovation, but restoration; and if further questioned as to the extent to which this restoration would go, I reply—to the immediate admission of six English Catholic peers; and by possibility, at some future time, to the admission of about the same n mber of Irish.

I have thus put my proposition to the tests to which I am in the habit of requiring that every measure of reform should be submitted: and I trust that I have vindicated myself from the imputed inconsistency of supporting a reform in one House, whilst I oppose it in another. I have shown, that my reform has all those characters, without which none can be safe or ought to be tolerated; that it is something precise and intelligible; which brings the constitution back to a state in which it had before existed; and of which the operation is certain, and the consequences limited and defined. But I will go farther: I will show, not only that my measure is not innovation but restoration—but that it is a restoration founded upon principles of the strictest justice. I will show, that it restores rights, the suspension of which arose from causes that no longer exist, and was justified on pretences which were never true.

Having, I trust, cleared away all preliminary objections, I proceed now to the substance of my motion. The history of our legislation as affecting the Roman Catholics, may be divided into three periods;—the first, dating from the Reformation, or to be more precise, from the beginning of the reign of Elizabeth, to the restoration of Charles 2nd; the second, from the reign of Charles 2nd to the Revolution; and the third, from the Revolution to the reign of his late majesty, the auspicious æra of the relaxation of the penal code. This division, unequal in point of time, is dictated by the difference of the principles of legislation which distinguish these several periods. The precautions, and in the latter part of her reign, the severities of Elizabeth were caused, if not justified, by the disquietude of one religion not altogether put down, and the instability of another not wholly established; and by those frequent plots against her crown and her life, which were instigated by the influence of foreign politics, and connected an opposition to her belief with a refusal of allegiance to her authority. The security of Elizabeth's throne was identified with the establishment of the reformed religion.—In the third period (passing the second for the present), the period from the Revolution to the time when legislation against the Roman Catholics ceased—the causes which operated against them, were a deposed and exiled monarch who was of the same religious belief, a new dynasty, and a disputed succession. Politics were here again blended with religion; and the one was considered as a sort of test of the other. In such a state of things, it was natural that William 3rd and his advisers, not only should not do away any of the laws which they found already enacted against the Roman Catholics; that they should rather adopt and strengthen them with additions calculated to discountenance the religion of the exiled monarch, to discourage the acquisition of property by those who with that property might assist his rival, and to disarm those hands which were likely to be lifted against the new establishment. To render his Roman Catholic subjects feeble and powerless, was to deprive his rival and his foreign enemies of the means of disturbing the tranquillity of his kingdom: and the measures which king William pursued for this purpose must be considered not only as measures of internal regulation but of foreign policy and war. The revocation of the edict of Nantes, some years before, had contributed not a little to the exasperation of religious animosities: and it can hardly be doubted that something like the same policy suggested the expediency of endeavouring to drive the Catholics of England (though by a less open and violent process) to expatriation.

I state these considerations, without either condemning or justifying them: without condemning, because much allowance must be made for the political exigency of the times;—without justifying because it, would indeed be painful to justify, in cold blood, the harsh and terrible enactments of irritation, jealousy and fear. In Ireland, especially, where so much greater a proportion of the people was hostile to the government, and favoured the cause of the dethroned king, the system towards the Catholics was one of unmixed oppression. The endeavour there was, to grind the people to the dust to loosen the holds of family and kindred, to reduce society to barbarism, and to erect a garrison of Protestants amidst a nation of Catholic slaves. But was this attempted in mere wantonness or caprice? No: but because the Protestant religion in Ireland was less settled; and because the opposition to it, was almost in every instance in that day, connected with the support of a competitor for the Crown.

In both those periods, therefore,—that of Elizabeth and of the Revolution—the cause of the Protestant religion was also the cause of the throne; and the enactment of penal statutes against Roman Catholics was dictated more by policy than by faith. The intervening period comprizes the reign of Charles 2nd, to which I shall now come, and with which alone we are for this night's question concerned. The measures against the Roman Catholics, passed in that reign, not only constitute the object of our consideration on this occasion, but they are almost the only remains of legislative enactments against the Roman Catholics, which survive at the present day. For in the merciful reign of our late sovereign George 3rd, almost the whole of the penal laws of the two periods to which I have already referred, were repealed. The 5th Eliz. (which was confirmed by the 30th Charles 2nd), and the 13th Eliz., prohibiting all communication with the see of Rome (which, though technically still in force, has long fallen into disuse), are, I believe, nearly all that remain of the penal and restrictive statutes of Elizabeth: and a statute of queen Anne, which transfers to the two universities advowsons of livings possessed by Roman Catholics, is, I believe, the only material remnant of the penal and restrictive code enacted since the Revolution. There were till lately other acts in force, prescribing certain oaths which excluded Catholics from the army and navy; but that exclusion was practically done away by an act of 1817. I say, I believe this to be as I state it—because I will not venture positively to affirm so general a proposition. That in some corner of an obscure statute, there may not still lurk some penal or restrictive clause, which has not been swept away, I cannot undertake to aver; but, speaking generally, I believe I may say, that the whole of the penal enactments which remain in force against the Roman Catholics, will be found within the period of the reign of Charles 2nd.

In narrowing the compass of the debate within these limits, we get rid of abundance of matter which has encumbered the principle of the general Catholic question, and distracted our debates in former sessions. The Anti-catholic legislation of Charles 2nd, may be discussed on its own grounds. It holds to the period which preceded it, principally by the very statute which is the occasion of my motion—by which statute the 5th Eliz. was confirmed and extended; and to the period which followed it, by the continuance or re-enactment of this statute[1] (with other acts of Charles 2nd), after the Revolution.

[1] "The Oath of Supremacy, mentioned in the act of Charles 2nd, was remodelled by the act of the 1st of William and Mary; the declaration remained unchanged.

In entering upon the transactions of the reign of Charles 2nd, I am aware that I enter upon the most debateable ground of our history. The account of it given by writers on different sides, are extremely partial; but I shall endeavour to state the facts necessary to my argument, without adopting the extravagancies of either party. I think I may safely assert, then, that Charles though not avowedly, was secretly a Catholic; that his brother was avowedly of that religion; that the latter, if not the former, was justly suspected of designing to re-establish that religion, and to subvert the constitution of the kingdom; and that in consequence parliament looked with very great jealousy to the prospect of the duke of York's succession to the throne; that in effect the predominant feeling of the parliament of that day was dread of a Popish successor. If that point be kept steadily in view, it will throw light upon much that would be otherwise obscure, and make clear much that would otherwise seem complicated and difficult; it will divest some of the measures of that parliament of the stain of excessive rigour—and some of the principle actors in them of the appearance of an inconsistency not otherwise to be explained.

That the great object which the House of Commons had in view, was the debarring the duke of York from the succession, is plainly evinced by their repeated remonstrances, and by the many indications of ill-will towards the duke of York personally, which preceded the direct attempt at his exclusion. In stating these facts, I do not mean to impute blame, but simply to show the object of the House of Commons. Their proceedings were steadily directed to their object. The Test act (the 25th Charles 2nd), though introduced ostensibly for the purpose of affecting all officers, civil and military, dissenters from the established church—was evidently aimed at the duke of York: and it had immediately the effect intended by its promoters; for as soon as it was passed, the duke laid down his office of lord high admiral of England. The address to the Crown against the duke of York's marriage with a Catholic, and the address to remove the duke of York from the king's presence and councils, which was first agitated while the act of the 30th Charles 2nd was pending in the House of Lords, were of the same character. To crown all, the act of the 30th Charles 2nd itself, the immediate object of this night's discussion, while its avowed object was to exclude from both Houses of parliament, peers or commoners who refused to take the Oath of Supremacy, and to subscribe the declaration therein contained, was manifestly pointed against the duke of York; whom, if it had been passed into a law as sent up from the House of Commons, it would have reduced to utter insignificance. In the House of Lords, the duke of York, not without some difficulty, succeeded in procuring an exemption in his favour. When the bill was sent back to the Commons, this exemption was adopted there by a majority of only two. And then, and not till then, it was, that the House of Commons, finding the duke protected from the operation of this act, resorted to the more direct measure of an Exclusion bill. Removed from office by the Test act, and from the king's presence and councils by address—if they could also have removed the duke of York from parliament, their work was done:—and done, as the soberer part of his opponents would have wished, without a measure of so strong and questionable a character as a breach in the legitimate succession to the throne. That the king was perfectly aware of the object of the Commons, is plain from several of his messages and speeches; but more particularly from a speech which he made to both Houses of parliament, while the act of the 30th was pending in the House of Lords, in which speech he promises to agree to any "reasonable bills," to "make them safe in the reign of his successor, so as they tend not to impeach the right of succession." Rapin, an historian not disposed to throw a deeper shade on the acts of the House of Commons than truth requires, plainly intimates that through the whole of these proceedings, the desire to exclude the duke of York from the Crown was all along the governing motive of the Commons—that they attacked him step by step; and that when all the smaller measures failed, or were evaded, then they resorted to an Exclusion bill, as the ultimate and effectual remedy.*

* "The Commons not satisfied with these slight precautions, prepared a bill to prevent the danger from so many Papists sitting in parliament, and particularly in the House of Lords. But this was only a preparative for What inference do I draw from this series of transactions?—that the parliament of that day were wrong?—that the succession of the duke of York ought not to have been guarded against as dangerous?—No. But simply that this was the real and undoubted danger against which the parliament were anxious to provide, and that the penal enactments of that day rested on the ground of this great state necessity. But if such was the ground of enacting, what is now the ground for continuing those penalties? Where is now the Popish successor to the throne? Where is now the danger of Popish ascendency within these realms? and if there be none in existence, are we justified in retaining the same penal measures as our ancestors framed in peril and necessity—now, when all the peril is passed, and when the necessity exists no longer?

In reviewing these events, I do not mean to enter into a disquisition how far a great and legitimate political object does morally justify a sacrifice of the rights of innocent individuals; neither do I mean here to affirm or to deny the guilt or innocence of the parties affected by the measures which I have described. I might without prejudicing my argument, assume either supposition: I might concede or might contend, either that the necessity of getting rid of the duke of York's succession did or that it did not, justify the expulsion of the Catholic peerage from parliament. The question in either case alike recurs—shall we, who have not the same motive or excuse of danger, wantonly and vexatiously continue the same remedy? and when called upon to remit the penalty of an exclusion now no longer maintainable on the grounds on which it was enacted, shall we convert a measure of temporary precaution into one of permanent privation and punishment?

My first argument, therefore, for getting rid of the consequences of the act of the 30th of Charles 2nd, by which peers professing the Român Catholic religion were first excluded from their seats in the House of Lords is, that the main object of that act was not the one which in fact was effected by it; that the intent of those who framed that act, was to exclude the duke of York, the popish heir presumptive to the throne; that though the provisions of it were made general, its real aim was particular—that the Roman Catholic peers were comprehended in that aim only because it was suspected that they might be abettors of the duke of York's politics, and instruments of his designs. A careful perusal of the history of those times will satisfy any candid mind, that the pervading principle of all the proceedings of the Commons, was the exclusion of the duke of York; and that this and other acts were but so many different ways of compassing that object.

I come next to enquire into the particular circumstances under which this act of the 30th of Charles 2nd was passed. In the midst of the jealousies and apprehensions of the Commons, and while the project of excluding the popish heir presumptive was working in their minds; in the hottest ferment of political controversy, came to the aid of the exclusionists, the memorable popish plot: a plot, which I will not (amidst conflicting testimonies) venture to affirm to have been pure invention and unmixed falsehood—but upon which the concurrent opinions of history and posterity have stamped the characters of perjury and fraud. The season, as Mr. Hume well observes, "was peculiarly fit for seizing on the fears and apprehensions of a people jealous to an extraordinary degree, and alive to every suspicion. The cry of 'a plot!' all on a sudden struck their ears; and they, like men affrighted and in the dark, took every figure for a spectre. The terror of each man became the source of terror to another; and an universal panic being diffused, reason and argument, and common sense and common humanity, lost all influence over them."

We are in the habit of referring, and often justly, to the wise and firm manner in which our ancestors asserted and maintained their liberties, and secured the transmission of them to their posterity. But it is not easy to look at the proceedings of the parliament in 1678, without expressing a doubt whether that be a period which an historian would be disposed to select, as exhibiting in the most favour-the more easy prevention of the danger with which religion was threatened, from the hopes conceived by the Papists of seeing the duke of York on the throne after his brother, who neither had, nor expected to have, any legitimate issue. This danger caused several members of the Commons to form the project of a bill for excluding the duke of York from the succession to the Crown; but this was done by degrees."—RAPIN, Vol. 2 (folio) p. 692.

able light that eminent firmness and wisdom. The parliament met on the 21st of October. The king's speech made only a slight allusion to the popish plot. The Commons either felt or affected a great solicitude for further information; they sat day after day, and all day long, engaged in the examination of Titus Oates and other witnesses; and in the interval of these examinations, and while they had a select committee employed in searching for barrels of gunpowder under the House (which it is needless to say were not found), they passed the act which is the subject of our discussion, and which, or rather the re-enacted remnant of which (for two-thirds of it are obsolete) is now the chief bulwark of the British constitution. Exactly on the seventh day after their meeting, they sent their bill up to the House of Lords for their approbation. It went up, however, not unharbingered. Some days before the bill passed the Commons, warrants were issued by order of that House, for the arrest of five out of about eighteen Catholic peers who then sat in the House of Lords.—

The Commons may have deliberated with becoming gravity and temper; they may have framed their bill with extraordinary wisdom—(the grammar of it is indeed in some parts a little hurried, but not more than I suppose was thought to comport with the urgency of the occasion)—they may have had abundant reason for not delaying the course of just precaution which they thought the emergency required: but in what temper of mind must the Lords have proceeded, when they saw five of their own body swept away—torn from their seats and committed to prison—as a preliminary to the first reading of the bill?

It was in this state, however, of calm and fearless preparation, that the House of Lords was called upon to enact the 30th of Charles 2nd. Their progress in the bill was watched by the Commons with a jealousy which in these days would, I think, be considered as hardly compatible with the mutual independence of the two Houses of Parliament. Did the Lords presume to defer the consideration of the bill from one day to another?—they were goaded with messages from the Commons, reminding them that such a bill was on their table. Assailed by all the horrors and absurdities of the plot, and with Titus Oates thundering at their doors, they at length passed the bill; but, moved by the tears and protestations of the duke of York, they inserted into it the exemption in his favour, and so returned it to the House of Commons. The bill so returned, did, as has been said, greatly disappoint the Commons, who saw their main purpose defeated, by the exemption of the duke of York from its operation. It was, however, sufficiently comprehensive to exclude the whole of the Catholic peers from their seats in parliament: and that exclusion so enacted, as I have described, continues unto the present hour.

In truth, I am strongly persuaded, that the framers of the bill themselves did not intend to inflict a permanent disability. They had in view a specific purpose, the exclusion of the duke of York; which, they thought, the alarms and agitation then prevailing would help them to achieve. But what reason is there to believe that—that purpose once achieved—they would have altered the frame of the constitution of parliament such as it had subsisted immemorially; such as it had been confirmed by statute for the last 115 years?—The king himself was plainly of opinion that the act was intended only to be temporary; for in passing it, he expressly says that he consents to it, because it is thought fitting at this time.

Again I aver, that the more the transactions of that time are studied, the clearer it will appear, that if the duke of York had not been a papist, the Catholic peers would not have been disturbed in their seats. What then is the condition of the Catholic peers of the present day?—A measure which there is every reason for believing that our ancestors devised as a precautionary security against an existing and defined danger, will, if not permitted by our vote this night to be re-considered, be permanently fixed upon these peers and their successors for ever, without the smallest imputation of crime, or the shadow of present justification. That we may truly estimate the amount of the wrong thus inflicted, let us consider what was the species of right which was affected by the 30th of Charles 2nd.

Attempts had been made in former years, but with quite different objects, to impose oaths and declarations upon the House of Lords, annexing to neglect or refusal the penalty of forfeiture of the right of sitting and voting in parliament. These attempts had uniformly been resisted—not by Roman Catholic peers only, but by the body of the House.

Protests were formally entered upon the Journals of the House of Lords, declaring the privilege of peerage to be an honor enjoyed by birthright, and "of so inherent a quality, as that nothing could take it away but what by the law of the land could withal take away their lives and liberties." Nay, only three years previously to the passing of the act of 1678, namely, in the year 1675, in the course of the debates on the bill called the bishop's test bill (which did not pass into a law), a standing order of the House of Lords was passed unanimously to the following effect:—"Ordered, by the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That no oath shall be imposed by any bill or otherwise, upon the peers, with a penalty, in case of refusal, to lose their places or votes in parliament, or liberty of debates therein." And this order now remains unrepealed among the standing orders of the House of Lords.

How happens it, I ask, that this standing order, framed and entered on the Journals three years before the act of 1678, should have been suffered to remain, if the expulsion of the Catholic peers were intended to be perpetual?—I do not mean to set up a standing order of one branch of the legislature in competition with the law of the land; or to deny, that if the one contained any thing incompatible with the provisions of the other, the statute must be obeyed, and the standing order disregarded: but from the circumstance of the latter being suffered to remain on the Journals, is to be inferred one of two things:—either that the Lords were at the moment in the possession and exercise of their calm deliberative functions, and intending the expulsion of the peers to be but temporary, did not revoke the standing order;—or, that in the enforced haste and trepidation of their proceedings, they had not presence of mind to pause at the order which they had only three years before unanimously sanctioned. The more probable inference seems to be, that acting under the menaces of the Commons, and under the hazard (if they should refuse their assent to the measure then demanded) of being involved in the charge of conspiracy to murder the king and subvert the constitution, their sober and deliberate judgment was, in a great degree, overpowered by the sense of immediate danger; but that they did yet look forward to a time when, after the passing of the storm, they might recur to the principles of their standing order. That order was therefore suffered to remain unnoticed (for to bring it into notice would have been, in the heat of the time, to ensure its repeal—and yet surely it was too recent to be forgotten), a dormant but solemn recognition of those privileges of the peerage which were suspended, not annihilated, by the act of parliament. There is no other rational way of reconciling so apparent a contradiction. When a bill is passed for suspending the operation of the Habeas Corpus act, the Habeas Corpus act remains upon the Statute book unrepealed; to break out again with unchanged lustre, when the veil of the suspension is removed. In like manner this standing order was probably considered as retaining its force, while it retained its situation; though overlaid for a time by the oppression of the occasional statute.

This construction derives considerable force from the terms of the statute itself; great part of which is, in its very nature, temporary, and the whole so loose and inaccurate, as to form a specimen of legislative skill utterly unworthy to be (as some are of opinion it ought to be) considered as fundamental to the constitution. For example, the preamble declares, that "divers good laws had been made for preventing the increase and danger of popery; which have not had the desired effect, by reason of the free access which popish recusants have had to his majesty's court, and by reason of the liberty which, of late, some of the recusants have had and taken to sit and vote in parliament." Now, here are two distinct grievances alleged, for which the act provides two different remedies: for the access to his majesty's court, the obvious remedy of forbidding the resort of Papists to court; for the danger arising from sitting and voting in parliament, that of their removal from the two Houses. But it is to be observed, that the two grievances are not only distinct in themselves, but apply quite plainly to different classes of persons. The latter part of the preamble—that which relates to sitting and voting in parliament—is absolute nonsense, if applied to the peers; for it was not only "of late" that peers of whatever religion, had had the privilege of sitting in parliament; peers had never lost it; up to that period, they sat in the House of lords as a matter of right, not affected by the oath of supremacy imposed by the 5th of Queen Elizabeth on the House of Commons, but, as I have already said, exempted by a special clause, from the operation of that oath. In the House of Commons indeed, some Catholics had contrived, by evasions of one kind or another, to regain seats; and there had lately been two or three expulsions of members detected to be popish recusants. One species of popish recusancy was the refusal to take the oath of supremacy. The declaration in the preamble could therefore apply only to the commons; yet the exclusion which this act effected comprehended both; and, for a reason which affected only the commons, excluded the lords from their seats in their own House of parliament. Upon the face of the statute itself here is a flagrant and manifest injustice, here is an inconsequence so obvious, that nothing but the heat and terror of the times could have enabled it to pass. Whereas Catholics have "of late" found their way into the House of Commons, in spite of the provisions of the act of Elizabeth; be it enacted — what? That Roman Catholic peers—whom the 5th of Elizabeth did not touch, who were never for a moment out of parliament, and who, therefore, cannot in common sense be said to have "had and used of late," that which they have "had and used" from time immemorial without let or interruption, shall lose their seats in the House of Lords. Is this the sort of syllogism by which rights ought to be taken away?

The other grievance stated in the preamble — the access to the king's court, does apply to the peers, and to them, with more peculiar force than to the commons; as a peer in his character of an hereditary counsellor of the Crown, had the means of more easy and frequent access. The peers, therefore, were logically (if not justly) banished from the court. But mark the singularity of the fate attending this enactment; and observe how it countenances the construction, that the whole act was of a temporary nature. This liability of a Catholic peer to be prosecuted for coming into his majesty's presence, or into the court where the king resided, is removed. It is the only penalty on the peer which the preamble of the statute which we are examining, reasonably infers; and this penalty is removed! It has been removed by the act of 1791, commonly called Mr. Mitford (now lord Redesdale's) act. The Catholic peer is again admissible to the presence of his sovereign, is again acknowledged an hereditary counsellor of the Crown. Here then is one of the deprivations which the act of Charles 2nd inflicted upon Catholic peers, done away; and that deprivation, the only one for which the statute assigned a reason: while that for which (as I have shewn) the statute assigned no reason in their case, —exclusion from parliament — is maintained.

And in what manner has this relief been given? And what is the state in which Catholic peers are now placed by the double operation of the old and the new law? The act of 1791 relieved Roman Catholic peers from that part of the oath of supremacy which Catholics cannot take consistently with their spiritual scruples. In the oath of supremacy it is sworn, "that no foreign prince, person, prelate, state or potentate, hath or ought to have any jurisdiction, power, superiority, pre-eminence, or authority, ecclesiastical or spiritual within this realm." By the act of 1791, the Roman Catholic is to swear that he does not believe that "the pope of Rome, or any other foreign prince, prelate, state or potentate, hath, or ought to have, any temporal or civil jurisdiction, power, superiority or pre-eminence, directly or indirectly, within this realm." After taking this latter oath, the Catholic peer is competent to go into the presence of his sovereign; to tender his advice in the royal closet. But into parliament he cannot go without taking the oath of supremacy in its former shape; and further, without denying transubstantiation, and asserting the invocation of the Virgin Mary and other saints, and the sacrifice of the mass, to be superstitious and idolatrous. Here then, is an individual entitled by birthright to the enjoyment of two particular privileges;—the one to tender to his sovereign as one of his hereditary counsellors, such advice as he may think expedient for the affairs of the nation; the other to sit in parliament, and in the face of his peers and of the nation, to defend in his place as a peer the advice which he has given in that character. Let him only deny the "civil and temporal" power of the pope, —and no man can prevent his entering the royal closet;—no man can prevent that access which would enable him, if he were an assassin, to plunge a poignard into his sovereign's breast, at an interview so easily and simply acquired;—at any rate he may influence the royal mind without danger, or risk, or personal responsibility: but before he can publicly answer for the bad or good use which he may have made of these opportunities, he must deny the "ecclesiastical and spiritual" authority of the pope, and enter deeply into the disputes about transubstantiation. Was ever absurdity like this?—The Catholic peer may drive directly to saint James's, and demand admission to the royal presence; the cabalistic words, "temporal and civil," dissolve the interdiction of the 5th clause of the act of Charles 2nd, and the closet doors fly open at the sound: but if he turns his horses' heads from the palace towards the parliament House, the charm loses its efficacy; no entrance there except through the words "ecclesiastical and spiritual," followed up with a sworn opinion upon certain controverted points of religious faith and worship.

I really know not which is more decisive against the act of Charles 2nd, the disability which is continued, or that which has been repealed: that which is continued, but was enacted without any statement to justify it; or that which has been repealed, in spite of its more apparent justification. Taken together, this continuance and this repeal constitute an anomaly, not with respect to different classes or different persons, but in the person of each individual peer, such as I imagine, no legislation can parallel.

But this is not all. The repeal of this clause by the act of 1791, is in another point of view highly remarkable. The repeal is in favour of peers by name; and the act of 1791 originated in the House of Commons. What becomes then, I would ask, of the objection, that the House of Commons cannot legislate for the peers alone? and why, if one act of parliament, originating in this House, could relieve peers from disability to enter the king's court, may not another act, with the same origin, relieve them from the disability as to parliament? What is there in this case to prevent the like special relief? If it be answered, as I own it may, that the relief given to peers by the act of 1791, was given to them alone, because they alone required it;—there being no members of the House of Commons Roman Catholics;—and "Popish Recusants" being an extinct race in the present day;—I reply, that in the grievance which remains to be repealed, the exclusion from parliament—peers, though not the only, are special sufferers:—that the operation of the act of Charles 2nd, was to inflict this suffering on them alone — on the commons only continuing and enforcing it.

But the strange anomalies in the situation of Catholic peers are not yet exhausted. Fertile as was the reign of George 3rd in acts of relief, ameliorating the condition of his Roman Catholic subjects;—it remained for his present majesty, at the opening of his auspicious reign, to add a further anomaly to the condition of his Catholic peers, by a distinction the most gracious and benevolent in design, but bringing some mixture of bitterness with enjoyment; a distinction exalting, indeed, the dignity of the Catholic peer, but at the same time sharpening the sting of his recollections. I allude to the coronation. Last year, for the first time for upwards of one hundred and thirty years, were catholic peers summoned to attend a coronation:—an august and awful ceremony; not to be viewed as an unmeaning pomp—a mere gorgeous pageant; but as a public ratification, by the sovereign of a free people, of the compact which binds together all the orders of the realm. This solemn political rite was celebrated with all the magnificence becoming a monarch surrounded by his nobles, his prelates, and his counsellors, and by crowds of his loving subjects—receiving their united homage, and pledging himself to their protection and good government in return. It was celebrated in the presence of the representatives of Catholic as well as Protestant Europe. Imagine the ministers of foreign potentates collecting for their respective courts the details of this splendid and affecting consecration. Who is it that overtops the barons as they march?—the Catholic lord Clifford. Who is it that does homage to the throne on behalf of the highest order of the peerage?—the Catholic duke of Norfolk. Whom has the king selected to return thanks to this assemblage of all that is most splendid and most worthy in the realm, in acknowledgment of their libation to his majesty's health?—again, the Catholic duke of Norfolk. Did it occur to the representatives of Europe, when contemplating this animating spectacle—did it occur to the ambassadors of Catholic Austria, of Catholic France, or of states more bigotted in matters of religion, that the moment this ceremony was over, the duke of Norfolk would become disseised of the exercise of his privileges among his fellow peers? That his robes of ceremony, were to be laid aside and hung up, until the distant (be it very distant!) day, when the coronation of a successor to his present most gracious sovereign might again call him forth to assist at a similar solemnization?—that, after being thus exhibited to the eyes of the peers and people of England, and to the representatives of the princes and nations of the world, the duke of Norfolk, highest in rank among the peers, the lord Clifford, and others, like him, representing a long line of illustrious ancestry,—as if called forth and furnished for the occasion, like the lustres and banners that flamed and glittered in the scene, were to be, like them, thrown by as useless and trumpery formalities?—That they might bend the knee and kiss the hand—that they might bear the train or rear the canopy—might discharge the offices assigned by Roman pride to their barbarian ancestors—but that with the pageantry of the hour, their importance faded away; that as their distinction vanished, their humiliation returned; and that he who headed the procession of peers to day, could not sit among them as their equal on the morrow?

Nor is this the only act of royal beneficence and condescension to the highest order of Catholics, which has marked the reign of his present majesty. In the course of the late royal visit to Ireland, a visit, which I agree with my right hon. friend (Mr. Plunkett) in thinking, was as much a measure of wisdom as of grace, a noble lord of the catholic religion, the earl of Fingall, was, by the favour of his majesty, decorated with the riband of the national order of Ireland. In the preamble of the statutes of that order, we find the qualifications which every man is understood to possess, who is selected for the distinguished honour of being a knight, of St. Patrick. It is therein declared, "That it hath been the custom of wise and beneficent princes, in all ages, to distinguish the virtue and loyalty of their subjects by marks of honour, &c. that so their eminent merits may stand acknowledged to the world, and create a virtuous emulation in others to deserve similar distinction." These reasons, no doubt, recommended lord Fingall for so high a mark of his majesty's favour. Of his qualifications there can be no doubt; but as to the "emulation" which that most gracious favour was to excite, how was that to be exemplified? Did not lord Fingall, when he departed from the court of Dublin to his own estate in the country, find himself in a worse situation, as to the exercise of political rights, than any of the labourers who till the ground around his dwelling? Lord Fingall, a Catholic peer, is not only wholly disqualified from sitting or voting in either House of parliament, but even from voting at the election of a member for either. The tillers of his ground, catholic or protestant, have, probably the very humblest of them, a right of suffrage at the election of a member to represent him in parliament; while lord Fingall and his fellows are not thought fit to be intrusted with the privilege of voting at the election of the representative peers of Ireland! Is this an anomaly which ought to have perpetual existence?

Here I take occasion to say, that if the House allows me to bring in the bill which I mean to propose to their consideration, it will be found to include the Irish as well as the English Catholic peers in its operation; and to enable the former to be representative peers, as well as to vote at the election of them.

I have, as yet, considered the Act of 1678 only in a political point of view; but I should greatly under-rate the objections to which it is liable, if I were not to consider it in its not less striking character as a measure of individual injustice. One cannot look at the period and circumstances of the passing of that act, without seeing that the House of Lords legislated under duresse, and were instigated to pass it by false pretences. When I speak of false pretences, let me, at the same time, repeat my former observation, that if all the motives had been real instead of being, at least in part, pretended; if the object had been to extinguish the catholic peerage instead of to exclude the duke of York (the latter, perhaps, a right and necessary measure); if in short the statute had been in all its enactments as manifestly just at the time, as they appear even then doubtful and suspicious;—still the necessity for continuing those enactments having long since passed away, their continuance at the present day would be unjustifiable. Had all the five Catholic

Peers who were accused of conspiring the king's death and the subversion of the government, been tried and proved guilty, (whereas no charge was attempted to be substantiated against them); had lord Stafford, who alone was selected for trial, been as guilty as he is believed to have been innocent;—I should still say, that no grounds had been made out for visiting the whole Catholic peerage with perpetual disabilities; I should still say, that it is revolting to the spirit of British law to make eternal penalties which were enacted for the transactions of times long past—transactions which have no influence, and infer no guilt in the present age. But if the pretences upon which the act was passed were false; if the popish plot (by which the passing of it was so terribly facilitated) was built upon the fabrication of abandoned wretches, committing the most enormous perjury; then I ask with increased confidence, upon what plea is this exclusion to be justified? with what grace can any man contend for its prolongation? I contend, that to the Catholic peerage, not only in reference to their quality as peers of the land, but to their feelings and their characters as men, we owe an atonement for the wounds which have been inflicted upon their rights and their honour, for the privations with which they have been punished, not only for no crime of their own, but for no crime at all. We owe them relief from those restraints, which, even if they were merited by the original transgressors, would have been too severely entailed upon an unoffending posterity.

I do not impute to the parliament of Charles 2nd, that they did wrong wantonly and wilfully, in the knowledge that the grounds upon which they acted were untrue. In common fairness and candour I believe that parliament to have taken the evidence on which they proceeded, not indeed with any deep and entire conviction of its truth, but with that sort of unexamining credulity, that ready acquiescence, with which men naturally receive a story which falls in with their own prejudices, and forwards their predetermined objects. But it cannot be denied and must not be overlooked, that the act of 1678 was passed under the same delusion, was forced through the House of Lords by the same impulse, as it were, which brought lord Stafford to the block.

The accusation against lord Stafford and the other Catholic peers, was sent up to the house of Lords (as I have already stated) in the first alarm of the plot, and most clearly as the harbinger of the subsequent bill. It would not be candour but folly to doubt, that it was considered by those who sent it up, as the probable means of effecting, through intimidation, the exclusion of the body of which the accused peers formed a part, and of which the duke of York was the chief, from parliament. Those means eventually, so far succeeded, as that the whole of the Catholic peers of the realm, with the exception of the principal intended victim, the duke of York, were so excluded from parliament.

In pursuance of this accusation, lord Stafford was brought to trial, condemned, and beheaded. In about six or seven years after that event, the principal witnesses against him were convicted of perjury; and after that conviction, a bill, reversing lord Stafford's attainder, was brought into the House of Lords and passed there; but coming down to the House of Commons it was rejected, or rather dropped, for there is no trace on the journals of its rejection. The loss of the bill is attributed, by some historians to the disinclination of the House of Commons to entertain any measure of this nature; while others account for it, and perhaps sufficiently, by the intervention of the duke of Monmouth's landing, which took place on or about the time that had been appointed for the committee on the bill:—"The lords in passing the bill," says Rapin, "did it rather to oblige the king, than with any view to do justice to lord Stafford. But the Commons did not entertain the same deference for the wishes of James; it was lost in that House, after a second reading, and was never heard of more." True it is, that after that parliament had been dissolved, the bill for the reversal of lord Stafford's attainder was not resumed;—true it is, that Titus Oates, upon whose conviction for perjury, the bill had been brought in, was, after the revolution, pensioned by the government. I cannot, however, admit the non-resumption of the bill, after the revolution, as any proof of lord Stafford's guilt, still less can I admit the pension to Oates as a recognition of Oates's innocence and veracity. This favour to Oates, like many other political measures of equivocal morality, must be set down to the account of those circumstances—which a revolution in government naturally and necessarily begets; and to the temper and condition of the times, which precluded too nice an examination of what might be strictly due to a political enemy. I am the rather confirmed in this opinion, when I find a sensible and judicious historian, like Mr. Hume, capable of making this remark on the bill for reversing lord Stafford's attainder: "The bill" (says Mr. Hume) "fixed so deep a reproach on the former proceedings of the exclusionists, that it met with great opposition among the lords; and it was at last, after one reading," (this I take to be incorrect—it was read a second time I think, and the day for the committee was appointed) "dropped by the Commons. Though the reparation of injustice be the second honour which a nation can attain, the present emergence seemed very improper for granting so full a justification to the Catholics, and throwing so foul a stain on the Protestants."—The amount of this opinion of the historian seems to be, that the apology of the House of Commons for not completing an act of justice, was to be found, not in the merits of the case, but in the inexpediency of acknowledging that against the Catholics any injustice had been committed. I will not pause to examine the moral propriety of such a doctrine; but I cannot help asking, have parliament now any similar reasons for refusing to do justice? Is there any inexpediency in an attempt of the parliament of 1822 to gain the "second honour" open to a nation—that of atoning for wrong? Must we now, and for what reason, continue the exclusion of the Catholic peers? Is there now any difficulty in making atonement to their descendants? What are the jealousies now to be consulted? By what "impropriety" as to "the present emergency," is the judgment of the House now to be influenced against adopting measures of equity and expiation? Would such a "reparation of injustice" now put to hazard the safety of that Constitution, to which we owe our national happiness and freedom, and our generally equitable laws?

As the extract which I have read from Hume exhibits that historian in an unamiable light as the defender, upon principles of expediency, of an omission of which he does not palliate the injustice; it may be but fair to compare this cold-blooded sentence, with the terms of generous indignation in which the same writer had previously spoken of the execution of lord Stafford:—"This was the last blood which was shed on account of the Popish plot: an incident which, for the credit of the nation, it were better to bury in eternal oblivion; but which it is necessary to perpetuate, as well to maintain the truth of history, as to warn, if possible, their posterity, and all mankind, never again to fall into so shameful and barbarous a delusion." This is strong language, and as true as it is strong.

What is the language of the House of Lords itself, within seven years after they had concurred in the act of 1678—within five after, they had condemned lord Stafford to death? Hear the preamble of the act which they passed for the reversal of his attainder. "Whereas William, late viscount Stafford, was impeached of high treason, for conspiring the death of his late majesty, king Charles the 2nd, of blessed memory, and the subversion of the government, and was arraigned and tried before the peers in parliament for the said high treason, and was found guilty thereof, and condemned and executed: And whereas, it is now manifest that the said late viscount Stafford was innocent of the treasons laid to his charge, and that the testimony whereupon he was convicted was false: Be it enacted, &c.

What are the opinions of other more impartial judges on the subject of lord Stafford's condemnation, as they have been delivered at a later period, upon a calm review of the history of those times?—In the year 1791, debates took place, both in the House of Commons and House of Lords, on the question which was then raised, as to the abatement of Mr. Hastings' impeachment. In the discussion of precedents on that occasion, as to the continuation of and impeachment after the dissolution of a parliament, the case of lord Stafford was often cited. In arguing this question, the opinions of two very distinguished men, (I am sure that their names alone will command attention,) the late lords Thurlow and Kenyon, were incidentally given on the proceedings against lord Stafford. Lord Thurlow, undoubtedly, was not a favourer of Catholics; and lord Kenyon certainly has not bequeathed any vehement affection for them to his posterity. Lord Thurlow is recorded to have declared, "that he disdained a precedent which was derived from times, when accusations darkly contrived, and impudently alleged against innocent men, were greedily entertained; when individuals were liable to suffer in their lives and fortunes, not because they had committed crimes against the state, but because they had rendered themselves obnoxious to this or that party in the state." Lord Kenyon's opinion is still more decided and precise; he said "that whatever, while their passions were excited and their feelings were strong, men might have thought at the time of the conviction and sentence of lord Stafford, he firmly believed, that there was no one of them who, when reason had resumed her seat, and sober reflection had dissipated the mists of prejudice, would not have thought with him (lord Kenyon), that the execution of lord Stafford was a legal murder." On this part of the subject, therefore, it may be enough for me to place the solemn declaration of the House of Lords, revising their own judgment against lord Stafford; to place the opinions of lord Thurlow and of lord Kenyon—against the character and pension of Titus Oates. In addition to these testimonies, however, important as they are, I confess that I believe, in common (if concurrent histories be true) with all who heard them at the time—the dying protestations of lord Stafford;—and I must believe, according to every principle of law as well as of justice, in the innocence of those other peers, who like lord Stafford were accused, but who were not, like him, put upon their trial.

Now, it is impossible not to see that the fate of Stafford, and the expulsion of the Catholic peers from parliament, were parts of the same system. The same testimony which produced the condemnation of lord Stafford, occasioned also the act of 1678. Lord Stafford might have been guilty, and his fellows in accusation innocent;—they might have been guilty, and yet the rest of the Catholic peerage blameless: the establishment of lord Stafford's criminality therefore, would not of itself justify the statute. It would not necessarily have justified the enactment of it at the time: still less would it now justify its continuance. But trace the chain of reasoning the other way, and the result is irresistibly conclusive. If lord Stafford, who was tried and convicted, was not guilty, much less so were those Catholic peers, who though accused with him were not tried;—much less so those others who though not even accused were nevertheless expelled from parliament. So far therefore as the act of the 30th of Charles II rests on the Popish plot, the foundation of it entirely fails. Technical difficulties or temporary expediency may have prevented the reversal of lord Stafford's attainder: but is there any thing temporary or technical to prevent this House from paying homage to truth, though late, and reversing legislative error?

I have now, Sir, only to recapitulate the grounds upon which I think the parliament of this day ought to annul, with respect to Catholic peers, the operation of the statute to which my motion refers, even if political considerations were wholly set aside, it violated an inherent birthright, not to be taken away, unless for causes that would warrant the taking away property and life itself. It created a disability which if justly because necessarily created under the circumstances of the time, could continue to be just only while the same circumstances should continue, or if others of a similar character should arise in their place. It visited not the criminal himself only, and his supposed but untried accomplices; and his suspected but unaccused fellows in religious faith; but his and their remote and innocent posterity. It did all this upon evidence, the truth of which the parliament which had passed the act, six years afterwards solemnly denied: and the judgment of all impartial men at this day confirms that denial.

With all these considerations, political and moral, in favour of a repeal, of the exclusion of Roman Catholic peers, I am not to be deterred from urging it by being warned of the anomaly which it is pretended would be introduced by it into the constitution. I deny the fact:—not of the anomaly—but I deny that my bill could introduce it. If Catholic peers should sit in parliament while commoners continued to be excluded—such was the state of things for 115 years, from the 5th of Elizabeth to the 30th of Charles II, without, so far as I know, any sensible inconvenience; without affecting the prosperity of the state, or encroaching upon the liberties of the nation, or shaking the stability of the throne. It is not a state of things which I wish; but it is not new, nor is it so monstrous as it is represented. Eligibility and possession are to be argued, one upon the principle of expediency, the other on that of justice. No man can think more sincerely than I do, that we are wrong in refusing to Roman Catholics seats in this House:—but that is a different sort of injury from the one of which I now complain. It is indeed the withholding of an important privilege; but the injury to which the Catholic peer has been subjected, is the deprivation of a right of inheritance.

I am as unwilling as any man can be to give invidious preferences: and while I wish to see the Catholic peers restored to their own House, to sit there.

"In their own dimension like themselves."

I do not wish (can it be necessary to say that I do not?) to see their fellow Catholics, curtailed of their fair pretensions by a lasting exclusion from the House of Commons. I should despise myself if any feeling of deference to aristocracy, any vulgar homage to rank or station, entered for a particle of motive into my selection of the case of the peers. I select it for its clearness, its compactness, its tangibility; for its freedom from those complications and qualifications which incumber and perplex the general question of the admission of Catholics into the state. I select it because it lays bare the principle of the argument, and on principle alone must be resisted, if resisted at all.

I select the case of the peers, because as on the one hand the right taken away is more definite and perfect, so on the other the privation inflicted is beyond all proportion more severe. Compare the hardship, the invidiousness of exclusion from one and from the other House of parliament. How many contingencies might operate to prevent the entrance of the Catholic commoner into parliament, supposing his disability on account of religion removed! He might be an officer of the revenue—he might not have the requisite pecuniary qualification—or he might, like hundreds of thousands of his qualified contemporaries, not have the good fortune to be chosen. But he does not, like the Catholic peer, bear about him the distinctive mark of his exclusion—the badge of his painful peculiarity. He is not a member of parliament—what of that; millions of his fellow subjects are not so, and no one thinks the worse of them that they are not. But the case of the peer is widely different. Who can see the duke of Norfolk, for instance, in the ordinary intercourse of society, without recollecting, without finding the idea instantly and involuntarily suggested to his mind—that there is a nobleman, by birthright the chief of the peerage of the land, who is shut out from the House of parliament to which he belongs? Who can hear his wide possessions, his proud titles enumerated, without being sensible that their owner is degraded by such an exclusion; and that the coronet which sparkles on his brow, brands rather than distinguishes its illustrious possessor?

The statute of 1678, in taking from the peers a right, inflicted on them a grievous wrong; not merely a technical and political injury—a privation once inflicted and endured, and then to be forgotten;—but a constant living rankling soreness, present every day and every hour to their feelings and recollections;—something that never quits them in public or in private—that haunts their footsteps—that sounds in their very names.

My selection of the peers, then, is justified by the peculiarity of their situation—by the nature of that right which they lost—by the injustice through which they have lost it—and by the inflictions which the statute of exclusion has occasioned them: and so far from making them the objects of premature and partial redress, if the bill for their special relief were to pass now, they would have but tardy justice. They have stood by for nearly fifty years, while to other Roman Catholics great relaxations of disabling laws, and many privileges have been conceded. They have stood by, silent and contented spectators of the benefits conferred on others; and if I now present myself to bring their appeal before parliament, I must repeat, that my interposition is unsolicited by them; though, perhaps, it is not against their wish, it is entirely without their concurrence.

Sir, I have nearly done. The hon. member for Somersetshire, to whom I have already expressed myself obliged for the attention with which he has this evening honoured me, will, I am sure, acknowledge that I have shown my present proposition to be altogether distinct from the general question. This is as much a case by itself, and stands as singly upon its own merits, as any case in Westminster-hall, which has no relation to the one that preceded it, or the one that is to follow. Nay, so confident do I feel in the view which I have taken of this case, that if it were possible to bring it before any legal tribunal, which should have the power of revising the proceedings of the legislature, I have no doubt that before such a tribunal the Catholic peers would obtain a verdict. Taking into consideration all the circumstances of the Popish plot—the operation of these circumstances upon the House of Lords when it passed the act of 1678—the evident reluctance with which the act was passed, under instigations and menaces almost amounting to compulsion—the protest still extant on the Journals of that House, by which deprivation of the right of sitting and voting in the House of Peers, is declared to be unknown to the constitution:—and considering also the innocence of those against whom the provisions of this act were levelled, or rather whom, being levelled against another, they involved; I feel no hesitation in affirming, that there is no jury which would not decide, that the expulsion of the Roman Catholic peers had been wrongfully obtained, and that their posterity are entitled to restoration to their place in parliament.

It is hardly necessary again to repeat, that this is a very different proposition from that of rendering the Catholics generally eligible to parliament. But I repeat it, for the purpose of subjoining, that I do not agree with those who think that the re-admission of the Catholic peers would therefore be a measure altogether indifferent to the great body of the Catholics. What!—Is not the whole clergy of the Church of England ennobled by the admission of its prelates into the House of Lords; although there is an express statute, prohibiting any parson from sitting in the Commons' House of Parliament? Is it possible that any great body in the state should not partake of the dignity or degradation attaching to those who are at its head? Does not the meanest Catholic in the kingdom sympathize with the Catholic peers, for the sufferings endured by them in their exclusion; and would not he feel himself elevated by their restoration? No happier illustration perhaps can be found of this principle, than one drawn from the plan devised by an hon. gentleman on the other side of the House (Mr. Ricardo), for the restoration of our depreciated currency—a plan as full of genius as of science. The paper currency of the country was in a state of depreciation. To set it right at once by a corresponding issue of gold was impracticable. It was suggested, to make certain large masses of notes payable with bars of gold. It was objected to this plan, that the poor man's one pound note would thus be even more depreciated in value, by comparison with those which the rich man could carry in aggregated hundreds to the Bank, and get exchanged for bullion. Parliament, however, wisely adopted this plan: and what was the consequence? why that the value of the currency was speedily raised from one end of the country to the other—the one pound note of the poor man, partaking in that rise with its fellows aggregated in the treasures of the rich, although it could not be exchanged for gold. In like manner if parliament should determine to admit the Catholic peers to their seats, although the Catholic peasantry could be little affected, so far as regarded any prospect of their reaching parliamentary honours, yet would they find a measure not useless to themselves, by which the value of the whole Roman Catholic denomination would be immediately raised throughout the kingdom.

This, Sir, is all that I shall permit myself to say on the question relating to the general body of his majesty's Roman Catholic subjects. I say this to obviate prejudice on their parts; but I will add nothing more; for it is not my business on this occasion to plead their cause. And having, I trust, fulfilled my promise, of not diverging into the general question of Catholic disabilities; if I should be met with an assertion, that my motion in fact, is an opening of the whole question, and must be met and argued as the whole;—undoubtedly I shall, as to the course of the argument, be disappointed; but I shall consider my cause as gained.

The questions which I require to be answered are—1st:—Were not Catholic peers first excluded from the House of Lords by the 30th of Charles 2nd, after they had been expressly and anxiously retained there by queen Elizabeth, at the time when she imposed the Oath of Supremacy on the House of Commons?—Not that I think it by any means clear, that Elizabeth imposed that oath, even on the House of Commons, with a decided intention of excluding Roman Catholics from parliament. The oaths at different times administered to Catholics, have been of two sorts: some have been put to them bonâ fide as tests of their allegiance; while others have been framed as tests, not of loyalty, but of Catholicism; the framers of this latter sort of oath assuming Catholicism to be disloyalty. The Oath of Supremacy of Elizabeth was framed, I am inclined to believe, in the hope that Catholics might be brought to take it. Partially perhaps they did: generally speaking, they did not. But when that oath was subsequently imposed on the peers, together with the declaration against transubstantiation, those enactments were clearly and confessedly not intended as tests of allegiance, but were prescribed with a fore-knowledge that the Catholics would not take them;—or rather with a pre-determination that they should be such as Catholics could not take.—2ndly:—Wherefore were the Roman Catholic peers thus expelled from parliament? With the view of excluding the duke of York from the throne? or in consequence of the Popish plot? If with a view to the exclusion of popery from the throne, that object is long ago attained; the throne is unalterably Protestant. If in consequence of the Popish plot, then arise the further questions—Were the five Catholic peers justly or unjustly accused of participation in that plot? If justly, why were they not put upon their trial? One only of them was brought to trial: he, it is true, was condemned; but has not even his innocence been since established?—and even if upon that point there is any scepticism, what is the species of justice which condemns four accused persons upon the trial of one?—and which deduces from four charges and one trial the proscription of thrice the number not only innocent but unaccused,—and not only in their own persons, but throughout all succeeding generations of their posterity.

These, I say, are the questions to which I am entitled to require an answer from those who oppose my motion: and, in the absence of a satisfactory answer to them, I am entitled to say, that while I leave the larger question of Catholic disability or admissibility, to rest on political expediency; what I claim for the Catholic peers, I claim as a matter of right. Against their continued exclusion, I appeal not only from the House of Commons of 1678, to this House which I have now the honour of addressing—not only from former to present times—but from Shaftesbury to Burleigh—from the testimony of Oates to that of queen Elizabeth. Nay, I appeal from our ancestors of that day, to our ancestors themselves; from the House of Lords in 1678 to the same—or nearly the same—body in 1685; from the intoxication of their fears, to the sobriety of their reflection and repentance. I adjure the House not to adopt in conduct, as they certainly would not sanction in words, the implied opinion of Mr. Hume, that perseverance in wrong can, under any circumstances, be preferable to inconvenient (even if in this case it were inconvenient) reparation. And I solemnly declare to the House, that I would not have brought this question forward, had I not felt assured, that the reparation which I ask on behalf of the Catholic peers, is in the name of policy as expedient, as in the name of humanity it is charitable, and in the name of God, just.—Sir, I move "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to relieve Roman Catholic Peers from the disabilities imposed upon them by the Act of the 30th Charles 2nd, with regard to the right of sitting and voting in the House of Peers."

The Hon. G. A. Ellis seconded the motion, and said, that after the eloquent and convincing speech of his right hon. friend, it would be bad taste, and indeed presumptuous, in so humble an individual as himself to trespass long on the attention of the House. He was always of opinion that the general measure of removing the Catholic disabilities, was a measure of right and of justice. The part of that question which was then before them had an additional claim to their favour, inasmuch as it related to an exclusion which had its origin in a plot which was supported by perjury, and in the existence of which no one of the present day believed. He hoped the stain would be soon removed from the Statute-book. He recollected a saying of that spirited defender of the Protestant ascendancy, queen Elizabeth, who being advised to administer tests to the Catholics, replied, that she had better means of ascertaining the loyalty of the peers.

Mr. Peel said, that if his right hon. friend knew to the full extent how sincerely he admired his great talents—if he knew the great delight which he uniformly felt and expressed on every occasion where he had the good fortune to have heard his right hon. friend, he would be able to understand the regret with which he rose to answer the eloquent speech with which the House had been that night delighted. With those who did not know him, he feared he should incur the charge of presumption; but with respect to the House in general, he felt confident that they would excuse him for rising to explain the reasons why he could not come to the conclusion which his right hon. friend would wish the House to arrive at. He knew the situation in which he was placed—he was aware of the difficulty of appealing, with any hope of success, to the House, whose feelings were warmed, and whose passions were inflamed by the splendid imagery, the imposing eloquence, of his right hon. friend. Cold reasoning and sober views of the question, he alone was competent to present; and he hoped the House would bear with him whilst he endeavoured to execute the difficult task which he felt it his duty to perform. His right hon. friend, at the conclusion of his speech, had thought fit to prescribe the ground which those who might follow him were to take, and the weapons which they were to use. With respect to that, he must say, that as his right hon. friend had given the challenge, those who accepted it were, by all the rules of war, entitled to choice of the weapons. It was not, however, his intention to enter on the discussion of general principles; he would endeavour to confine his observations within those limits which were pointed out by his right hon. friend. He would, in the first place, contend, that there were no reasons why that House should attempt to remove from the Roman Catholic peers those disabilities to which the Commons were subject. Upon no constitutional ground, upon no ground of policy, could he see the propriety of such a measure. As to those noble persons who were the subject of the motion, for their rank and their hereditary distinction, he felt the greatest respect; but still he would contend, that it was the duty of that House, to oppose a proposition for placing Roman Catholics in the other House of Parliament, whilst they continued the disabilities which excluded them from the Commons.

It was a difficult and a painful duty to attempt to follow his right hon. friend, but, however difficult the task, and however painful, he would not omit any argument which was urged by his right hon. friend, and he would endeavour to give to each argument the most fair and the most satisfactory reply. And first, as to the competency of that branch of the legislature to interfere in a matter affecting solely the other House of Parliament. When his right hon. friend said that such an interference was supported by precedents, he had only to observe, that the precedents quoted by his right hon. friend did not appear to him to bear upon the case. The only precedent which appeared at all in point, was that act by which the spiritual peers were excluded from parliament. That act was passed in the year 1640, immediately before the commencement of the civil war. It was at that period that the House of Commons passed a bill affecting the House of Lords—it was at that period that the precedent was followed; but, surely, it was not a precedent that ought to be followed or upheld. As to the other act, that of the 30th of Charles 2nd, it repealed the foregoing act. Could any thing be more natural than that, after such an act had been passed, the House of Commons should have hastened to repeal it? The object of his right hon. friend was, the repeal of the 30th of Charles 2nd. Did he mean to go to the full extent of that act? That act put both peers and commoners under similar disabilities; it subjected both to make declarations against the doctrine of transubstantiation. His right hon. friend had said that from the time of the Reformation, up to the year 1678, the Catholic peers sat in parliament, but that the Roman Catholics had been long before excluded from the House of Commons. He might be permitted to observe, that different opinions were entertained on that subject, and, upon that diversity of opinions, different arguments had been, from time to time, urged in that House. As so much had been said upon precedents, he would be glad to know to what extent his right hon. friend would respect the authority which he was now about to cite. Some, of course, would suppose, that he was about to refer to remote antiquity—to some almost forgotten name—to some musty opinion which could have no reference to the present question, or if it had any, introduced invidiously by those who had an interest in opposing the views which his right hon. friend had taken of the question—that question being, whether, from the accession of Elizabeth to the 30th of Charles 2nd, Catholic peers were on a different footing from Catholic commoners, and had the privilege of sitting and voting in parliament? The House would recollect the discussion which had taken place in the last session of parliament on the question of the Roman Catholic disabilities. The object then was, by a final and conciliatory arrangement, to put an end to all further discussion, and to bind all his majesty's subjects in one common interest—in one common feeling—for the defence of the person and family of the king, and the maintenance of the constitution. The House would permit him to refer to the eloquent and impressive speech pronounced on that occasion by his right hon. and learned friend, the member for the University of Dublin. In that speech, his right hon. friend had said, that "the very year before the enactment of the disqualifying statute, the 30th of Charles 2nd, sir Solomon Swale, a Roman Catholic, and a member of parliament, was expelled that House. For what? Not because he was a Catholic, but because he was a Popish recusant. The argument was to be found in the debates of that time. It was stated by sir Robert Sawyer, that sir Solomon had convicted himself by not being duly qualified. The resolution inserted on the Journals of that House states the same disqualification. That expulsion took place the year before the 30th of Charles 2nd." These were the words of his right hon. friend; and if he was correct, it was evident that he cut the ground from under the feet of his right hon. friend (Mr. Canning) so far as he had gone, to shew a peculiar difference between the case of the Roman Catholic peers and the commoners. But his right hon. friend had not rested on the case of sir Solomon Swale alone. In that case an erroneous or unfair judgment might have been passed; but his right hon. friend had cited the title of the act itself, which was decisive of the question; it was "an Act for disabling Catholics from sitting in either House of Parliament." Thus it appeared, that when the general question was brought before the House, it was contended that, up to the year 1678, every rank was open to the Roman Catholics; and the House was told, that it was a mistake to suppose that the exclusion of the Catholics was co-eval with the Reformation; but, when the particular case of the Roman Catholic peers was submitted to their consideration, the case was reversed, and sir Solomon was forgotten. Not one word was said with respect to the title of the act. But an attempt was made by his right hon. friend (Mr. Canning) to shew a peculiar distinction between the case of the Roman Catholic peers and the commoners. All he (Mr. P.) could say was, that those authorities contradicted each other, and the House could not by any possibility come to the same conclusion with respect to both.

But his right hon. friend had said, that there was a distinction between the peers and the commoners on another ground. His right hon. friend had said, that there was something inherent in the privilege of the peers, which ought to protect them from the disabilities complained of. Upon constitutional grounds he would say, that at whatever period those disabilities might have been imposed on the Catholic peers, no ground was shewn by his right hon. friend to induce the House of Commons of the present day to subject the representatives of the people to disabilities from which the peers were to be exempted. He would also say, that there was nothing in the practice of parliament which went to recognize that inherent and exclusive principle for which his right hon. friend contended. The parliament had dealt with the privileges of the peers on more occasions than one. At the time of the Irish Union, the parliament subjected the peers to absolute disabilities. They certainly, on that occasion, introduced the anomaly of peers being elected like commoners; but it was never said—it was never supposed—that any inherent privilege of the peers was a bar to the Union. As to the Scotch Union, it was remarkable that his right hon. friend had omitted to state, how he intended to provide for the case of the Roman Catholic peers that existed at present in Scotland, or that may hereafter be created there. He should like to know whether, in the bill which his right hon. friend had moved for, he intended to introduce a clause to qualify Roman Catholic peers belonging to Scotland to sit and vote in parliament, or whether, he intended to respect that article of the act of Union by which the Scotch peers were pointedly excluded, eo nomine, from the House of Peers? They were not left merely subject to a disqualification growing out of certain oaths, but by the letter of the act, no papist was qualified to form any part of any of the estates of the realm, or to sit as members for any of those estates. He did not refer to that act, merely to shew that if it were repealed, an anomaly must exist, but he cited it to shew, that the legislature did not recognize any inherent principle belonging to the Peers, that exempted them from disabilities to which on the same grounds commoners were made subjected. And when he referred to the act of Union with Scotland, he might be allowed to ask, who were the persons who framed that act? Who were the commissioners by whom it was managed? Lord Somers was one of those commissioners, and if there was any inherent principle such as his right hon. friend contended for, would lord Somers have disregarded it? Would the act of Union have destroyed it, and destroyed it for ever?

He now proceeded to another ground which his right hon. friend had taken. His right hon. friend seemed to think, that the privileges of the peers were so sacred, that they ought not to be affected any more than their lives or fortunes. The commissioners of the Union with Scotland did not think so. They dealt with those privileges—they excluded the peers from parliament, though they did not interfere with property or with life. His right hon. friend had said, that by excluding the English Roman Catholic peers from parliament an injustice was committed—and a stigma was unnecessarily placed on seven or eight peers. Now, he would ask his right hon. friend, whether by the bill which he intended to introduce, he intended to limit the number to be admitted into the House of Lords to the present existing number of Roman Catholic peers? Was it not, on the contrary, the object of his right hon. friend to give to the Crown the unlimited power of placing as many Catholic peers in the other House of Parliament as it might think fit? Thus would his right hon. friend emancipate one order of Roman Catholics, whilst the other were left under disabilities. The act would go to recognize this principle: that those who were not elected—who were nominated by the Crown—were to be freed from all disabilities, whilst those whose functions were temporary—whose power was limited—were to remain excluded.

The House would here permit him to call to their recollection the situation in which it stood with relation to the Catholic question. It was seven or eight months ago since that House had passed a bill to relieve the Roman Catholics from the disabilities under which they labour. That Bill declared, that, considering the disposition and conduct of the Catholic body, it was fit and proper that the disabilities under which they laboured, should be removed. What, he might be permitted to ask, was the pressing necessity which could now induce the House to agitate this isolated branch of the question? Since the question had been brought forward by Mr. Fox, and seconded by Mr. Grattan, in the year 1805, up to the present moment, no proposition of the kind had been ever submitted. Why was that anomaly introduced? Under what circumstances was it proposed to the Commons to remove from one order of the king's subjects, disabilities to which they were themselves subjected? It was after his right hon. and learned friend, the member for the University of Dublin, had given notice, that at the earliest possible opportunity in the next session of parliament, he would bring forward the whole of the subject for the consideration of the House. Why, then, should this branch of the subject be pressed at the present moment? Was it that at the end of the session the barren privilege should be conferred upon the Catholic peers to sit in parliament during the recess, when no parliament would be held. If the question were to be agitated the earliest moment that parliament should assemble the next session, he could not see, that any case had been made out to induce the House to entertain at the present moment a peculiar branch of the question.

His right hon. friend had referred to the period at which these disabilities had commenced; and had attempted to attach to the law which excluded Catholic peers from parliament all possible odium, on account of the Popish plot, and the discoveries which had been subsequently made. His right hon. friend had said, that from the time of Elizabeth to the year 1678, the peers had the right of sitting in parliament, and that they were then removed in consequence of the Popish plot. He protested against that mode of treating a legislative question. The exclusion of the Roman Catholic peers was not to be traced up to the Popish plot, or to any particular act, but was to be accounted for on a general reference to the history of the times. Like all periods of commotion, the times to which his right hon. friend alluded, afforded many causes of distrust; and men were generally predisposed to trace to one cause an event which might have been the effect of many causes. So it happened at the period of the civil wars—so it happened during the French revolution. But it was not to the popish plot merely—that the exclusion was to be traced, but to the general state of the times. It was an act founded on the policy of the legislature in 1678, and confirmed at the period of the Revolution —confirmed at that period when the Bill of Rights was passed, and when a popish king was excluded from the throne. Let any man look to the period of Charles 2nd, and, whether he might think that the story of Oates was a fabrication or not, he would find that there then existed against the liberties and religion of this country a formidable and an infamous conspiracy. He would find, that the object was not merely to establish the claim of a popish successor to the throne, but the downfall of the religion of the country. In justice to those who laboured to defend that religion, and to support the threatened liberties of the country, it was but fair to bear in mind the peculiar circumstances under which they were placed. The mere jealousy of a popish successor was not the only object of suspicion, with those who were at that day labouring for the salvation of their country. If he, for the sake of argument, admitted that the popish plot was nothing but a fabrication —if with Dryden he were to say—

To please the fools and puzzle all the wise;
Succeeding times will equal folly call,
Believing nothing, or believing all"—

Or, if he supposed that it was mere madness and folly in those who believed something respecting that plot, yet would he implore the House to take into view the situation of the country at that period. Taking it for granted that the popish plot and the story of Oates was a mere tissue of fabrication, yet would he ask, what had predisposed the country to receive and to credit that fabrication? The country was at that time enlightened. It was at that very period at which Mr. Justice Blackstone described the constitution to have arrived at the highest pitch of theoretical perfection—that period which Mr. Fox described as the æra of good laws and bad government. Why then, at such a period, did the people swallow with avidity every story that was propagated against the Catholics? What had occurred even for the short period of eight years before the passing of the act? Charles 2nd, by every means and artifice, appealed to every good and generous feeling of the country. He issued a declaration in favour, as he said, of the liberty of conscience. He exercised the dispensing power—that power which stood opposed to the security of public liberty—that power which was reprobated at the Revolution—and he exercised it for the purpose of relaxing the laws against the Roman Catholics. Though he affected to exercise that power in favour of the Dissenters, to their credit, they refused to be relieved from the disabilities under which they laboured, because they saw, in the exercise of that power, a plot for the extinction of the liberties of their country. To forward the Roman Catholic religion in England, Charles entered into a treaty with Louis 14th. The object of his policy and views might be best collected from the confessions contained in Coleman's letters. Coleman was secretary to the duke of York. They were written in 1675, three years before the enactment of the bill for the exclusion of Catholics from parliament. In one of those letters, he says, "a plan is now in agitation to give a death blow to that pestilential heresy with which the northern parts of Europe is infested." It went on to say, that the plans which the duke of York had in agitation, were likely to be more successful than any that had been tried since the time of Mary. It was right to mention these circumstances. It was not fair to confine the discussion to the fabrication, if it were a fabrication, of Oates, whilst other circumstances of that reign served so strikingly to explain the policy of parliament at that period. Charles had also entered into a secret treaty with Louis 14th, by which he expressly declared that he, the king of Great Britain, was convinced of the truth of the Catholic religion—that he was determined to declare himself a Catholic, and to be reconciled to the Church of Rome—that for carrying those purposes into execution the assistance of Louis might be necessary. For the purpose of facilitating the design, it was agreed, that the king of France should advance to the king of England 200,000*l*., and should furnish troops and money in case his subjects should rebel against him, which could not be the case. This was a treaty, not with James 2nd, not with the duke of York, but with Charles 2nd, the reigning monarch, to barter the liberties and religion of this country for 200,000*l*., not half the sum which we should now vote for a Caledonian Canal, or a Milbank

Penitentiary. When it was said, that at the time of the Revolution there was no cause for jealousy of the Catholic peers, should it not have been borne in mind, that this disgraceful treaty was concluded by the advice of lord Arlington, lord Clifford, and lord Arundel of Wardour, three Roman Catholic peers? Was it surprizing then, that independently of the popish plot there should have existed a peculiar jealousy of Catholic peers?

His right hon. friend had also dwelt with great force on an order of the House of Lords, passed in 1675, which declared, that the peerage being an inheritable privilege, no bill should be received in that House to impose any test on peers. His right hon. friend had thence argued, that after this solemn declaration, it could only have been under duresse, or under the influence of extraordinary terror, that the House of Lords could have so shortly passed the bill which disabled Catholic peers from sitting and voting. So far from any such inference being warrantable, in that very bill out of which the order originated, a test was included, which, though it did not pass, was retained in the bill to its latest stage. The date of 1675 was highly important. The whole history of that act, and the debates upon it, were given by Mr. Locke, in what was called "A Letter from a Person of Quality to his Friend in the Country.* The act was not directed against the Roman Catholics, it originated with the Spiritual Lords, and was directed against the persons who were infected with the old leaven of the civil wars. No less than seventeen days were occupied upon it, and it was perfectly true, that in the course of the debates an order was moved by lord Shaftesbury, to prevent the imposition of test; yet, at the very moment this order was made, the House of Lords did in fact the very thing that was objected to. After the order had been made, the lord keeper proposed a test equally applicable to both Houses; and in Mr. Locke's letter would be found a protest on the subject, the ground of which was, that it was inconsistent with the order. The lord keeper stated, nevertheless, that the House was master of its own orders, and, as far as the bill went, it was accompanied by a test, the effect of which would be, to exclude Roman Catholic peers. The general history of the motives actuating lords Shaftesbury, Halifax, and Hollis, to support the order, was given by Burnet, who said, that the new test was opposed by those whom he terms Papists, because they well knew that if there were any precedent of a test, it would be applied to themselves. He added, that lords Shaftesbury, Halifax, and others, thought it was not right that any test should be imposed upon members of parliament; that peers were appointed by the Crown, and Commons elected by the people; and that it was absurd to impose a test that would shut them out from the national deliberations. At the Revolution, the bill passed requiring the declaration against transubstantiation, and altering the oaths of allegiance and supremacy; and if any act of parliament could in its nature be permanent, permanency ought to belong to those acts passed at the period of the Bill of Rights, when it was declared, that James 2nd had a design to extirpate the Protestant religion, and had been under the direction of evil councils and ministers. Such was the intention of the legislators of that day, and he never could believe, if it were not their intention, that lord Somers and the other Whigs would in 1705, so soon after the Revolution, have inserted the articles in the Scottish Union, that the Peers and Commons from thence should necessarily be Protestants, and Protestants only. At the time of the Revolution, the parliament naturally took a view of the dangers to which, in preceding years, the country had been subjected. They saw in the reign of Charles 1st the danger which had flowed from a king under the influence of a Catholic queen. They saw, in James 2nd the danger of a Roman Catholic king, acting directly against the religion of the country. But what did they see in Charles 2nd? A king in outward conformity with the Protestant Church, but under the influence of Catholic advisers, engaged in plans subversive of the liberties of the people and the Protestant religion. Providing, therefore, against the dangers in the several reigns, they declared, to meet the danger of the time of Charles 1st, that the queen should not be a Catholic; to meet the danger of James 2nd, they declared that the king should be a Protestant; and against the danger of the time of Charles 2nd, they declared that the king should have Protestant advisers. It was from this motive, that, ten years after the discoveries of Oates, the great men who established the Revolution, thus established also the Protestant character of the constitution of the country.

There were two other points to which his right hon. friend had referred. The Catholic peers had been summoned to the solemnity of the coronation; and his right hon. friend had argued, from this act of courtesy, that they should be admitted to the power of legislation. This was the only part of his right hon. friend's speech which he had heard with pain. If a disposition existed among those who maintained the propriety of the disabilities under which the Catholics were placed, to admit them to all the honours and privileges not inconsistent with the safety of the state, he had thought that his right hon. friend would be the last to discourage this instance of liberality on the part of the sovereign. If the foreign individuals present at that ceremony, to take up the supposition of his right hon. friend, were told, that the Catholic peers were merely like the wax candles or lustres introduced to fill up the show, and that they were excluded from legislative power in the state, they might have heard it with disgust. But if it were explained to them, that the constitution was essentially Protestant, and that it was the practice to require, not conformity indeed, but an abjuration of the Catholic religion, their admission to all honours consistent with the preservation of the political principle, would be rather deemed a mark of liberality and wisdom. If a disposition appeared on all hands to give the duke of Norfolk, for instance, not power, but every privilege not involving political power—if there was a disposition to grant to lord Fingall every honour that could be safely bestowed—he hoped his right hon. friend would view the measures in their proper light, and not take advantage to impose on those who advised or concurred in them the necessity of further concession. Of this he was sure, that if any one had hunted out of the rules of the order of St. Patrick any regulation which might have opposed the admission of lord Fingall—if any one had said, that the honour was conferred as a reward for loyalty and high character, and lord Fingall being a Catholic, was not a fit subject to bestow it on—they would not soon have heard the last of the outcry against such a glaring instance of obstinate bigotry. He (Mr. P.) should certainly in such a case have advised the Crown not to execute too rigidly laws which might be in themselves necessary, but to open all the avenues to distinction, when it could be done with safety to the country; and assuredly in such a case he should not have, on that account, deemed himself concluded to admit Catholic peers to the large privilege of a seat in the House of Lords.

His right hon. friend had last of all adverted to the strange state of the legislation, on the subject of the Catholics. But, would the measure proposed by his right hon. friend cure any one of its anomalies? Would not the state of the Irish Catholic peer present a new mass of anomalies? The Irish Catholic peer would be qualified to sit in the House of Peers: he might be elected as a representative peer; but when the same individual offered himself as a member of parliament for a town or county in England (as an Irish peer might do), he would be turned back, because he could not take those oaths and declarations which he was freed from in the House of Lords. He would ask, whether this was not a striking anomaly? If, also, the Roman Catholic English peer was called, as he would be by his writ of summons, to counsel and advise the Crown, "de rebus concernentibus Ecclesiam Anglicanam,"—if he were to be admitted to legislate for the Church of England, would it be no anomaly that he should not be permitted to act as a magistrate in the county in which he might reside; and could he, by any sound argument, maintain, that, for instance, when the duke of Norfolk was admitted to the first privilege and power of his high rank, he should be precluded from receiving the slightest mark of the confidence of the Crown in the way of official situation. The exclusion under which the Catholic peers would then labour did not of course present itself to him as an evil; but it was a strong reason for postponing the case of the peers, until they also discussed and decided the other parts of the great question.

He saw around him many who had opposed, and many who had supported, on distinct grounds, the Catholic claims. To those who thought with him, that there was danger in the admission of the Catholics to legislative power; to those who thought with him, that it was in the other house of parliament that the danger arose, it would not be necessary to say more, as to a measure for again admitting Catholics into that branch of the legislature; but, with thanks for the indulgence with which the House had heard him, he would address a few words to those who had hitherto supported the Roman Catholic claims. There were many who supported the claims of the Catholics, who thought, whenever this great question came to be discussed, that there should be a final and conciliatory arrangement. To them he should say, that the measure before them would not be final; and he doubted much whether it could be conciliatory. There were others who thought, that when they proceeded to remove the disabilities under which our Catholic brethren laboured, they should consider, at the same time, the whole state of the Catholic Church, with a view to take those securities, which in the last session had been appended to the bill of relief. In the last session, the right hon. gentleman had objected to separate the securities from the concessions, because if the concessions were not carried, it would not be fair to demand the securities. But he would ask whether it would be wise to pass a partial measure, and to open to the Catholics one branch of the legislature, with no security whatever? What would be their situation, when in some future stage of concession, they began to insist on securities? Would it not be said, "You have opened one branch of the legislature to the Catholics: you have admitted those who have hereditary and irrevocable rights; you have given the Crown the power of calling to the House of Lords any number of its Catholic subjects; you have done this without taking any securities; and when you, the House of Commons, come to admit persons elected by the people to serve only for a limited time, will it not be invidious for you to require those securities which, in the former case, you have declared unnecessary." Would it not be said, when they admitted, not the duke of Norfolk and lords Clifford and Shrewsbury only, but all their descendants—when they gave the power of creating any number of Catholic peers, not merely to the reigning monarch, but to monarchs in all time to come—that, if in return for so large a concession to the aristocracy and the Crown, they had required no security, it would be invidious in the representatives of the people to require security against a danger which could only arise through the exercise of the choice of the people? There were those who thought with him, that there was some danger in acceding to the claims of the Catholics, who still said, that that remote and possible danger should be hazarded on account of the state of Ireland, and because they conceived that the government of Ireland was placed on too narrow a basis, and could not be carried on unless they opened the enjoyment of all civil privileges to the Catholic subjects of the king. Would the opening of the House of Lords to Catholic peers, while Catholics were excluded from the House of Commons, advance the views of these gentlemen. There were others who with his right hon. friend, the member for the University of Dublin, viewed this question on the broadest constitutional grounds, on the assertion of the right inherent in every liege subject of his majesty of admissibility to office. The assertion of this principle he could not give more strongly than in his right hon. friend's own words:—"I speak in the presence of enlightened constitutional lawyers and statesmen, and I do not fear contradiction when I assert, that the doctrine of exclusion is not to be found in the principles or in the analogies of the constitution. It is not to be found in the history of our country, or in the opinions of any of our statesmen; and it is at once inconsistent with the subjects rights and the king's prerogatives. Ours is a free monarchy, and it is of the essence of such a government, that the king can call for the services of all his liege subjects, otherwise it is not a monarchy; and no class of subjects can be excluded from privileges, otherwise it is not a free monarchy." He appealed to those who had used or adopted this language; and of them he asked—the time being arrived when it was wise and safe to remove restrictions preventing admission into the House of Lords—if it was just or decent to continue the restrictions to admission into the House of Commons. If admissibility to office were a general right belonging to all ranks of Roman Catholics, why were the disabilities of the great mass of that body to be postponed to the claims of a few, however respectable, founded as those claims were, only upon the same inherent right? All he required—and it formed the whole object of his address—was, that the claims of the Roman Catholic peers should be postponed until the whole question, with the securities, was again introduced. He gave his right hon. friend full credit for the best intentions. He was perfectly sure that his right hon. friend fancied there existed in the case of the peers a peculiarity warranting this distinct motion in their favour: but he was equally certain, that it was neither worthy of the great abilities of his right hon. friend, nor of the character of the House, thus, by a partial measure, to give an advantage to the great question, independent of the principles upon which it must rest its pretensions. He had thus attempted to state why he had arrived at a different conclusion from his right hon. friend. It was not his intention to move the previous question, in order to secure some stray votes but to meet the motion in the most fair and open manner. He should pursue now the course in which he had always proceeded on this subject, by giving the proposal his most decided negative.

Lord F. Gower could not hesitate to declare his sentiments in favour of the motion. So long as the restrictions were removed from the Catholics, he cared not about the anomalies so much dwelt upon by the opponents of the measure. He was anxious to do an act of justice, and he was clearly convinced of the justice of the claim of the Catholic peers. If the six Catholic peers were the rankest Jesuits that ever infested the Escurial, he should be ashamed of having a seat in that House if their admission to participate in all their just rights in the legislature could excite one moment's alarm in that House. He considered the fears of those who resisted the Catholic claims generally to be altogether chimerical.

Lord Nugent said, he entertained certain opinions with respect to the whole question of Catholic emancipation, and feeling these opinions strongly and conscientiously, he approached the motion with considerable difficulty. He could not see how, in point of principle, the grounds on which they advanced to this question could be fairly severed from the case of the Roman Catholic body in general. The question was, whether there any longer existed a justification, or a semblance of justification, for excluding the Roman Catholics generally, on account of their religious belief, from those civil privileges of which they had been so long deprived? He thought that this subject could stand on no other parliamentary ground with advantage. On none, he was sure, could it be placed so plain and so direct; and, he for one, might be allowed to say, that on none could it be advocated so beneficially in parliament; because, by stating the question thus generally, the onus of making out a case of justification was completely thrown on the other side. The cause of those who were favourable to Catholic emancipation stood simply on the showing that the disabilities which affected the Roman Catholics were exceptions from the general spirit of the English law—exceptions from the otherwise undistinguishing doctrines of the British constitution. It appeared to him, on another ground, that the general argument was better than one of a partial description; because it came in a more direct and straight-forward way. He confessed he was one of those who never could shrink from considering those privileges as matter of strict right; and he did so on the ground that, from the moment they could be supported as claims of clear justice, they appeared to him to be claims of clear right. It seemed to him to be necessary, that the adversaries of this question should, from time to time, from year to year, point out the existence of some great and still-continuing danger, which justified the exclusion of the Catholics from those privileges to which, in the absence of such a danger, they were entitled. He would not press this point farther on the consideration of the House, except to allude to one of the arguments adduced by the right hon. mover, and which, in his opinion, might be pushed to a much greater extent than the right hon. gentleman had thought fit to do. He had stated, that not only the history of the time, but the very title of the act under which those disabilities were imposed, proved that it was adopted under circumstances of temporary expediency. It was an act to secure his majesty's person and government against a supposed danger; it was an act founded on terror; in other words, it was the offspring of a plot. The evidence of the existence of that plot was now believed by very few people; but still the act to which it gave birth was in full force against the Catholics. It was, then, on this broad ground that they were entitled to the restoration of their rights altogether. They had been originally bereaved unjustly of them; and they were now, without any satisfactory cause, withheld from them. This question could not be reasoned on the principle of expediency; it was a claim of pure justice and right, and the refusal to concede it was an adherence to wanton and manifest injustice. It was singular enough, that one of those bulwarks or safeguards, as they were called, of the constitution—he meant the declaration against transubstantiation—rejected a doctrine, the truth of which queen Elizabeth would not suffer to be discussed, in the defence of which Martin Luther wrote a tract, and, by supporting which, Henry 8th obtained the title of defender of the faith. The Roman Catholics were now called on to abjure, by a declaration on oath, that very doctrine which the first Protestant king of England would have burned his subjects for refusing to subscribe and acknowledge as an article of their religion. If they looked to the 39 Articles, they would also find, that this declaration was at variance with the discipline of the Protestant church: they would perceive, that the declaration, so enacted, and at variance with the 39 Articles, was drawn up for the mere purpose of enabling persons of a different faith, to accuse, on oath, nine-tenths of all christendom of idolatry, and to prevent the Catholic nobility from serving the state of which they were subjects. That was the measure which brought a bar and stigma home to them in their private capacities. They could not be even intrusted with the commission of the peace. And who were the men that were thus excluded? Amongst them were to be found the names of Mowbray, of Fitz-Allen, and of Maltravers, the posterity of those who had signed the great charter; of Talbot, the descendant of the great man who had twice conquered France, and added her shield to the escutcheon of England; of Norfolk, the earl marshal of England, who, though possessed of that elevated and honourable title, was excluded from exercising the most petty jurisdiction. Was it not lamentable that the name of Howard, a name so intimately connected with the glories of England, could not give sanction and validity even to a paltry parish rate? He could not recollect these circumstances—he could not remember that these individuals were descended from some of the most patriotic men this country ever produced—without emotions of sorrow; and he did not envy the feelings of those who could, without regret, contemplate their present situation, oppressed as they were by unjust disabilities. They were the last remnants of our most ancient families—they might classically be called the representatives of old English nobility. They stood proudly independent amidst the ruin of their privileges, determined to give up these privileges rather than the faith of their fathers; and, to men of such unbending honour, the privations under which they suffered must be severe in the extreme.—With respect to the motion which he was particularly called on to discuss, he assured the House that he came to it with more difficulty and hesitation than he had ever felt on any former question. As to the great cause which this motion was intended to assist, it should always have his firm and decided support. It was intimately connected with the first principles of justice and liberty. He did, however, feel certain apprehensions, with reference to the present motion; and, if he could bring himself to support it, he should do so only on the belief, that, before long, the objectionable parts of this proposition would be merged and lost in the great triumph of justice and liberty, which he confidently anticipated. But, if he could by possibility suppose that the law would remain unamended after the passing of this bill, he would, on the whole, prefer the state of the law as it now stood, monstrous and anomalous as it was. Singly taken, the right hon. gentleman's measure could do little good; while in some respects it had a tendency to establish an anomalous principle. He had never voted for the Catholic question, except on this great political ground, that every man was fully entitled, whatever his religion might be, to exercise the privileges of a citizen. The proposed bill asserted no such general principle: on the contrary, taken singly, it brought back the law to an anomalous state. In the present state of the law, Englishmen were separated from Englishmen—Protestants from Catholics. That separation was founded on the principle of religious difference; but the law which the right hon. gent. endeavoured to introduce would divide Catholic from Catholic, on no principle at all. It was, therefore, in the full conviction that the great measure would, ere long, be carried, that he would give it his support. Why should not the House come at once to the general question? Why were they now confined to a part, when formerly they had carried the whole?

Mr. Warre could not agree with his noble friend in some of the arguments which he had urged against the motion. In the year 181[illegible] it was not objected to the bill for removing the disabilities which excluded Catholics from the army and navy, that it was only a partial measure.

Why then should his noble friend object to the motion on that ground? The right hon. secretary had said, that there was no precedent of a measure which immediately affected the privileges of the other House, having originated in the House of Commons. He would recall his recollection to a precedent, not perhaps strictly in point, but still extremely material in point of analogy—he alluded to the Septennial bill which was a bill absolutely regulating the duration of that House, and which nevertheless originated in the House of Lords. There was an historical fact which had an immediate reference to the question before the House. Lord Montague, a Catholic peer, had vigorously opposed the bill of supremacy, and had shown the strongest Catholic propensities. Yet four years afterwards when Elizabeth was threatened by one of the most formidable Catholic sovereigns of Europe, she selected this very lord Montague as ambassador to the court of Madrid. She had no hesitation in trusting him because he was a Catholic; for she knew him to be an honest and loyal subject; and his exertions at the court of Madrid were in the highest degree successful. The great lord Chatham had well said, in answer to some objections which were urged against the policy of employing the Highlanders, in consequence of their Jacobite principles, that he had found in the Highlands a brave and gallant race of men, against whom unjust prejudices were entertained, that he had taken them under his protection, that he had called them forth to fight the battles of their country, and that his expectations had not been disappointed. He (Mr. W.) doubted not, that if the disabilities under which our Catholic brethren laboured, were removed, there would be found among them, on all occasions, some of the most useful and valuable members of the legislature.

Mr. Martin, of Galway, said, the Catholics of the county with which he was connected, were most anxious for the success of the present measure. The speech of the right hon. secretary would apply with equal force to the times when the mitigation of the penal code was first under consideration, as to the present time, and even with greater; for surely it was unreasonable to refuse the small advantages that remained, when every thing of real magnitude was already in their possession. It mattered very little what the conduct of the Catholics was a century ago. To quarrel with the Catholics of the present generation for what their progenitors had done, was playing the part of the wolf in the fable towards the innocent lamb.

Mr. Plunkett said, that the peculiar ground upon which the motion of his right hon. friend rested had been so completely exhausted by his luminous statement, that he should not have trespassed on the House with a single observation, were it not that he had the petition of his Roman Catholic fellow-subjects in his hand. If, being so circumstanced, he had continued silent, it might have been supposed that he felt the present question as an interference with the motion which at a future period he was bound to bring forward. It was in order to negative that impression that he now rose. He agreed perfectly in the motion of his right hon. friend, because he considered it as a step towards the general measure; but, even if he did not consider it in that light, he should still feel himself called upon to support it as an act of substantial justice, though not going to the full extent which justice demanded. Last session when the great question was before the House in all its parts and bearings—with all its qualifications and securities—considerable embarrassments were thrown in the way of those who supported it. It was finally carried, and received the sanction of that House; but, during its p[illegible], it was involved in multifarious [illegible] and accompanied by guards and s[illegible]s which endangered its success. He did not complain that it was unfairly dealt with in the opposition which it had received from his right hon. friend (Mr. Peel); but that opposition, joined to the complexity of its details, occasioned its friends considerable embarrassment. Some of those members who supported the measure anticipated so little danger that they objected to the securities, while others thought all securities insufficient. It was, therefore, to him a great source of satisfaction to see a measure introduced so little liable to misconstruction, and so little connected with danger, as to relieve its friends from all those embarrassments. Nothing could be more simple than the object of his right hon. friend. He proposed to repeal a part of an act which excluded a few Irish and British peers from their seats in the upper House, and to restore them to the enjoyment of this privilege. Those peers had been restored to the privilege of approaching their sovereign, and giving him advice in managing the affairs of the nation; and the intended measure would only enable them to defend in their places in parliament the advice which they had privately given. No objection had been stated to the justice or the expediency of the general measure, no apprehensions of danger had been uttered at concession, no attempt had been made to show that it would be bestowed on the unworthy. It had been opposed only on points of etiquette, and the debate upon it had been turned to disputed portions of history. It was said, that the motion ought not to be agreed to, because the concession here obtained would only lay the ground for additional demand, and because this was a partial measure, preparatory to the general measure. This was no objection to those who had brought forward and carried the general measure in this House last year, and who had not concealed that it was intended next session again to submit it to the consideration of parliament. He (Mr. P.) would be glad, before the general measure should be again submitted to the other House, where it had been lost last year, that those who sat in it should be called upon as men, as gentlemen, and as men of honour, to receive among them those peers who had originally been unjustly deprived of their privileges or to state the grounds, in law and justice, of their continued exclusion. He [illegible], when these peers knocked at [illegible] of that [illegible] of their house for admission, th[illegible] was ex[illegible] who opposed their entrance would be able to state the principle of right and justice on which they acted, and would not sanction rules which would place their own valued privileges and hereditary distinctions at the mercy of some Titus Oates of after-times. This measure of justice was, to reverse an act of attainder passed on the evidence of the most infamous of mankind, and in circumstances of alarm which had now for ever disappeared. The least attention to these circumstances would show the injustice of the exclusion. The cause of it was not that the Catholic peers were dangerous counsellors, but that the House of Commons, in the reign of Charles 2nd, suspected the king of being a Catholic, a fact which, though unknown at the time, was afterwards ascertained to be the case, and dreaded a Catholic successor to the throne. It was, certain that if a bill of exclusion against the latter could have been carried, this bill of attainder against the peers would never have passed. What, then, was done? The innocent had been proscribed and punished because an exclusion bill could not be carried. The guiltless were attainted because the proper object of attack could not be reached. His right hon. friend (Mr. Peel) had said, that it was not alone the fear of a Popish succession, or the alarm of popish plots, which had led the parliament of the reign of Charles 2nd to pass the act which the motion was intended to repeal, but that for a long time a just distrust was entertained of the Catholics, and a plot was going forward to subvert the liberties and change the religion of the country by foreign aid, that an alliance had been formed with the court of France for this object, and that the Roman Catholics were ready to second any invasion of their country which might enable them to regain their lost power. He would admit that the Catholics of that day were not well affected to a Protestant state, or to the Protestant throne. Nor could they be expected to be so. He admitted that other causes of suspicion against them existed than the fable of the Popish plot. Be it allowed that they were disaffected then! The question was, were they so now? This recurrence to history would be found to contain the strongest argument for the motion; for, if the spirit of the Catholics now was so different from what it had been then, why apply the same rule to both?—On what ground continue an exclusion against a loyal and well-affected peer, which had been obtained against his disloyal and disaffected ancestor?—On what ground enforce an act which passed when doubts existed of a Protestant succession and of rebellion, when the succession to the throne is secure, and disaffection no longer existed? But his right hon. friend had not felt secure in resting on the history of Charles the Second's reign.—He had gone down to the Revolution, and had appealed to the principles then sanctioned, in support of his own views. He begged leave to set his right hon. friend right on some of these points. The laws against the Catholics, to which he had alluded, formed no part of the Revolution—they formed no part of the Bill of Rights. The last act was not mentioned in the Bill of Rights. The amended oath of supremacy was excluded in that bill; because it was intended, by setting it forth at full, to show the difference between that oath and the oath of the same name framed in the reign of queen Elizabeth. When the Revolution was appealed to as a sanction to measures of a penal and partial character, or on questions of this kind, he professed that he did not know what was meant. Was it meant that all the acts which preceded, accompanied, or followed the Revolution, were parts of the Revolution? If they were, then the repeal of the penal laws against Catholics, and the relaxation of various statutes for admitting them to civil privileges, had made great inroads on the glorious Revolution. According to this principle, the law that deprived the Catholic of the superintendance of his own children's education, the law that prohibited him from acquiring property, the law that banished him to within six miles of the palace of Westminster, were all parts of the glorious Revolution. In short, the 10th and 11th of William, with all its injustice and cruelty, were parts of that Revolution. By that statute, saying mass was punishable with perpetual imprisonment; the Catholic was to forfeit his estate to his nearest Protestant relation, unless he abjured his faith, and he was subjected to many other persecutions. When the glorious Revolution was considered as giving a sanction to acts like these, it might be of use to inquire into the history of this statute. It was given by bishop Burnet, but he would read it in the language of Mr. Burke:—"A party in the nation, enemies to the system of the Revolution, were then in opposition to the government of king William. They knew that our glorious deliverer was an enemy to all persecution. They knew that he came to free us from slavery and popery, out of a country where a third of the people are contented Catholics under a Protestant government. He came with a part of his army composed of those very Catholics to overset the power of a Popish prince. Such is the effect of a tolerating spirit; and so much is liberty served in every way, and by all persons, by a manly adherence to its own principles. Whilst freedom is true to itself, every thing becomes subject to it, and its very adversaries are an instrument in its hands. This party resolved to make the king either violate his principles of toleration, or incur the odium of protecting papists. They therefore brought in this bill, and made it purposely wicked and absurd, that it might be rejected. The then court party, discovering their game, turned the tables on them, and returned their bill to them stuffed with still greater absurdities, that its loss might lie on its original authors. They, finding their own ball thrown back upon them, kicked it back again to their adversaries. And thus this act, loaded with the double injustice of two parties, neither of whom intended to pass what they hoped the other would be persuaded to reject, went through the legislature contrary to the wish of all parts of it, and of all the parties who composed it. In this manner, those insolent and profligate factions, as if they were playing with balls and counters, made a sport of the fortunes and liberties of their fellow creatures." Now, all this was done in the glorious Revolution. But the glorious Revolution was at an end if it consisted of this statute as one of its component parts; for it had been repealed long ago, and the argument of his right hon. friend would better have been employed in 1791 than now. If, then, the laws which preceded and followed the Revolution were not parts of it, why should we be restrained from doing an act of right and justice by an appeal to it? The principles of the Revolution did not require the exclusion of any class of the people from civil privileges, on account of religious opinions. The Protestant religion, he allowed, had had a great influence in establishing the Hanoverian succession, but it was the spirit of freedom which was the cause of both. He did not feel disposed to go at length into the history of religion in this country; but he would just observe, that the Reformation arose not so much from a dislike to the doctrines of the Roman Catholic church, as from resistance to the exactions of the court of Rome; and during the reign of the Stuarts, the Protestant religion was always joined with freedom to oppose popery and arbitrary power. If the Protestant establishment could only be preserved by the maintenance of principles which would exclude great classes of the people from civil privileges, the price would certainly be great. Mr. Burke, no enemy to the establishment, had truly observed, "I cannot conceive how any [illegible] worse can be said of the Protestant [illegible] of the Church of England than [illegible] that, wherever it is established, it becomes necessary to deprive the body of the people of their liberties, and to reduce them to a state of civil servitude." This was not necessary in his (Mr. P's) opinion. The safety of the establishment could be easily reconciled with the admission of persons, professing another religion, to civil rights. He would, therefore, support the motion as a great measure of justice. He would have supported it, though it had included only one peer. Every instance of exclusion, every hour of delay in admitting them to their rights, was an injustice—while every concession was an act of conciliation and justice. It had been objected, that this measure, which affected the other House, should begin in this. This objection must be stated on the part of the other House; but it had not been acted upon last year, when a bill was thrown out in that House which affected the Commons. When a joint bill was sent up, it was rejected because it was a joint bill: when a separate bill should be sent up, it would be rejected as a separate bill: there never would be wanting pretexts for rejecting. The right hon. gentleman concluded by warmly supporting the motion.

Mr. Wetherell rose amidst a loud cry for the question. He considered the proposition a novelty, and was desirous of making a few observations on some of its points. The right hon. mover had departed from the principle upon which the greatest authorities had supported the claims to Catholic emancipation. He might mention Pitt, Fox, Windham, and Ponsonby. Those distinguished characters had all declared, that no measure but a general measure should be brought before parliament. It was formerly held that concessions should be made on one side and security given on the other. By that arrangement Catholics and Protestants were to be reconciled. That was the proposition on which the bill of last session was founded; but the measure proposed by the right hon. gentleman was all concession on one side, and no security on the other. If Catholic peers were allowed to sit in the House of Peers, could that House say that Catholic commoners should not come to the House of Commons? If they were to be admitted, which they must be if the present proposition was adopted, what would become of Mr. Pitt's principle, that no concession could be made without securities for the preservation of the constitution. The right hon. gentleman proposed the introduction of six or eight Catholic noblemen to parliament, who could not be bound to subscribe to any test whatever. The bill reminded him of Dr. Johnson's account of his journey in Scotland, where he went to an inn, and found nothing solid or fluid in the place, but an entire blank of provisions. The right hon. gentleman's bill was a perfect blank of securities. If the right hon. gentleman was right in the application of his principle without securities, all the persons whose names he had mentioned had taken a narrow and partial view of the subject; for not one of them had ventured to ask for concessions without securities. The House ought to see to what a compliance with the measure proposed would lead. If such a bill were carried, Catholic commoners would, next session, claim to sit in that House without restraint. If they turned to the church, the clergy would say, Why make us submit to the Crown the nomination of bishops? Why claim a veto?—You have rescinded your restrictions with respect to members of parliament, and you ought no longer to restrain us. That would be the necessary consequence arising from the adoption of the right hon. gentleman's measure. His opinion was, that parliament, doing their duty, could never admit Catholics to the privileges of the constitution without securities. The rights of Protestants and Catholics could never be secured, on the principle of the right hon. gentleman's bill. If it were true, that the public opinion was, as it was said, liberalising on this question—if its advocates were every day gaining ground, and the strength of its adversaries diminishing—if all these things were true, let the question, in its entire state, be submitted to the consideration of the House. He should prefer the passing of the whole measure of concession rather than entertain the subject piecemeal. Instead of his mind being convinced by the course the right hon. gentleman had taken, he was free to confess that, as to the extension of concession, it had, from the nature of the course pursued, rather retrograded. He was not disposed to deal in compliment: he had no wish to measure spears with the right hon. gentleman; but, in the spirit of that free agency which it was the duty of a member of parliament to feel, he must say that the measure that night proposed was the acme and perfection of unrivalled singularity. What was the object of its introduction by the right hon. gentleman? He believed it was because the right hon. gentleman was anxious to make that speech in the year 1822, which, from circumstances, he would not be able to make in 1823. The learned member then proceeded, but the noise which prevailed rendered him wholly inaudible.

Mr. Canning rose to reply. After the full measure of indulgence which the House, in its kindness, had extended to him, he assured them that he reluctantly availed himself of that privilege which the forms of the House extended to those who had the honour of submitting any proposition to its deliberation. There were, however, some points in the speech of his right hon. friend (Mr. Peel), and in that of the hon. and learned gentleman who had just sat down, so peculiar, that he could not forego the opportunity of making a few observations upon them. If the measure he had introduced was of the singular character the hon. and learned gentleman had described it to be, he must say that it had been treated by its opponents with equal singularity. If they had not given him arguments, they were at least not sparing in admonitions—gentle indeed, but still admonitions against the course which he had pursued. All the speeches of these opponents, not excepting the speech of the noble lord, who was in the habit of presenting to the House the very petitions of those Catholic peers, whose restoration to their hereditary honours he was then advocating, dwelt not upon the impropriety of the measure itself, but on the imprudence of bringing it forward at the present time, and in its present shape. His right hon. friend (Mr. Peel) even—no doubt with that anxiety for the entire question for which he was so peculiarly distinguished—even he had pointed out the inexpediency of the measure, because, forsooth, it tended in its present shape, to defeat the success of the general question. He was free to confess that, when he entered the House that day, he entertained some doubts suggested by the inexpediency of the motion he was about to make. Since he had heard the speeches of the opponents of that motion, those doubts had vanished and he now with confidence felt, that its success was the certain harbinger of that larger and more comprehensive concession, which his right hon. friend, the secretary of state for the home department, no longer deprecated, but it would seem anticipated with satisfaction. [Hear, hear.] His right hon. friend had stated, that he (Mr. C) had only cited a solitary precedent, in support of the interference of the House of Commons, as to the rights and privileges of the peerage, and that the interference was an act of disfranchisement. He must appeal to the recollection of the House, as to the use he had made of that precedent. He had characterized the act of disfranchisement, as one of gross injustice—and of unjustifiable violence; and he had quoted the precedent of the 30th of Charles the 2nd, to show, that as the injustice of the disfranchisement originated with the House of Commons, that House had made the subsequent atonement. He had then drawn an exact parallel between those precedents and the state of the Catholic Peers. A House of Commons, under false pretences, in 1678, disfranchised these peers of their rights and their honours, and he now called on a House of Commons in 1822, convened under different circumstances, to make reparation for that injustice, by a restoration of those rights to their posterity. Another objection of his right hon. friend was founded on the state of the peerage of Scotland and Ireland growing out of the Union, and as contrasted with what he (Mr. C.) had argued as the absolute rights of the peerage. The anomalies which sprung from these two great arrangements were out of the march of ordinary events, and beyond the landmarks of the constitution. Because two kingdoms merged their respective legislatures in the legislature of Great Britain, and out of these extraordinary proceedings—exceptions to general principles resulted; would any man contend that the case of a British peer unjustly deprived of his franchises, was not to be considered with a view of remedying that injustice? What could be more anomalous than the situation of an Irish peer capable of being a representative of the peerage of that kingdom by delegation, and capable of surrendering his rights as a peer, by being elected a member of the House of Commons? But was that his (Mr. C.'s) fault? Was this bill to be presumed defective because it could not remove anomalies which sprung out of an extraordinary state arrangement? But there was in that arrangement, as it affected the Union of Ireland, this great clue to the consideration of the question, that the oaths imposed upon an Irish representative peer, or an Irish peer voting for such representative, were such as were then taken, or shall be hereafter taken, by a British peer. If, then, these oaths constituted an essential and fundamental part of the constitution, how came it that the concurrent sense of two legislatures, by the very spirit and letter of the act of Union, left these securities open to the alteration of the united parliament. Would they have done so if they had put the same construction on their immortality, on which the whole of the objections of his right hon. friend rested? If they had not, contemplated the possibility of other oaths—if they had considered the tests as they stood at the period, as the immutable and eternal securities against Catholic participation—would the parliaments of Great Britain and Ireland have left such a question open to subsequent doubt, in the provisions of an arrangement which constituted their permanent incorporation? It was perfectly true, that Scotland, on her part stipulated against any Scotch Catholic sitting in the two Houses of parliament—the introduction of the word "Protestant" in her part of the articles barred all alteration. All therefore that could be done, under such a restriction, was, to leave it open to Scotland, in the progress of the liberal spirit of the age, to apply to the united legislature when she wished to remove that impediment. As England was the stronger party to that contract, the proposition should be left entirely to Scotland; and, though he felt the injustice to the individuals, he preferred the lesser evil of subjecting to disfranchisement two Scotch Catholic peers, rather than risk the imputation of violating the articles of Union. It was, however, rather extraordinary, and not in accordance with the general tone of the Irish character, that they should, in their arrangement, have so sagaciously provided for those alterations which an enlightened policy might suggest, while the more staid, and prudent, and provident character of the Scottish nation, fettered itself by positive restrictions—he felt he had little more to add. The learned gentleman had, indeed, saved him from the effort. The learned gentleman had said, he would reserve his more cogent arguments for the future stages of the measure—a mark of his sagacity, which he (Mr. C.) hailed as decisive of the success of the proposition now under discussion. Neither the learned gentleman, nor his right hon. friend, discussed that question on the grounds of its legality, its expediency, or its justice. They were adverse to it, because it was a partial measure. Now, considering it partial, only as constituting a part of the whole, he could not discover the grounds of that blame which in such a sense, attached to his proposition. He had heard a lesson on that subject read, and successfully read, by those who defeated the general measure of Catholic concession, on the very ground that from its generality they were perplexed. Give them any specific part, any fit or suitable proposition, and they were ready to discuss it. Here, then, was a part of the great question resting on its own particular merits—here was a dismemberment of the general claims relieved from the perplexity of details, that might be decided without any pledge to future extension. And yet, the very persons who so ardently sought for the separated proposition, now turned round upon the proposer, converted the separate recommendation into its demerit, and exclaimed, we want no isolated, no partial concession. "Our great capacity has stomach for it all." For his own part, he could not recognize the value of that attachment to the constitution, which only manifested itself in hostility to the speculative tenets of millions of his countrymen. He appreciated far more highly the blessings of the constitution under which he lived, than to think that it essentially consisted, not in protection, but exclusion—not in the consciousness of the blessings it imparted, but in the perpetuity of tests, which he never heard administered at that table without feeling that while they were useless as to the discharge of any legislative function, they were well calculated to give pain to millions of his fellow subjects. And yet they were told, that independently of all positive claims, exclusion was the talisman that called all the virtues of our constitution into existence; and oaths of disqualification were the securities on which its permanence depended. His right hon. friend had told him, that he had under-rated the extent of those dangers, under which these disqualifications were introduced—that he had not sufficiently calculated on the hazards, which the Protestant religion encountered in the reign of Charles 2nd. He did not under-rate those dangers. He believed that a more profligate or corrupt monarch than Charles 2nd never sate upon the throne. He was bent upon destroying the liberties of the country, and introducing slavery. He was secretly attached to popery, while he openly professed Protestantism; and history related, that he went to a Catholic and a Protestant chapel on one and the same day, and received the communion at both. He was a bigot at the commencement of his reign, and a tyrant at its conclusion. But, all this and much more, which he was willing to concede, would make against and not for the argument of his right hon. friend. Did he not perceive that the more depraved the character of the government of that day, the less excuse there was now for the continuance of those acts of Catholic persecution which marked the history of that period? Every circumstance between that period and the present was not only dissimilar, but contrasted. He would go along with his right hon. friend in condemnation of all those acts of bigotry and oppression which disgraced the reign of that profligate monarch; but he must deny the remotest similitude between that period and the present time. What danger could we feel in restoring the descendants of six Catholic peers to the enjoyment of their family honours? We had now no fear of a Popish king, or a Popish presumptive heir to the throne. We had none of those dangers which but palliated the injustice of that disfranchisement. These were objections which met the opponents of his motion in full front, and which, notwithstanding the "fears of the brave and follies of the wise," had no ground of existence in the circumstances of these times. Either these restrictions were continued on the grounds on which they were originally imposed, or the advocates for their continuance were called upon to show the reasons why they should be perpetuated. What equivalent, in the latter case, could his right hon. friend show for a Popish king—a Popish successor—or a ministry conspiring against the religion of the state and the constitution of the country? The consideration of such fears as these might be adjourned, with the remainder of the hon. and learned gentleman's speech, to a future day. He could not conclude without anticipating that the present partial success would lead to the attainment of the greater concession; the benefit of which he sincerely trusted the country would speedily enjoy.

The House then divided: Ayes 219; Noes 244; Majority for the motion 5.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, May 1.

Reform of Parliament.] Mr. James presented a petition from Carlisle, praying for a speedy Reform of Parliament. He attributed the present distress to excessive taxation. The hon. member for Portarlington had said, that the variation in the currency, occasioned by the cash payments bill, did not exceed 10 per cent. He differed from him. That hon. member had differed from himself at various times. He had at one time said, that the difference between the value of gold and paper did not exceed three per cent, then 3½, then 4, and so on till he now stated it at 10; but whoever took the trouble of reading Mr. Cobbett's little pamphlets on the subject (and they were to be had at a cheap rate), would be convinced that the hon. member knew nothing at all about the matter [much laughter]. The hon. member had also said, that the prices depended on the supply and demand; but if he had read Cobbett, he would have found that the prices also depended upon the quantity of the circulating medium in the market; and that when the circulation was much limited, the result would be to double the weight of taxation.

Ordered to lie on the table.

Naval and Military Pensions.] The House having resolved itself into a Committee on the Naval and Military Pensions,

The Chancellor of the Exchequer proceeded to call the attention of the committee, not to the general plan which his noble friend had laid before the House a few night ago, but to that detached part of it which related to the commutation of the expenses of the country in the items of half-pay, fixed annuities, or civil allowances. By adopting the plan of his noble friend there would be a saving to the country of between 2,000,000*l.* and 3,000,000*l.* a year. The public were naturally anxious to learn the means by which this saving was to be made. His noble friend had, however, so fully detailed the principles of his plan, that it only remained for him to fill up the details. And, in alluding to these details, it was obvious that much must be left to those who had the carrying the contract into execution, and much also to the wisdom of that House. In the present stage of the proceedings, all he asked was, that the committee should approve of the general principle upon which the measure was founded. It might be asked, "Why does not the chancellor of the Exchequer, acting upon his own responsibility, make any bargain by which he conceives the public will be benefited, and afterwards apply to parliament for their approval?" To this he answered, that this was a measure of so novel a nature, so much out of the track of his official duty, that he did not feel himself justified in adopting it without the sanction of parliament. This plan was not at all mixed up with the question of the currency; nor was it in any respect mixed up with the question of the charter of the Bank of England. As to the currency of small country notes, he hoped shortly to name a day for bringing that part of the measure before them. The single question for the committee that evening was, to consider how far the sums paid annually in half-pay allowances, pensions for civil services, &c. were to be looked upon in the nature of a public debt: and whether the public would not derive benefit from a commutation of the present fixed charge. The soldier or civil servant holding half-pay or pension, or other such allowance, might be looked upon as having as complete a right to that allowance (subject of course to the condition of being called into active service, or to the power of the Crown to remove him) as the public creditor had to the interest which he derived from money advanced to government. This principle was so clear that when at the close of the late war he proposed a more liberal provision for those retiring from service, he had called it the payment of a public debt of gratitude and justice. In proposing this plan, he did not mean to make the slightest alteration in the situation of the persons receiving half-pay, pensions, or other allowances. They were to continue, as they now are, at full liberty to exchange half for full, or full for half-pay—to sell out, or to alter their situations, with the same freedom that they had hitherto enjoyed. It might be proper just to state the classes of pensioners to which it was designed that this commutation should extend. It would comprehend, as far as possible, all naval and military allowances, and all compensations arising from civil superannuation; reserving such of the latter as might in future be granted, to be charged upon the fund for that purpose about to be created. Those pensions and allowances to be excluded were, first, such as were paid out of the consolidated fund, amounting to between 400,000*l*, and 500,000*l*. a year. It had been considered that the payments to the royal family and to illustrious persons, as matters of justice and bounty for high and meritorious services, did not come within the object of this arrangement. However, this would of course be a matter open to discussion. It was also proposed to exclude all pensions upon the civil list, and upon the 4½ per cent duties because they were charged on limited funds belonging to the Crown. The saving, if any, would place at the disposal of the Crown a larger sum than at present, for the display of its bounty; or if there was a loss, it would limit and restrain its liberality. The amount of the whole of the pensions and allowances included, would be about 5,000,000*l*. It had been found more convenient to take round numbers, than to attempt any exactness with regard to matters in themselves of a fluctuating nature; the death of some parties, and the accession of others, produced changes almost from day to day. The table of calculation which he had got made, though not perhaps minutely correct would be found tolerably accurate. The table was made out from the returns of the ages of 15,000 persons; about one-fourth of the actual number of the annuitants intended to be provided for, the whole amount being about 60,000, and was founded upon the natural decrement of human life. It was clear that the annuities of these persons composed a part of the debt of the country, subject, of course, to a gradual decrease year after year; but that charge, so heavy at present as five millions, would not, for a considerable time, be lessened to any considerable degree, and would not till a very remote period, finally cease to exist. It was probable that some of the persons who composed the number of annuitants to be provided for would exist for 60 or even for 70 years to come, though those cases would necessarily be very rare. In the course of 45 years, the amount of the annuities which at present stood at five millions, would be diminished in all probability to little more than 300,000*l*. If it should be asked why, instead of granting annuities for a determinate period of years, the government might not agree to pay to the contractors annuities for a stated number of years, he would answer, that such a plan would be full of difficulties; that contingencies might arise which would defeat it—that it might be attended with an expence almost ruinous to the contractor, unless the government acceded to terms which parliament would not be justified in sanctioning. As the case stood, the only uncertainty in the case was, the fluctuation in the value of money, which from time to time might take place; thus was it, stript of most of the elements of risk. The calculations were, indeed, much more difficult than on the ordinary case of a loan; but the extended period of 45 years gave the contractors the means of providing against contingencies. They might avail themselves of a rise in the funds, or of a fall in the value of money, and by temporary loans, remedy temporary inconveniences.—The proposition he had to submit to the House was, to offer a fixed annuity for a period of 45 years, to such persons as should contract to pay the annuities on the half-pay and superannuations, with which the country was at present subject. He mentioned the period of 45 years because, on the principle of the Sinking-fund, a sum of one per cent was held to liquidate capital. There was another reason for fixing on the term of 45 years. In 38 years time, the long annuities would fall in. Whatever relief that circumstance might afford the public, when it should take place, it would undoubtedly subject the parties more immediately concerned to loss and inconvenience; and if to that were added the withdrawing of annuities to the amount of two millions or two millions and a half, the inconvenience would be considerably augmented. It was therefore proposed to extend the period to seven years beyond the falling in of the long annuities, during which time the inconvenience he had just touched on would cease. He was aware that parties disposed to contract might prefer an indefinite annuity, dependent upon lives, to one which was terminated at a fixed period; but, whether it were of one kind or of another, the transaction would stand completely clear of the sinking fund. The principle on which ministers went, was a commutation of debt now existing. If, instead of being a debt, it had been an annuity terminating at an earlier period than 45 years, where would have been the objection to the plan now under consideration? If an annuity for 12 or 15 years had been commuted for an annuity for 45, what objection could have been made on the part of the public creditor? If it had been actually unfunded debt, payable from year to year, and provided for by the funding of Exchequer bills, what ground of resistance could have been offered? Another reason justifying the principle of commutation, was the novel nature of the charge proposed to be provided for, which had arisen out of extraordinary circumstances—the extended duration and the enormous expense of the late war. The resolutions stated, that the half-pay and other annuities, previous to 1792, amounted to only 650,000*l.* The sum was now increased to 5,000,000*l.*, partly in the mode stated, and partly owing to new regulations, by which the allowances were made so much more liberal than formerly, and extended to cases not before provided for. The committee would feel the impropriety of his entering into such minute calculations, as could lead even to a remote knowledge of the terms on which government might be disposed to contract. Every thing necessary would be explained to the parties, when there was a probability that a bargain would be made; but the secret of government must be kept, until the transaction was in a shape to be submitted to parliament for its final approbation.—The right hon. gentleman then moved:—"1. That the amount of Military and Naval Pensions, and Civil Superannuations may be estimated at about 5,000,000*l.*—2. That this sum, calculated as an annuity guaranteed by parliament, may be considered as a burthen, forming a charge upon the public income of the country, for the lives of the annuitants, subject to such regulations as are applicable in each case.—3. That the amount of this charge has been increased, principally by the long duration and extended exertions of the late war, from the sum of about 650,000*l.* to the said sum of 5,000,000*l.* and by regulations introduced during the war.—4. That, under this great accumulation of annual charge, and in the present state of the country, it is expedient to make provision for apportioning this burthen so as to insure its final extinction, either by an equal annual annuity, terminable within 45 years, or by permanent annuities, with such provision for the repayment thereof as is required by the act 32nd Geo. 3rd, c. 55. for the reduction of the National Debt.—5. That the Commissioners of his Majesty's Treasury should treat and contract (subject to the approbation of parliament) with such bodies politic and corporate, or other persons, as may be willing to undertake to provide for the charge of the above-mentioned pensions and allowances, or any part thereof, in either of the above modes; and who shall give adequate security for the performance of such undertaking."

The first resolution being put,

Colonel Davies thought, that the project was a covert attack upon the sinking fund: it was relieving ourselves at the expense of posterity. He thought that the public would be exposed to considerable loss, calculating upon a payment annually of 2,800,000*l.* For the first sixteen years of the 45, the contractors would pay 63,000,000*l.*, and the public only 42,000,000*l.*, which would be a gain to the latter of 21,000,000*l.* But, for the remaining period, the contractor would pay 39,000,000*l.*, and the public 84,000,000*l.* So that the latter would be losers to the extent of 45,000,000*l.*, and the loss upon the whole would be 24,000,000*l.* Against this, it was true, should be set off the interest of the sum saved during the first period.

Mr. Bright contended, that the whole scheme was a delusion, designed to direct the eye of the public from what ought to be the great object of parliament—a reduction of taxation. The salt-tax and the duty on leather might hereby be removed; but the country would eventually pay dear for it. Was it to be supposed, that a contractor who would receive no benefit until the expiration of 16 years, and whose term would not expire for nearly half a century, would be satisfied with any thing less than a very extravagant interest? This plan affected the whole system of superannuations. Many most illegal allowances had been made; and if this project were carried, these allowances could never be revised.

Sir J. Newport insisted, that the principle of the scheme was directly in contravention of the sinking fund. If the sinking fund was to be abandoned, would it not be more rational to allow the commissioners for the redemption of the national debt to become the contractors? Thus, the double machinery now contemplated would be avoided, as well as the large bonus which the contractor must expect to be paid. He agreed with the hon. member for Bristol, that the attention of the public should not be withdrawn from the reduction of taxation, and thought this measure would be prejudicial in that point of view.

Mr. Beaumont said, it had been observed that this proposition would divert the attention of the public from the necessity of reducing the weight of taxation. If it were likely to have such an effect, he would so far be hostile to the measure; but he thought it would not be a probable consequence of the proposition. He entirely agreed with those who were of opinion that the taxes should be diminished; and, for that very reason, he looked upon this measure as desirable, because, to a certain extent, it would relieve the public burthens. He admitted that the proposition was not consistent with what the chancellor of the exchequer had so often said relative to the sinking fund: but he did not find fault with that inconsistency since it enabled parliament to relieve those who had already made great exertions, and left posterity to bear some portion of the burthen. If his project even went to remove the whole of the sinking fund, he would not object to it.

Mr. J. Martin said, that if this proposition had been made by any of those who were hostile to the sinking fund, it would not have surprised him; but that those who expressed so much partiality to the sinking fund system should propose a motion like the present was indeed extraordinary. If the principle were admitted, why might they not convert the long annuities of 38 years into much longer annuities? Why might they not, in the same manner, convert the tontine and other annuities into long annuities also? Now, it was remarkable, that at the present day, government were granting life annuities. The fact was, that ministers adopted this new plan, because they were determined not to reduce the expenditure. They had made up their minds to continue the employment of useless postmasters-general and expensive clerks. He thought it was absolutely necessary for the credit of the country that a sinking fund should exist beyond the expenditure; and as this measure militated against the principle of that fund, he would give it every opposition in his power.

Mr. Hudson Gurney said, the charge for half-pay and pensions was that of a debt of five millions a-year, which debt had in its nature its own effectual sinking fund, in the dropping off of the parties lives. Instead of paying these annuities, ministers were about to contract with others to pay them for us—to be reimbursed at a very distant period, under circumstances of great hazard. And this no one could be found to undertake, without a most wasteful remuneration. He had voted for the motion to keep up a sinking fund of five millions; that is, an honest and real sinking fund, from excess of income beyond expenditure, which, yielding to what the noble lord had justly called "an ignorant impatience of taxation," ministers were now about to destroy, whilst they were going to accumulate a nominal and fallacious sinking fund, by their plan of suffering it to increase at compound interest — the end of which would be, that the minister of the day would seize it, after the example of the chancellor of the exchequer in 1813 [Hear, hear!]. If it were really necessary to reduce taxes to the amount of two millions, it would be much better, and far cheaper, to take them from the sinking fund at once, in a plain and direct manner [Hear, hear!].

Mr. T. Wilson would support the proposed plan, because all the benefit would accrue from it which had been predicted from the infringement of the sinking fund, without the evils arising from such a course. It had been said, that if they did not change their measures willingly, they would be forced to do so by the taxes becoming unproductive. It was for this reason that he wished to preserve the sinking fund, which might be useful in supplying deficiencies in case of such an event occurring. This plan, too, offered that relief for the agricultural distress which gentlemen had been calling for.

Mr. Ricardo was astonished how ministers could come down with grave faces, and propose such a measure, after all the anxiety they had expressed on the subject of the sinking fund. This plan was nothing more nor less than an invasion of that fund. The chancellor of the exchequer had said, that these annuities were a part of the debt of the country. This he (Mr. R.) admitted. But, supposing the object of ministers was, to relieve the country from taxation to the amount of 2,200,000*l.*, and they took that sum from the sinking fund, he would ask them to compare the situation in which the country would be placed at the end of 45 years, with that in which it would stand at the expiration of the same period by adopting the plan now proposed. In both cases the object would be to raise 2,200,000*l.* per annum; but, at the end of 45 years, acting on the plan now introduced, would not the country be more in debt, than it would be if the sum were taken immediately out of the sinking fund? Now, if this proposition were true—and it could not be controverted—was it not, he demanded, an invasion of the sinking fund? He, however, had no objection to it on that account: but it was the greatest inconsistency in the right hon. gentleman to say that the sinking fund was to be held sacred, while he came to the House with a proposition that would leave the country more in debt 45 years hence than if 2,200,000*l.* were taken from it at once. He agreed with his hon. friend (Mr. Gurney), that the debt which was the object of this proposition carried a sinking fund along with it. Year by year, as lives dropped off, it was decreasing; and what was the object of the sinking fund but to place all public debt in the situation of this particular debt? Thus, if 30,000,000*l.* were owing in one year, to reduce it to 29,500,000*l.* in the next; then to 29,000,000*l.*, then to 28,500,000*l.*; and so on progressively, until at last the whole was liquidated. A less beneficial effect would be produced by prolonging the debt beyond the term to which it would extend, but for this plan, which he could not help considering an entire fallacy.

Mr. Huskisson did not mean to controvert the indisputable proposition of his hon. friend, that a debt of 5,000,000*l.* depending on lives, carried its own sinking fund with it; but he must deny that the proposed measure was any invasion of the act of 1792, which was the foundation of all the provisions on which the sinking fund now stood. The proposition of his right hon. friend carried with it the liquidation of debt as much as the operation of the sinking fund did; because it proceeded on the principle of an annuity terminable at the expiration of a number of years, instead of depending on lives. The act of 1792 contemplated two modes of extinguishing debt. One of these was the appropriating one per cent on the principal stock created, that one per cent being still placed under the control of parliament. But, was not the present plan of liquidating the debt preferable?

Here an annuity was granted for a certain term of years—it required no sinking fund charge—the annuity was derived from parliament, and it could not be converted to any other purpose. Surely hon. gentlemen could not argue gravely that his right hon. friend, having a charge of 5,000,000*l.* to provide for, and procuring persons to contract for the payment of that charge, which would decrease in a gradual proportion, was thereby invading the sinking fund. Of course, the contractor would expect profit hereafter. To the extent of such profit, a certain burthen would be thrown on posterity, instead of the present generation bearing it all, by letting the annuities expire with the lives of the parties. But, the circumstances in which the country had been placed, the effect of which had been to increase a charge of 2,000,000*l.* to 5,000,000*l.*, which charge now bore on the present time, left parliament at liberty, quite consistently with the provision of the sinking fund act, to raise a loan for the payment of that charge; taking care that, in raising such loan, it carried within itself the means of liquidation in 45 years. Supposing the country was 5,000,000*l.* in debt, on short annuities, at 5, 8, 12, and 16 years, and it was thought advisable to convert all these into annuities for 45 years, in what measure or degree would this affect the sinking fund? It would certainly throw a portion of the burthen on others, with reference to the period to which the annuities were carried beyond that originally proposed; but parliament was at liberty to adopt such a measure, because it was a question of expediency. It depended altogether upon this—whether, under the present circumstances of the country, after having, during a war of 25 years, taken upon themselves to raise about 230,000,000*l.* of war taxes, specially for the benefit of posterity, they were not justified in throwing on that posterity, the small burthen which was now made a matter of reproach? To show how beneficial it was, in producing a diminution of burthens, he need only refer, in opposition to those who disapproved of the sinking fund system, to the recent reduction of the 5 per cents. If the sinking fund had been destroyed some years ago, would there have been the smallest prospect of reducing the interest of that stock? An hon. member had observed, that government were granting life annuities at the moment that they were converting the half-pay, &c., into annuities for years. But this did not affect the present plan. Parliament might convert those life annuities (which were now chargeable on the sinking fund for the year) into annuities for years. The hon. member for Bristol had stated, that the whole of the superannuations, many of which were on too liberal a scale, and others illegally granted, would, by this measure, be placed beyond the control of parliament. Now, his right hon. friend began by distinctly stating, that parliament would continue to enjoy the same power of regulation and revision, which it at present possessed. The bargain was one by which the contractors might gain, or by which they might make no benefit whatever; in either of which cases the public must be the gainer, and yet the hon. member for Portarlington contended that the country must, of necessity, be more in debt, at the expiration of 45 years, than it would be if a sum were taken from the sinking fund annually. Another objection made by the hon. member for Bristol was, that those who entered into this contract would not expose themselves for 16 years to a very great risk, unless they were certain of some extensive advantages. The hon. member did not, however, seem to understand the working of this plan. When these long annuities for 45 years were granted, they would be saleable in the market, like any other stock of the day. The contractors would, therefore, be enabled, when the stipulated annual payment came round, to sell so much of that stock as would be necessary for the fulfilment of their bargain. Thus, the required sum would be made up, without the contractor being called on to furnish it all. He confidently trusted in the experience of his right hon. friend, to watch the speculations of the contractors; and that if he could not make a favourable bargain he would devise other means of providing for an arrangement by which a relief similar to that now sought to be obtained would be given to the public.

Mr. Hume said, that the noble marquis had promised a plan by which the public was to be relieved from a part of the dead weight for naval and military pensions. Now, the resolution before the committee applied no more to that dead weight of naval and military pensions than to any of the other charges with which the nation was loaded. The boasted plan which ministers held up as some new system of finance, was neither more nor less than means of raising a loan by deferred annuities. Now this plan of making a new loan for relieving the present distress, and adding to the public debt by burthening posterity, was resorted to by the very ministers who lately spoke so loudly about preserving inviolate a sinking fund of five millions, that we might reduce the charge upon posterity. Our first object was to pay off our debt to relieve posterity; and for that we had provided a sinking fund. Our second was, to relieve ourselves from our burthens by increasing the burthen on posterity, and that would be accomplished by a remission of taxes. The plan proposed in the resolutions was intended to effect some immediate relief in direct opposition to the system on which we acted of keeping on taxes for a sinking fund to relieve posterity. Now it had been said, and justly, that we were to look at the expediency of the proposed measure, and that expediency would decide the question, whether or not it was profitable. He (Mr. H.) would ask how was the country to be relieved in the most certain manner? Only by that system which was attended by the smallest expense. Let the scheme of the right hon. gentleman be examined by that test. We were said to have a sinking fund of 5,000,000*l.* a year, and we had a charge of 5,000,000*l.* for military and naval pensions, which, according to this plan, was to be extinguished by the death of the persons receiving the pensions in 45 years, by contracting with certain persons to pay the first year 4,900,000*l.*, in the second 2,700,000*l.*, and gradually reducing the amount until the 45 years, when the sum payable would only be 300,000*l.*, whilst for these payments to the public, the contractors would receive from the public without variation the sum of 2,800,000*l.* annually during that period. Now he asked, would the country be in a worse situation at the end of the 45 years, by appropriating the sinking fund to the amount required; or, in other words, by borrowing from it to the same amount, than if it entered into a new agreement with certain contractors in the terms of the proposed resolution? It would be better, if, contrary to experience of the loss arising from these complicated money transactions, a loan was to be made, to make it with the commissioners of the sinking fund, than to go into the money market with this new stock. It was a well known fact, that better conditions were obtained for the public by funding in the old accustomed descriptions of stocks, than in one of a new denomination. This was felt on the creation of the 3½ per cents, which had never been a favourite with the public. How, then, could the right hon. gentleman reconcile it to the public interest to create this new loan? He must lay his account in the impossibility of finding contractors, without offering larger profit than would have been required by a plan more generally appreciated. If there was to be any profit arising from the scheme, that profit ought to go into the pockets of the public. If the sinking fund was still to be maintained, why not allow the commissioners to become contractors for it at once; by which all the profits, if there were any, would accrue to the nation, and the money in the hands of the commissioners would be employed at the same rate of interest as the public paid for it? When it was suggested by his hon. friend (Mr. Grenfell) to borrow from the sinking fund to its full amount for the services of the year, the plan had been at first objected to, and for some time only partially adopted. Had his hon. friend's suggestion been acted on at first, and the commissioners of the sinking fund become contractors for the whole instead of a part of the then loans, a great saving would have been affected. It appeared from tables which he (Mr. H.) had drawn up, that in the course of the four last years there had been a surplus of revenue over expenditure of little more than 5 millions: and during that period we had borrowed, or added to our funded debt, 78,000,000*l.*; and he could show that about 4,000,000*l.* would have been saved by employing the sinking fund, instead of borrowing. He requested the House to bear in recollection what the noble marquis had said some time ago, on the necessity of keeping up a sinking fund of 5,000,000*l.* for the purpose of lessening the debt to our posterity, and on the sacredness of that fund. Yet now he came down and said, "We must relieve ourselves; posterity must bear a part of the burthen; we will, therefore, throw off from ourselves the half of the charge for military and naval pensions, and spread the burthen over 45 years." Now he (Mr. H.) was far from objecting to this: he was glad to see that the noble lord proposed now to do, what he formerly accused the opposition side of the House of attempting to destroy public credit for recommending. He was glad to hear him now speak of immediate relief, and only desired that it should be obtained as economically as possible. This economy would be best consulted by making the commissioners for the redemption of the national debt contractors, in the same way as they had been for former loans. Nothing could be gained, and much would certainly be lost, by a new loan and new contractors. He had moved for papers by which he should be enabled to prove, that the country would have been many millions less in debt, had no sinking fund ever been created, and had the finance minister, instead of adding the amount of the sinking fund to the loan of each particular year, only borrowed so much less. This difference between our actual debt and what would have been our debt without this delusive fund, he was prepared to show amounted to 38,000,000*l.* of 3 per cent capital. Nothing could have been more inconsistent and contradictory than the plans and declarations of ministers for the last two months. There was one plan for paying off the national debt, and another contained in the present resolutions for adding to the national debt. By the former, we were to burthen ourselves to relieve posterity; by the latter, we were to relieve ourselves at the expense of posterity. If the House, however, should unfortunately sanction the proposed measure, he hoped the contract would be made by open competition, that it would not be given to any private body of men, or to any individual, that no favour would be shown to any company, and that the whole transaction would be as public and impartial as the general interest required. The noble lord was mistaken in supposing that the sum supplied by the contractors would be of the same nature as annuities. The income of the annuitants on the dead weight depended on the annual vote of parliament, and his majesty might strike off any of them from the list; whereas no 10*l.* annuitant in the public funds could be so dealt with. The resolutions, in fact, had nothing more to do with the military and naval half-pay, than with any other charge voted annually. The whole appeared to him a mere delusion.

The Marquis of Londonderry could not refrain from expressing his surprise at the host of champions who had suddenly risen on the other side of the House to defend that sinking fund, which on former occasions, they had been ready to immolate on the altar of public expediency. If ever there was a proposition more clear than another, it was, that the present transaction would not operate as the slightest infraction of the sinking fund. All that was proposed was, to suffer the sinking fund of five millions to go on at compound instead of simple interest. In the general expenditure of the country there was a specific charge amounting to five millions. This charge was not strictly speaking a debt, but it was a charge covered with revenue, and arising out of the faith plighted to individuals to continue an advantage, in contemplation of which they entered the service. The present measure did not trench upon the noble principle of relieving posterity to the utmost possible extent: a principle which, God knew, no country had ever pushed farther than our own: it did not touch the question of the sinking fund, but it divided the advantage arising from the clear surplus of revenue over expenditure between the present generation and posterity. The hon. member for Aberdeen had said, that this question had nothing to do with the dead expenses of the country: but he contended, that it had a great deal to do with them; for if this were a charge of an ordinary and recurring character, and not a charge sui generis, he admitted it would be a very dubious policy to meet it by such an expedient as the present. It had been said that lives had nothing to do with this question; but, unless they went into the consideration of lives, it would be impossible to know what sum it would be convenient to have in each year; and having resolved that problem, not with philosophical, but practical accuracy, to make their contract upon a corresponding scale. After all the sacrifices which we had made for the sake of posterity, and at the very moment of tying up five millions at compound interest, it was surely not necessary to throw the whole dead weight upon the present generation. He was surprised to hear the arguments which had been urged on the other side of the House, coming, as they did, from gentlemen who were at other times ready to pull down the whole fabric of public credit. The hon. member offered his assistance, if the measure was conducted upon his views. He (lord L.) would not accept of the alliance, whether holy or unholy. They were going on very well without the connexion; and he flattered himself they would carry the country and the sinking fund triumphantly through the difficulties with which they appeared to be surrounded.

Mr. Grenfell did not disapprove of the plan, nor did he think it interfered with the sinking fund. The whole question was, whether or not we should contract with persons to pay 5,000,000*l.* in the first year of the contract, and about 300,000*l.* in the 45th year of it, on terms which would relieve us from a great portion of the whole charge during the earlier part of the contract, and throw it upon the latter. He agreed to the principle of the measure, and would remain silent until he heard the terms. He hoped the contract would be by open and public competition.

Lord Ebrington considered the present plan to make against the principle of the sinking fund, as it went to relieve ourselves by throwing part of the present burthens on posterity. If acted upon, he thought it would be better to contract with the commissioners of the sinking fund. He wished to see the country relieved immediately from its present weight of taxation by means of that fund. If he could not get all that he wished for, that was no reason why he should not take all he could get. He therefore felt bound to support the present measure. He was convinced that in the next session of parliament more taxes must be taken off, and he thought much had been gained on the present occasion by the admission of the principle, that we were justified in dividing the burthens so severely felt with posterity. In another session he hoped the sinking fund would be dealt with more largely; indeed, he trusted that it would be wholly given up to the public.

Mr. Maberly contended, that this country had in reality had no sinking fund at any time. The course pursued by government was a perfect delusion. They first took five millions for a sinking fund, and now they came down with a proposition which amounted to a new loan. Was it not a plainer and better course, to take the sum directly out of the sinking fund, and by that means avoid the large expense, which they must incur by the present measure? The present plan struck directly at the principle of the sinking fund. The only effectual means of affording relief to the country was by reducing the expenditure.

Mr. W. Williams was favourable to the maintenance of a real sinking fund, operating a reduction of the public debt. We had, in fact, never possessed one. The fund that went by that name had increased instead of diminished the debt, and all our plans of finance had led to a similar result. It was vain to say that the resolutions would lead to a diminution of the public debt. At the end of 45 years the public debt would be less diminished than if they had taken the sum directly out of the sinking fund. Reduction of taxation was the only effectual relief that could be afforded.

Mr. Benett, of Wilts, expressed his satisfaction at the admissions implied in the proposed scheme, that the sinking fund was a delusion. He would support the present measure, as he had always been for applying the sinking fund to the relief of taxation.

Mr. Monck thought the present scheme was directly opposed to the principle of the sinking fund. He, however, would support the measure as a wise measure, because it went to effect a reduction of taxation. He, however, thought it might be more advantageous to purchase the annuities enjoyed by young military officers. This might prove beneficial to those individuals, as well as advantageous to the country.

Mr. Brougham said, that nothing had tended to alter the impression which he had formed on the first assumption of the plan. Ministers had not even attempted to disguise that this plan was in direct contradiction to the sinking fund. Every pound which it affected to save was so much taken from that fund. The noble lord had got hold of the sinking fund in one quarter, and in another the chancellor of the exchequer was to pay it away. Thus, the sum came from the same purse: the public always paid the piper: it was the same operation under different names. The present scheme was a commutation of an annuity on lives, into a fixed annuity for the period of 45 years. Government were to pay 2,800,000*l.* annually for an annuity which now was 5,000,000*l.*, which would, according to the calculation, be two millions about 20 years hence, and which, at the end of 45 years, would be reduced nearly to nothing? Let gentlemen contrast this with the sinking fund, and they would find that we were burthening posterity on the one hand, and relieving them on the other; and all this for no apparent purpose, save that of paying the expenses of management in both cases. This was the way to mystify, and to wrap up the import of a matter in the abstrusions of arithmetic; but it was not the way to relieve the country.

After some further conversation, the resolutions were agreed to.

Thursday, May 2.

Alterations of the Currency.] Mr. Denison presented a petition from a Mr. C. A. Thompson. The petitioner stated, that he had, in 1811, laid out in purchases of land 150,000*l.*; that in consequence of the subsequent distresses, he had been obliged to raise on these estates 60,000*l.* by mortgage; that the mortgagee had since foreclosed, and the estates had been offered for sale at one half of the original purchase money; that he attributed all his distresses to the alteration in the value of the currency, and therefore, prayed the House for a revision of Mr. Peel's act, or the appointment of commissioners for the purposes of establishing that relation which existed between debtor and creditor, which that act so violently disturbed. The hon. member was himself of opinion, that the case of the petitioner was the case of many persons in this country, and that unless relief was afforded, the tenant would be reduced to the condition of a serf, while the landlord would only be a trustee for the benefit of taxation and pauperism.

Mr. Serjeant Onslow observed, that these speculations, by which individuals suffered, were entered into during the suspension of cash payments, but with the knowledge that those restrictions would be at a future period removed.

Mr. Western said, it was true, that at that period the currency was in a very unnatural state; and yet it was in that very year that the House recorded the resolution, that a one pound note, and a shilling were equal in value to a guinea. The case of the petitioner was the case of thousands who were now the victims of that fraudulent vote.

Mr. Brougham said, that the House of Commons, which in May, 1811, recorded that memorable resolution, within two short months passed an act to punish with fine and imprisonment, any person who should offer for that one pound note, less than those 20 shillings, which they had declared to be its value in the public estimation. These were the acts of the House of Commons before the last, not the present House of Commons; for, God forbid, he should put himself in the jeopardy of its vengeance by stating what he thought of it! For who but a House of Commons could have had the effrontery of thus contradicting the intimate knowledge that every man in the country had, as to the current market price of the bit of rag, which was then estimated at fourteen shillings? Clothed in the white sheet of an act of parliament, in order to do penance for their effrontery, they were, two months after, obliged to pass the penal statute of fine and imprisonment! If there was in the history of human proceedings, conduct more peculiarly fitted to stultify its authors—let any man convince him of that, and he should feel himself bound to respect the House of Commons of 1811.

Mr. Monck said, that all these distresses were the frightful results of tampering with the circulation; at one time, by artificial means increasing its quantity; and, then, without notice, contracting its issues.

Ordered to lie on the table.

Postmaster General.] Lord Normanby said, that he rose on the present occasion with less reluctance than formerly, having so fully experienced the indulgence of the House, to the dry detail into which he had felt it his duty to enter. If the question rested now on the same grounds as when he last addressed the House, he should not trespass upon their patience further than by making his motion. But, if he had now a stronger claim than before to the attention of the House, it was the conduct of those who opposed the motion, and not of those who supported the motion, on which he rested it. It was their arguments, not his, on which he rested his claim. It was their arguments, not his, which had rendered the question important. It was their arguments, not his, which had made the matter a subject of conversation from one end of the kingdom to the other. It was their arguments, not his, which, at every public meeting that had since taken place to consider of the public distress, and to censure the conduct of the representatives of the people, had called forth the most severe animadversion. He had to thank them both for what they had said, and what they had omitted to say. He had to thank them for that novel and most extraordinary doctrine, that useless places were indispensable to keep up the just influence of the Crown. That declaration had had a more startling effect upon the country, than had been produced even by those numerous motions of an hon. friend of his, which, unlike the spectral phantoms of Banquo and his offspring, did not "shew the eye," however they might "grieve the heart," of an alarmed secretary of the Treasury, who, doubtless, imagined that "the line would stretch to the crack of doom." He had thought it necessary to premise thus much to account for his again bringing the subject under the consideration of the House so soon. With regard to the arguments which had been used on the former occasion, the manner in which they had been urged shewed that they were not considered to possess much weight by those who used them. Looking at the act of Anne as that by which the office of postmaster-general was established, he denied that its antiquity was such as justly to screen it from abrogation. Many offices, much more venerable by age, had not been spared on that account. The increase of business in the post-office was another argument which had been urged in favour of the double office. Now, that might be a good argument for the increase of Mr. Freeling's salary, or of the number of clerks employed; but how it could bear upon two noble lords, who never partook of those additional duties, he was at a loss to conceive. It could not be denied, that if by any occurrence those two noble lords should be provoked into a superintendance of the business of the post-office, nothing could be more baneful to the public service, than the alternate vicissitude of interference which would necessarily take place, in an office requiring singleness of purpose—and uniformity of practice. He confessed he felt some surprise at the tone assumed, on the late discussion upon this subject, by the noble marquis opposite, who talked of the rash innovation, and the signal revolution which would be effected by his motion. He was the more surprised at these remarks, because it turned out that the noble marquis himself was the rash innovator, and the signal revolutionist; he having sent lord Clancarty abroad for above two years, during the period at which that noble lord held the office of joint postmaster general. He would not however, retort the charge upon the noble marquis. On the contrary, he entirely acquitted him; believing as he did that the noble marquis did not exactly know what he was doing; as it appeared that, until the night on which he (lord N.) made his motion, the noble marquis was not aware that lord Clancarty held the situation of joint postmaster general when he went as ambassador to the Netherlands.—He should now say a few words with respect to the bills introduced in 1812 and 1813, for the abolition of certain offices. In both of those bills the principle upon which his motion was founded, was recognised. This principle was either right or wrong. If right, then it made in support of the motion he was about to propose. If wrong, it was a little singular that though, during the discussion of the bills of 1812 and 1813, persons had been found to defend the chief justiceship in Eyre, and the office of justice general of Scotland—not a single voice had been raised in defence of the office of Joint Postmaster General of this country, and how the continuance of that office could now be defended upon the grounds of reason and argument, he confessed himself at a loss to divine. In bringing forward his motion on a former night, he had omitted to propose the reduction of the second postmaster general for Ireland. His motion was however founded, as was the address which he now meant to move, upon the bills of 1812 and 1813, and if he should be so fortunate as to carry the present address, no doubt the reduction of the second Irish postmaster would follow as a matter of course. Before he ventured to attack the strong hold of his opponents, namely, the inroad which such a motion as the present was likely to make upon the just and necessary influence of the Crown, he should say a few words to those members who were wavering in their bigotted adhesion to that doctrine. Whatever might have been formerly felt upon this subject, those fears were now removed, and he defied the ingenuity even of the hon. member, who, in endeavouring to conjure up a mighty bugbear, was so good as to make him an unworthy member of the trio who formed it, to produce a recurrence of those years. What, he asked did ministers mean to state to the country? Did they mean to say, that they would here take their political stand, and oppose all further reduction? Were they actuated on this occasion by the same feeling which induced them to oppose the reduction of a junior lord of the admiralty! But, that reduction having been carried, they could go no farther! Had ministers drawn that nice and delicate line of demarkation which shewed that, beyond 2000*l.* a-year, they could not—ought not—to go in the way of reduction? He would put it to the House whether it would not have been more for the honour of government that that motion should have passed in the first instance, rather than be again brought forward after a lapse of five years? Public opinion had been so decidedly expressed upon his former motion, that, even should he fail in this instance, which he did not anticipate, he had no doubt of the ultimate success of the measure. It was acknowledged on all hands, that the country was in a situation which required relief. If any doubt existed on this point, he should at once refer to the statement made by the noble marquis on a former evening. And if that statement had any analogy, it was to the shifts and expedients of a ruined spendthrift, who in his proceedings displayed an intimate acquaintance with the practice of persons of another creed, and proved that he was well versed in all the mysteries and intricacies of X, Y, Z. In all cases of comparative distress, it was difficult to chuse between two luxuries. But, he put it to any gentleman who had had the misfortune to be reduced from his former station, whether, in the event of his having a duplicate of luxuries, he ever found a difficulty in giving up one of them? And he should in the same way put it to the House, whether any injury was likely to arise to the country from ministers foregoing the luxury of a double postmaster general? A right hon. friend of his (Mr. Robinson) must be aware that the influence of the Crown had considerably increased, from the increased amount of our debt, as well as the extension of our colonies. He should be sorry to appeal personally to his right hon. friend, for whose opinions he had the highest respect, as he knew that he was put forward to speak the opinions of government, but that those opinions were no more his own than they were those of any other person whatever. He had on a former occasion put it to gentlemen opposite, to say whether they had found in the people a disposition to canvass the measures of government. What, then, was the remedy to be applied? The people watched the conduct of parliament, because they had become more acute and discerning. They were distressed, and therefore they became more jealous both of parliament and of the government generally. He would ask, then, whether it was wise, in such a state of things, to retain a few places which had become odious to the people, and which the increased influence of the Crown from other circumstances rendered unnecessary? He would put it to the House to consider what instrument was used by ministers in thus retaining those places? It was the House of Commons. Why then should it be wondered that the House was distrusted by the people? Why should they wonder at hearing the cry of reform raised from one end of the country to the other? No matter whether the raising of that cry was right or wrong, none could say that it was not now general—no one could say that it was confined to a few manufacturing districts—no one could deny that it now extended even to the solitary ploughman. [Hear, hear!] How, then, were they to remedy this evil? Was it by denying all that the people asked? Would it not be better, by acting with moderation, to teach the people obedience? Had they not better show to the country, that while they were determined to oppose every thing that was wrong, they were equally ready to concede what they knew to be right? Would it not be wiser to act thus than to display a total apathy to the wants and wishes of the people? Or were ministers determined to shut their eyes and ears to every thing save a false and jealous alarm, lest the influence of the Crown should be diminished? It was in the power of ministers, by wise and skilful management, to direct and regulate the progress of freedom in this country; but if they attempted to oppose its progress, they would only widen its channels and aggravate its force. [Hear, hear.] He thought it would be most wise to concede on the present occasion, not so much because the motion was in itself of the utmost importance, as because its rejection would destroy the lingering hopes of the people, and strengthen their worst suspicions against that House. The noble lord concluded by moving, "That an humble address be presented to his majesty, representing that his majesty's faithful Commons, relying upon his majesty's gracious disposition, expressed in answer to former addresses of this House, to concur in all such measures of economy as the exigences of the times require, and in such reductions in the civil department of the state as may be consistent with a due consideration for the public service, humbly pray, that his majesty will be graciously pleased to give directions that the Office of one of the post-masters-general may be abolished, and the salary thereby saved to the public."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that the noble lord had taken a very unusual course in bring the same subject before the House twice in the course of the same session. Although the motion had been so framed that it did not immediately go against the standing order of the House, yet in substance and in object it was unquestionably the same. This was inconvenient, not as regarded the present question, but as it affected the general business of the House; for if the practice were to become common, the same subjects might be brought forward day after day, and the time thus consumed might obstruct the progress of measures which were of importance to the interest and safety of the country. The former motion had not been rejected solely on the ground that it was desirable the Crown should have at its command such appointments as that at which it was aimed to reward merit. The office had been defended as one that it was desirable to keep up for the protection of the revenue, and the superintendance of the concerns of the post-office. Would it be nothing, that a revenue of 2,000,000*l.* should be placed under the control of a single individual? Could any individual fitted to fill the situation of post-master, desire to have such a responsibility thrown on him? The question, whether the management and control of the post-office, would be better vested in a board, than in post-masters-general, had come before the committee of 1797; and it was then decided that the former was not to be preferred. At any rate, the establishment of a board in the place of the post-masters-general, was not to be preferred on the score of economy.—The true question now was, whether it would be advisable to place the post-office under a board of four or five persons of inferior rank, or whether it should continue as at present constituted, under the superintendance of two noblemen of high rank and great responsibility? To his mind, the arguments in favour of the present system predominated over the considerations which would go to sanction a change. There was, however, some difficulty in deciding on the details connected with this question, and he had therefore, proposed to refer them to the consideration of a parliamentary commission. The Treasury would not trust itself to go into the minute details, and he had therefore determined to call for a parliamentary commission. When the report of that commission should be received, the House would be more competent to decide on the merits of the case than it was at present. It was admitted on all hands that the business could not be better conducted than it was under the management of the post-masters. Under such circumstances, pending the inquiry which he had mentioned, he would put it to the House if it would do well to agree to the present motion.

Mr. Bankes thought his right hon. friend must be convinced that the public derived no benefit whatever from the appointment of two individuals to the office of joint-post-master-general. If, indeed, a board was necessary in that department, then there should be an umpire, or third person, to give the casting vote. But here there were only two noblemen, men equal in authority, and, it was to be presumed, in tenacity of opinion; and therefore, instead of being a convenience to the public, they were likely to clog the wheels of every mail-coach which ran through the kingdom, and bring the whole business of the office to a stand still. In a discussion on the navy estimates, a case had been mentioned, where there were two storekeepers employed in one office. They were equal in authority, and had a common key to the desk. One of them fell sick, and the other, who had the use of the key, in his absence robbed the till. He was far from applying this case to the noble postmasters-general, but he did it to show how absurd it was to expect any additional security from having two persons in office. If the amount of the revenue was to be looked to as a reason, then the office of paymaster-general, which was regulated by the bills of 1812 and 1813, was of tenfold importance. This office had been previously held by two persons; but what did parliament do?

They abolished one of the appointments, wisely judging, that as there must be one individual upon whom the responsibility of office must fall, one was sufficient to hold that office. The responsibility of the second officer could not be considered as any thing more than nominal. If the office were an office of trust, which it was, there could be no doubt that that trust might be safely reposed in any one of the noble lords. He was glad that an opportunity was now afforded to the House to reconsider its former vote; and he hoped that they would consult their better judgment. The hon. gentleman next alluded to certain measures which he had proposed in 1812 and 1813, for the abolition of particular offices, of which the office under the consideration of the House was one. The right hon. the late president of the board of control, the present president, and his right hon. friend (Mr. Huskisson), all supported the principle of those measures; namely, that all offices that could be abolished without injury to the public service ought to be abolished. Had the finances and the general resources of the country so far increased as to justify a departure from that principle? The House was bound, in consistency with their address, of last session, to agree to the present motion. When sinecures were to be abolished, could any one say that the office of a second postmaster-general ought to be preserved? It was a simple pure sinecure. He had heard with regret an hon. gentleman say, on a former occasion, that he would support the office, because the reduction of it would diminish the influence of the Crown. He trusted that the House would not act on such a principle. It was the duty of parliament to show a conciliating spirit towards the people. In this instance, concession might be made without the slighest detriment to the public service.

Mr. Huskisson said, his hon. friend had referred to the proceedings on the bill to abolish useless sinecures, but he had left an important blank in the history which it was important to supply. Having for several sessions brought forward the subject and failed, his hon. friend had, in 1817, been fortunate enough to find it favourably entertained by a committee. That committee investigated the matter with great diligence. It was suggested, that the office of joint-postmaster-general came within the denomination of useless sinecures; but the committee, after due consideration, declared that it was a place that ought not to be abolished. Under these circumstances, though he had supported the bill and its object, he (Mr. H.) felt himself at perfect liberty to be guided by the decision of the committee. The committee thought it fit that there should be more than one responsible officer at the head of the Post-office; and it was felt also that this place might be made the means of rewarding an individual, who, without salary, discharged the duties of some other situation. It would, he conceived, be much better to have the necessity of continuing the joint-postmaster investigated by a parliamentary commission. He would, therefore, recommend to his right hon. friend (the chancellor of the exchequer) to move for the re-appointment of the committee which was now about to expire, and to make the constitution of the Post-office the immediate object of its investigation.

Sir J. Sebright said, that since he had sat in parliament, he never had heard language which tended so much to degrade the House as had been used on this occasion. He never could consent, that the Crown should enjoy a corrupt influence. The arguments on the other side must have the effect of degrading the higher orders of society; for they induced a belief, that situations were given to men of exalted rank in the state, for the purpose of securing their support to the existing system. Was it not disgusting to be told that great and illustrious names could not be induced to do their duty to their king and country, unless they received 2 or 3,000*l.* a year? As well might they put into the estimates the amount of pension which it required to procure the support of those individuals. In this point of view, the motion was of importance, and he would support it.

Mr. Sumner said, that though there seemed good ground for supporting the two offices for the sake of the revenue, he fairly owned his reason for formerly having opposed a motion like the present, was a different one. He had observed previously to, and during the session, that county meetings had been held professedly to take into consideration the distress of the country, though at very few of them the professed object of the meeting had been gone into; that designing men were travelling over the country to excite disaffection; and that the sentiments of those persons had been put into instructions to representatives. Something like the system pursued at these meetings seemed to be followed in the House. Motions were made for repealing this and that tax, apparently to reduce the revenue to inefficiency, and the same sort of attack was made on the institutions of the country. One day there was a motion to reduce two lords of the Admiralty; another day to reduce a postmaster-general. Where it would stop he could form no judgment. Though, therefore, a reduction proposed might be proper, it would not be made in a proper manner under the influence of such a spirit, and on that ground, and not on the consideration of the individual case, he gave his vote. He should do it with the more satisfaction, after the pledge of the chancellor of the exchequer, that the post-office should come under the revision of a commission.

Mr. Bright contended, that the House was perfectly competent to decide on the subject, and ought not, therefore, to delegate their power to any commission. They were bound to show the people, by a strict performance of their duty, that they really were the guardian of those interests which were committed to their care.

Mr. Tremayne said, a pledge had been given, on the passing of the pension bill, to reduce all sinecures—a pledge which he should never consider redeemed, while the two postmasters-general remained.

Mr. Stuart Wortley said, he had, on a former occasion, given his vote on this subject with considerable hesitation. If it had been a simple question, whether the situation of second postmaster-general should be abolished, he would have given up the point. But, when he saw that the House had the day before addressed the Crown to remove two public officers; when he observed that a motion, attacking an entire board, stood for a succeeding day, and when he coupled these circumstances with the tone and temper of the country, which laboured under the delusion that these alterations would afford relief, he considered it his duty to negative that motion. The Crown, to perform its duties properly, must have influence; and the only question was, what portion of influence was necessary for the efficient execution of those duties? He asked for no more than what he conceived to be the due proportion of influence which the Crown ought to possess in the state; but he never would consent to strip it of its just attributes. Admitting this, and perceiving that circumstances, as far as regarded the mind of the country, were considerably changed; he thought, taking the present as a single question, that the House ought to give way to that extent. The people were very much disabused as to the idea that relief should be sought by the removal of a vast portion of taxation. They felt that the business of the country could not go on, unless a competent revenue were preserved. This was a great change; and as the House was not called on, in a headlong manner, to consider the present motion, he was ready to vote for it. If, however, it were understood, that a parliamentary commission would inquire faithfully into the nature of this office—that their report would be laid before the House—and that they would afterwards have an opportunity of deciding on it—he would be content to wait for that report. But if the question was now, ay or no, whether there should be one postmaster-general instead of two, he would give his vote in the affirmative.

The Marquis of Londonderry said, he had heard nothing that evening which had in any degree altered the view he had previously taken of the subject. Whether he looked at it in an administrative, a financial, or a constitutional view, his original opinion remained unchanged. The question was, in what course ought this subject to be put, to ensure a just and sound consideration of it? If this point were fairly argued, the hon. member for Corfe-castle would find, that those who opposed him stood on the 'vantage ground. Ought the office to be continued or not? The authority of his hon. friend (and surely he could not object to his own opinion) was in favour of continuing the office. It was true, in the parliament of 1813, he expressed a different opinion; but that opinion was reversed by a subsequent parliament: he participated in the sentiment, and therefore it was fair to infer that his calmer and more matured judgment was in favour of the office. Except that one objection of his hon. friend, which was afterwards removed, the whole stream of parliamentary proceeding was in favour of those who urged the necessity of keeping up the office. His hon. friend stated, that this, amongst other offices, was last year included in the address to the Crown. The question then was, had that address had no effect? It had produced a Treasury minute, directing the necessary inquiry to be made. The hon. member for Yorkshire was of opinion, that this point should be conceded, because the ferment of the public mind had subsided. But, he could not conceive where that hon. member saw the signs of this abated fervour, when a second motion was made on this subject in the same session. He would ask his hon. friend whether the House was likely to look into the office of joint-postmaster-general with the same dispassionate coolness which would distinguish a parliamentary commission, acting on oath? The hon. member for Yorkshire was willing to let the question rest for the present, provided it was understood that the report of the commissioners would be submitted to parliament. How could that step be prevented? It must come before parliament; and he felt that the report of five commissioners, acting on oath, would be a greater mill-stone about his neck than the bill of his hon. friend in 1813. He could not at all partake of the conviction which had so suddenly burst on the hon. member for Yorkshire, that the public mind had subsided into a state of quietude. He had no reason for believing that the gentlemen opposite would not go on attacking office after office. He could, however, assure the House, that if the motion were negatived, the subject of the post-office should be referred to the commissioners with as little delay as possible. After this plain declaration, he trusted the motion would be met by a negative. He must reprobate the idea, that men of exalted rank could be base enough to accept of such an office merely as a job.

Mr. Wilberforce agreed with an hon. baronet, that this motion became of far greater importance in consequence of the arguments by which it was resisted. It was alleged, that the office was necessary for the influence of the Crown. What! Preserve offices for the exclusive purpose of influence? What was this but what was called in plainer terms, corruption? Avowedly, the ground of continuing the office was to induce members of parliament to support government, right or wrong. He admitted the distinction between accepting office because a person agreed with ministers in their views, and supporting those views, because they obtained office; but the public were not always ready to make that distinction. This appeared to him to be a proper time for considering the subject, with reference to the consequences that might follow from the principles on which it was supported; and, to support the office on the ground that it was necessary to the influence of the Crown, seemed calculated to produce a bad impression on the public. These were times in which attacks on the constitution were made through the House of Commons. What could tend more to countenance such attacks than to decide upon keeping up the situation from the motive adduced in support of it? He should support the motion, because he felt it to be peculiarly incumbent upon the House, in the present times, to be careful of its character, and to endeavour, by all just and honourable means, to secure the respect and affection of the people.

Sir F. Blake would cordially support this motion, and after it should be carried, he would maintain, that a great deal more remained to be done. If the House understood the state of the country, they would pass such motions by acclamations. His real opinion was, that the hon. member for Montrose did as much good as all his majesty's ministers put together. The hon. member had made those see who could not see before; or, if they could see, would not see. Like the weight of a clock, the hon. member had made ministers go better and better by winding them up. He had not heard one single reason for continuing two postmasters. It was said, that the two postmasters must be continued in order to preserve the influence of the Crown. Against whom? Against themselves; and not only against the present, but against every future House of Commons. Was it not preposterous to call upon them to commit suicide on themselves?

Mr. R. Martin condemned the conduct of the opposition, which, he contended, was rather dictated by a desire to annoy the government, than by any consideration of the abstract merits of the question. Even if it could be demonstrated on abstract principles, that one postmaster-general was enough, he would oppose the motion, if it had a tendency to shake the present administration.

Mr. James Macdonald congratulated his noble friend on having returned to the charge with a spirit, perseverance and talent which augured well for the public cause. Now that ministers had had leisure for reflection, and an opportunity of collecting the opinion of their country friends, he had felt some curiosity to see what new shifting course they would adopt; and that curiosity had been amply gratified by the turn which the debate had taken to night. With the exception of the member for Surrey, there was not a single unofficial person who had ventured to justify the vote which he intended to give against the motion. The tone of the noble marquis was indeed considerably subdued, quantum mutatus ab illo Hectore!" How were the mighty fallen since the last debate on this question! Humble and beaten, and retiring from his former ground, this champion of the influence of the Crown, who had once declared, that without this office it would be impossible to carry on the government of the country, was now ready to refer to certain commissioners a question which had been already twice decided in that House. It had been said, that the office was a part of the necessary patronage of the Crown, and therefore, ought not to be touched; but it was for the House to determine, whether that argument ought to have weight with them. He would ask the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Robinson), who had made so strong an appeal on a former occasion, in favour of the inferior clerks of his own department, whether he could stand up in his place and say, that a second postmaster-general was necessary? Whether he could say to those clerks, that they must be sent adrift, but that a duplicate postmaster-general must be retained? He wished also to know from the noble marquis what he meant by a very favourite phrase, which he had used upon that and many other occasions, "a well understood economy." It reminded him of what Hudibras said of pain—

"'Tis neither bad, simpliciter, nor good,
But merely as 'tis understood."

The hon. member then entered into a statement, to show the various sources of influence possessed by the Crown, and concluded with cautioning the House against giving their sanction to the continuance of unnecessary places, with a view to extend that influence.

Mr. Money defended the office of joint-postmaster-general. When he found that, within the last year, 2,000 reports had been referred to them, on each of which they gave their opinion, he could not think the office without considerable duties and great responsibility. When he likewise considered the immense patronage connected with the office, he did not think that it should rest in the hands of one person.

Lord A. Hamilton wished to ask the hon. gentleman, what length of time one of the postmasters, lord Clancarty, had been absent from the country? He believed he was away about two years; and this was a complete answer to the hon. gentleman's speech.

Mr. Mansfield said, he would rather give 10,000*l.* a-year to two such persons as now filled the office, than 2,500*l* to one.

After a short reply, the House divided: Ayes, 216. Noes 201. Majority for the motion, 15.

Friday, May 3.

SCOTS REPRESENTATIVE PEERS.] The Earl of Rosebery reminded their lordships, that he had last session introduced a bill for regulating the election of the representative peers of Scotland, which had gone through two of its stages. It was proposed to be enacted by that bill, that no person claiming to be a peer of Scotland, except the son or lineal descendant of a deceased peer, should vote at the election of the sixteen representative peers. This proposition was received with approbation by their lordships in general. Only one noble lord urged any objection to the measure, and that noble lord suggested that it would be better to attain the object in view by a resolution of their lordships' house, than by a legislative enactment. It was also thought advisable that a communication should be made to every individual peer of Scotland, in order to obtain his opinion. In consequence of these suggestions, the bill had been withdrawn, and a communication of the kind referred to had been made. The result of the correspondence had confirmed him that it was necessary for parliament to interpose its authority on this subject. Nearly all the peers of Scotland had expressed their complete approbation of the proposed measure, and none had objected to it. One had thought it not necessary. Another had qualified his assent by observing, that he apprehended such an arrangement might not be the wish of all the peers. Another, again, was of opinion, that a resolution of the House would be preferable to an act of parliament. The evil of which the Scotch peers had to complain was, that from the Union down to the present time, it had been in the power of any person claiming to be a peer, though he possessed no right to such dignity, to vote at the election for the sixteen peers to sit in parliament; there being no provision in the act of Union requiring that the right of the claimant to a title should be proved before he was allowed to vote. That any body of men should be subject to such an intrusion, must appear very extraordinary; but to the peers of Scotland it was a particular hardship; for, excluded as they were from becoming members of the House of Commons, they were besides, by the irregularity of their election, liable to be kept out of their seats in that House. He could refer to cases which would show that the system was as bad in fact as in theory. One case of injustice, he believed, would be all that he need state. At the election of 1790, only 13 peers out of the 16 were returned. Six others had an equality of votes, and it remained to be ascertained which three of those six were entitled to sit. After three years of laborious investigation, it was determined by their lordships' House to which the majority of the legal votes belonged. It might be said, there was another question mixed up with this; namely, whether British peers, who were also peers of Scotland, were entitled to vote: but this was a question of so narrow a compass, that it was capable of being settled, as indeed it was settled, by one deliberation of the House. Its discussion, in fact, occupied only one day of the three years during which three peers had been excluded from their seats. The next question to which he had to call their attention was the best means of removing the evil. After consulting with persons best qualified to give an opinion on this subject, he thought it advisable to propose two resolutions to be referred to a committee of privilege. The purport of the first resolution was, that, upon the decease of any peer, no person except the son, grandson, or other lineal descendant, or the brother of such peer, should be permitted to vote at the election of the sixteen representative peers of Scotland, until his claim to the peerage be made good before a committee of privilege. The object of the second was merely to provide, that the first resolution should be no obstacle to claimants challenging the right of persons who now held peerages. If the committee should agree to these resolutions, he wished still to reserve the question, whether or not they ought to be made the subject of a legislative act.

The resolutions were referred to the committee of privilege.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, May 3.

POSTMASTER GENERAL.] The Marquiss of Londonderry reported his Majesty's answer to the Address of yesterday, as follows:

"The king having been attended with the address of the House of Commons of yesterday, acquaints the House that he will give directions that the salary of one of the postmasters-general shall forthwith be discontinued:—His majesty only postpones the abolition of the office of one of the postmasters-general, until he shall have had the opportunity of considering what permanent arrangement may be advisable for the conduct of the business of that department."

NAVAL AND MILITARY PENSIONS.] On the order of the day for receiving the report of the committee on the payment of the Naval and Military Pensions,

Mr. Bernal said, he considered the proposition simply as a loan; but was at a loss to understand how the same security could be obtained from the contractors for the performance of the conditions of such a loan as for those of a fixed loan. If no such security could be afforded, in what a situation of loss might the country be placed. Some contingency might render the contract so oppressively burthensome, that the contractors would abandon it. There were contingencies also that might give the contractors an undue advantage.—If a war should occur in the course of four or five years, many of the officers at present on half-pay would immediately be put on full-pay; and that full-pay would be charged on another fund. In that event the terms of the contract would be unduly improved to the benefit of the contractor.

The report was brought up, and the four first resolutions agreed to. On the fifth resolution being put,

Mr. Hume said, that to this resolution he should move an amendment. The object of it was to burthen posterity and to relieve ourselves—a direct violation of the principle of the sinking fund. But, besides other objections, the operation was so complex that it was almost unintelligible, and the perplexity spread over a period of 45 years. The project was so novel, and the amount so large, that it would be found very difficult to find contractors. For sixteen years they would not receive a single shilling, and would be paying many millions in advance. It was clear, also, that the public must be losers by the transaction, if private parties entered into the speculation with government; but if the loan (for it was nothing else) were taken by the commissioners of the sinking fund, the public would gain, and the scheme would be rendered comparatively simple and intelligible. He would therefore move as an amendment, "that the commissioners of the treasury should treat and contract with the commissioners for the redemption of the national debt for the sum required."

Mr. Cripps thought the noble marquis had conferred a benefit on the country by adhering to the sinking fund. He admitted, nevertheless, than the plan now proposed militated in a slight degree against it. But it was necessary that some relief in the shape of taxation should be given, and he knew of no better mode of giving it than the present. The whole of the leather-tax, a moiety of the salt-tax, and a large portion of the House and window-tax, would thus be removed. He did not see any of the complication of which the hon. member had spoken, and had no doubt that if the terms were proposed, contractors would be found for the whole before to-morrow night.

Mr. Whitmore thought it would be more economical to borrow the money of the sinking fund than of contractors. He had voted for preserving the sinking fund at the beginning of the session, because a great financial project was then before the country—the payment of the 5 per cents; but now that that object had been effected, it became the duty of the House to consider the best means of affording relief to the country. If the contract were made according to the amendment, all complexity would be avoided.

Mr. J. Martin felt it his duty to oppose the proposition of the chancellor of the exchequer. The bargain would be made upon most disadvantageous terms. The right hon. gentleman was daily in the habit of selling annuities on the lowest terms: while, his present plan went to purchase them at the highest.

Mr. Ricardo said, that the proposition of the hon. member for Montrose was the same as that of ministers, only he wished the contract to be made on the most advantageous terms. Whatever bonus the private contractor obtained, would be a clear loss to the country. There could be no doubt that, if the sum required were now taken from the sinking fund, at the end of 45 years the country would be in a better situation than if the money were borrowed of individuals. He was an enemy to all complicated schemes, and was for avoiding a crooked path when there was a straight one before him leading to the same end. The obvious course was to take the sum from the sinking fund.

Mr. T. Wilson contended, that at the present moment, while the 3 per cents were at 78 or 79, ministers could make a more advantageous bargain than at a subsequent period when they might be lower. Besides, they would thus avoid the contingencies of war. It was just as proper now to support the sinking fund, as in the beginning of the session; because the period might not be far distant, and he hoped it was not, when ministers would be prepared to pay off the 4 per cents. The present amendment was an attack upon the sinking fund by a side wind. Though relief from taxation was very desirable, it was even more desirable to keep faith with the public creditor. If that faith were not kept, the agricultural interest might suffer even more severely than they did at the present moment.

Mr. Brougham said, it now appeared that all sides were for a reduction of taxes, though, at the beginning of the session, reduction was declared to be impossible, on account of the preservation of the sinking fund. It was hardly necessary to congratulate the House, that the chancellor of the exchequer had thus yielded to the necessities of the country, and was willing to relinquish taxation to the extent of 1,800,000*l.* This was a pretty good nest-egg to begin with; and it should not be his (Mr. B's.) fault, if the right hon. gentleman was not urged to give up several millions more. The question before the House was precisely this: whether, according to the plan of ministers, or of the hon. member for Montrose, the proposed reduction of taxes could be most economically made? The hon. member who spoke last rested the defence of ministers entirely upon the present high price of stocks and the contingency of war during the next forty-five years. If this argument was correct, why not carry it further? Why not borrow 20,000,000*l.* at once, and apply the principle of the sinking fund to the extinction of that loan in the usual manner? But there was another consideration beyond all these. Had we not an unfunded debt of more than 30,000,000*l.* Why not fund this? Stocks were high at present, and therefore the opportunity was most favourable. If these 30,000,000*l.* were funded when stocks were 78, government would have all the benefit of the operation.—It was perfectly obvious, that the mode in which the present commutation could be most economically effected, must be for the government to secure to themselves the whole of that benefit which the contractors would reap, provided the bargain should be struck. Whatever name the right hon. gentleman might give to his plan, it eventually must be neither more nor less than an interference with the sinking fund. Who were to gain relief by the proposed plan? They who should live and pay taxes for the next 16 years. Who would suffer by the relief which was to be effected? They who should live and pay taxes after the expiration of the first 16 years of the 45. Until after the first 16 years should expire, the country would have gone on borrowing, but without making any payment. Now, the only difference between such a project and ordinary loans was this; that in the case of ordinary loans the country paid the interest regularly every year, but, in this instance, it would not begin to pay at all until the seventeenth year. But then, for the remaining 29 years of the term, it would have to pay principal, interest, and profit too. It followed from these premises, that the persons to be relieved by the scheme were those who should pay taxes during the first 16 years; and that the persons who would be pressed, in order to enable government to extend that relief, would be those who were to pay taxes during the remaining 29 years. Now, the sinking fund pressed hardest upon the former of these classes. It was supported by means of the sums paid for that purpose by those who lived and paid taxes during the earliest series of 16 years. But who were the persons that would derive the profit of it? They, clearly, who should pay taxes after that series of 16 years had passed. The noble marquis had intimated that the sinking fund was intended to be 5,000,000*l.* yearly, and to accumulate at compound interest, for ten years; at the end of which time the noble lord calculated, that its operation would have reduced about 70,000,000*l.* of the capital debt, and that the accumulation would have reached between 7,000,000*l.* and 8,000,000*l.* only. But, during this period of ten years it was proposed that no taxes should be remitted. That is, the sum of 250,000*l.* (being the interest of 5,000,000*l.* at 5 per cent) was not to be applied towards the repealing of taxes, to that amount, but it was to accumulate. The public was only to be relieved from a portion of the taxes, at present paid for defraying the interest of the debt, when, at the expiration of the 10 years, the interest on the accumulated sinking fund should arrive at 400,000*l.*; and then it was to be applied towards the reduction of the interest. Now, of this plan he would say, that while the country continued in its present lamentable state, it ought never to be put in execution—that, the country being under circumstances such as those in which she now found herself, no sinking fund at all should be kept up, until she could better afford it. He should recommend that, instead of leaving these 5,000,000*l.* to accumulate at compound interest, the whole sum should be taken and applied in the relief of taxation. Let the public creditor be satisfied with all that he could fairly demand; namely, the payment of his interest.—The next question was, which of two sinking funds offered to their attention they would have? He had already stated what he conceived to be the objections against a fund of 5,000,000*l.* accumulating for 10 years at compound interest. He would rather say, let them take their 5,000,000*l.*, and the year's interest would be 250,000*l.* The next year there would be other 250,000*l.* and so on, till the term of 10 years was completed. This proposition assumed that the sinking fund was, in the meanwhile, strictly kept up at 5,000,000*l.*, but not accumulating at compound interest. Now, the total simple interest on that sum, at 5 per cent, would form a very eligible fund, applicable to the relief of taxes. In ten years it would amount to 2,500,000*l.* During the next period of ten years, this same sum would be generated; so that at the end of the next 20 years, the government might have reduced taxes to the amount of 5,000,000*l.* This was his proposal for a sinking fund. Now, what was the nature of the noble lord's plan? The noble lord would begin with 400,000*l.* at a period of 11 years hence, rather than with 250,000*l.* this very year. What would be the relative effects of these two schemes? At the end of 20 years, the noble lord would have remitted 4,000,000*l.* of taxes. He (Mr. B.) in the same period, would have remitted 5,000,000*l.* The noble lord would have sacrificed relief to the present generation wholly, as far as regarded those who were to pay taxes for the first 10 years; and partially, as respected those who would have to pay them during the second term of 10 years. It resulted, therefore, that down to the termination of that second period, that was, in 20 years, his (Mr. B's.) plan would have remitted taxes to a greater amount by 1,000,000*l.* than the project of the noble lord would have done. But, in about six years after that point, it seemed that the noble lord's project might overtake his; and after that time (26 years hence), it might work undoubtedly a much more considerable operation than his (Mr. B's) scheme would effect. But that scheme would afford partial relief to the present generation, and chiefly during the ensuing ten years; besides the relief which it would diffuse in some degree over the whole 26 years. But—how would this plan of the noble lord's consist with the other plan which he had brought forward—the commutation of the half-pay charge? The plan respecting the half-pay was exactly the reverse of this; for it was applying all the relief to the present generation. Government were to pay 2,800,000*l.* a-year for the whole of the 45 years. Taking the present mode of paying pensions, they would be gainers for 16 years to come: after that period the thing would become equal. To those who lived subsequently to those 16 years, the bargain would be a great burthen. It was impossible that any person who looked at the noble lord's plan for a fund, in conjunction with this plan of commutation, could entertain a doubt as to the ultimate effect of both. It was this—that every 1,000,000*l.* taken as from the one, was added to the other.—The next question was—what terms was the right hon. gentleman likely to get in the market? In the first place, the novelty of the plan must inevitably raise the market against himself. It was clear that men, in order to be induced to take that sort of bargain which was new and strange to them, must always be bribed by a certain bonus. That bonus must, of necessity, be paid by the public. In the second place, the market into which the right hon. gentleman would have to go, must, of course, be a very contracted one. A common loan was easily disposed of. A man felt no hesitation about buying 1,000*l.* of stock, upon which he knew that in the next half-year he should receive his dividend. But the case must be quite different where the party knew, that only at the end of 16 years his bargain would begin to pay him; and that not until the expiration of 45 years would he have realized his full profit upon it. The number of those who would offer to take this bargain would be very limited; the competition, of consequence, would be very slight, and the terms very disadvantageous. Great companies, indeed, might be found to bid; but even they must be such as, possessing great capitals, had some sort of surplus which they could afford to sink under a prospect of large profit, for so long a term of years. At all events, the bonus must be paid by the country, and the advantage, most disproportionately, result to the contractor. The simple and obvious way of effecting an arrangement of this kind would be, to take the money from the sinking fund, and thereby save the country the charge of the exorbitant premium which would attend the proposed transaction. He must be allowed once more to suggest how gross an absurdity that was, which they were called upon to sanction; and what ridicule and just censure it would entail upon them out of doors. They were taking 5,000,000*l.*, and putting it into a chest, in order that it might accumulate for the payment of a debt at the end of a certain period. In one and the same moment, they borrowed the same sum as they had in their chest, but at a great disadvantage. They were going into debt as lenders and as borrowers. They were taking especial care that the benefit should be all to the contractors, and, in short, upholding an absurdity of that kind, that the man, who, in private life, should suggest such a principle, would stand a chance of being conveyed to Bedlam, rather than to his own mansion. He would suppose the case of a man, who, with an income of 10,000*l.* a-year, was unfortunately incumbered with a debt of 100,000*l.* To extinguish the principal and interest of his debt, this person had reserved one half of his income every year, being a reservation of 5,000*l.* Besides this debt, there was a jointure, or annuity, charged on his estate, of 2,000*l.* a-year; and, being anxious to enlarge his sinking fund of 5,000*l.*, he put by other 2,000*l.* a-year for the same purpose, reserving for his own expenses only 1,000*l.* He would suppose that the chancellor of the exchequer found the individual in this state, and advised him to carry his jointure into the market and sell it, on the ground that the money to be raised by the sale would enable the gentleman to add 1,000*l.* a-year to his own reserved income. The right hon. gent. would say, "It is very true that a few years hence, by the sale of this jointure or annuity, you may find yourself a loser of some 30,000*l.* or 40,000*l.* a-year;" but then he would console the gentleman with the reflection, that his sinking fund—the fund of which he had made a brag, as it were, to the public—remained untouched. Upon the grounds he had assigned, he must oppose the proposition of the right hon. gentleman, and express his hope that he would be induced to take money from the sinking fund.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, that on the question of the sinking fund, gentlemen had long been much divided, members on the Opposition benches wishing to take it away altogether, and those on his side preferring to keep it inviolate. That principle of sacredness, to which he considered the faith of parliament to be pledged, and upon the strength of which this country had been enabled to execute such vast achievements in the course of the late war, [Cheers] he hoped that House never would depart from. It was upon this principle that government had just been enabled to perform one of the greatest financial operations that had been of late years attempted, and by which they would be enabled to remit very speedily taxes to the amount of nearly 1,500,000*l.* The present plan, would obtain at once a saving of 2,000,000*l.*, and with perfect good faith to all parties. It was said, that this was done to relieve ourselves at the expence of posterity. This was not the case. The question was, whether we should pay an annuity of five millions, gradually diminishing for 45 years, or whether we should divide the burthen equally through all the years of the term? The amount of the charge at the end of the term was equal. The gentlemen opposite had all at once become extremely jealous of an attack upon the sinking fund. But the fact was, that the sinking fund would go on as before, there being nothing added to the debt, but a charge which was to be extinguished by the mere operation of time. Since the conclusion of the peace, taxes had been remitted to the amount of twenty millions; and if the remission of taxes was to be considered as a panacea for the distresses of the country, government were at least entitled to that extent, to the gratitude of the country. With respect to the mode of carrying the plan into effect, he could assure the House that there should be a fair and general competition among those who were disposed to buy.

Mr. J. P. Grant said, that nothing but a remission of taxation could save the country. As to the sinking fund, as it was now placed, its operation was quite delusive.

Mr. Jones approved of the plan, and thought the amendment would, if acted upon, suspend the operation of the sinking fund, and prove disadvantageous to the country. It was said, that to effect this plan, the contractors must get a bonus, the amount of which would be lost to the public. He did not concur in that opinion. The speculators might gain, but it was equally possible they might lose.

Mr. Denis Browne expressed his surprise that gentlemen opposite should feel averse to any proposition which went to the reduction of taxation; that having been the theme of their speeches during the session.

Mr. Bennet said, the ground of complaint was, not that taxes to the amount of 1,800,000*l.* had been reduced, but that a much larger portion of the public burthens had not been remitted. He would say, take away the whole of the sinking fund, and reduce taxation to that amount. The country had a right to expect this. The national creditor had no claim beyond the interest of his debt; and, considering the terms by which his debt was contracted, he ought, in the distressed state of the country, to consider himself fortunate if he got that.

The House divided: For the amendment, 56. Against it, 135.

Monday, May 6.

AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS, AND THE MEASURES FOR ITS RELIEF.] Earl Grey said, that previous to the holydays, he had given notice of his intention to bring the distressed state of the country under their consideration, with the view of relieving that distress by a reduction of taxation. He had also put a question to the noble earl opposite, the object of which was, to ascertain whether any measures were to be proposed by government, in addition to those which had already been brought before parliament. The noble earl had referred him to the committee of the House of Commons which was then sitting, and which had since made its report, observing, that he did not know what might be done by the House of Commons, in consequence of that inquiry, but that government had no further measures to propose. Shortly after this, the report of the agricultural committee appeared. Of that report it would be impossible for him, consistently with the respect due to the quarter whence it came, to speak in the terms it deserved. But this he would say, that he did not think it had disappointed the expectations of the country; for he did not believe that any body had entertained the slightest hope of benefit from the labours of the committee. Few, however, could suppose that any body of men, having before them all the materials of information on a given subject, could have produced a document so utterly deficient in every character of wisdom and practical utility as that report. With regard to the measures which had been proposed as means of relief, they were all inadequate to their object, and totally inconsistent with sound and rational views of policy. The presenting of that report would not, therefore, have occasioned the least possible delay in his intention of bringing forward a motion on the state of the country. But other measures had since been brought forward in the other House. Those measures might come before their lordships at no very distant period, and he therefore thought it right to wait until they were brought up from the other House. With respect to these measures, he should take that opportunity of saying a few words. There was one specific measure now in progress, which was extraordinary, as it came from persons who had asserted that the reduction of taxation could afford no possible relief. That measure had his decided disapprobation, not certainly because it tended to reduce taxation, but because it proposed to accomplish that reduction in a manner the least advantageous to the country. Neither did he disapprove of it because it violated the sinking fund, the attempt to preserve which was delusive, and which in his opinion ought to be wholly suspended, to relieve the pressure on the country. What he condemned the measure for, was, its violation of just principles, the disguise it assumed, and the complexity in which it was involved. The scheme to which recourse was now to be had, was one which would ultimately be attended with great loss to the country; and its evil effects were attempted to be concealed, by the disguise of preserving the sinking fund. This proposition for the reduction of taxation, would ultimately produce a loss to the country of several millions. If the noble earl should enter into any engagement before the subject was fully considered by the House, it would be his endeavour to induce their lordships to reject such engagement, as it must inevitably be attended with great loss to the public.

The Earl of Liverpool said, he had never looked to the report of the agricultural committee as likely to give origin to any measure capable of relieving the existing agricultural distress. If, however, there were defects in the existing law, he was not disposed to adopt the opinion that no prospective remedy ought to be applied, because he could not expect from any measure immediate relief. But the noble earl had particularly dwelt on what he called the inconsistency of ministers, who had declared that no relief was to be obtained from the reduction of taxation, and had yet proposed a measure, the object of which was to reduce taxation in an improper manner. Now, neither he nor any person connected with government had ever made any such declaration. On the contrary, they had always held that the reduction of taxation, whenever it could be accomplished consistently with public faith, was a most desirable object. But, he had always held, as he now held, that reduction of taxation, would in vain be looked to as a means of relief to agricultural distress. He did not believe that the repeal of taxes could have the least effect on agriculture, unless it were limited to those which fell exclusively on the farmer. He would admit that the repeal of such taxes would be pro tanto a relief; but the general government taxes pressed more lightly on the agriculturists than on any other class; and he must therefore maintain that no essential relief could be obtained by their reduction. He had laid an emphasis on "government taxes," because there was another kind of taxes, namely, the poor-rates, which had a very different operation on agriculture, and were more severely felt. He was confident it would be found, that the weight of the government taxes fell on the community at large, and not particularly on the farmer; and that, though reduction would be a relief to the country in general, it would be none to agriculture. And here he would ask what had been the object of the reduction of the five per cents? No doubt that operation bore hard upon the holder, but it was a reduction of taxation to a certain degree; and it was expressly stated that it was a preliminary step to farther measures of the same kind. With respect to the measure in progress, for the future payment of the dead charge, he was prepared to prove that it involved no breach of public faith, and that it was in effect a reducing of the national debt, but by a different operation from that of the sinking fund; inasmuch as it possessed the advantage of yielding present relief. He could very well understand the argument of noble lords on the other side, who thought that getting rid of the sinking fund would relieve the country; but he must protest against such a doctrine, because he was convinced that the relief which might thus be maintained would ultimately prove an injury to the country.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, May 6.

LICENSING PUBLIC HOUSES.] Mr. Huskisson presented a petition, which, if the party subscribing it had taken his advice, would, he said, have been committed into other hands, but which, as the petitioner pressed it, he thought it his duty to present it to the House. It was stated in the petition, that the petitioner, Robert Churchward, a builder, undertook some years ago, to build about four or five hundred houses in the county of Middlesex, in the neighbourhood of Mile-end, near the Commercial-road: that after having built about one hundred or rather more, the inhabitants of this newly created town remonstrated against the inconvenience which they sustained from not having any public house in the neighbourhood. In consequence the petitioner built a house expressly constructed for a public house, at the expense of 1,500*l.*, intending that it should be opened and kept as a free house. In 1817, the petitioner applied to the magistrates for a license for this House, having a recommendation signed by the minister, the churchwardens, and the principal inhabitants of the parish. Notwithstanding that application so backed, the magistrates refused to license the house. In 1818, the number of houses having increased to above 200, the petitioner again applied to the magistrates for a license and was again refused. In 1819, finding that he had not interest enough to procure a license, the petitioner entered into a treaty with a publican at Bermondsey, of the name of Brown, to whom he sold the house for 1,100*l.* Brown at that time dealt with Barclay, and Co.; but on removing to Mile-end, he changed to Hanbury and Co., and gave as a reason, that they had a general interest in that part of the town. A license was immediately granted to Mr. Brown by the magistrates. The petitioner continued to build houses until the number exceeded 400, when it was represented to him that it was necessary to have another place for the sale of beer and he in consequence built one, as remote as he could from the house occupied by Brown. In 1821, the petitioner applied for a license for his new house, and again met with a refusal. In the same year another person built a public house on a spot of ground contiguous to this new town, which spot of ground had some time before been made over to that person by the petitioner. That House was taken by Hanbury and Co., and although there were but very few houses adjacent, the magistrates immediately licensed it. Such were the statements of the petitioner, for the accuracy of which of course he (Mr. H.) was not responsible. He had represented to the petitioner, that if he had suffered the grievances of which he complained, he had a remedy at law. The petitioner, however, had stated to him that he could have no redress at law. The injury which the petitioner complained of then, was this. He sold the House which cost him 1,500*l.* to Brown for 1,100*l.*, and the moment that it was licensed by the intervention of Messrs. Hanbury and Co. it became worth 3,000*l.*; and for that sum, Brown, if he pleased, could at once dispose of it. If the statements of the petitioner could be substantiated, it was clear that great abuses arose out of the present licensing system. As he saw the hon. member for Weymouth in his place, he wished to call his attention to the assurance which he sometime ago gave, that when the moment arrived at which the brewers derived any benefit from the reduction of the duty on malt, the price of beer should be lowered. What he wished to know was, whether that moment had arrived? If not he could only say that some measure must be taken to hasten its arrival.

Mr. Fowell Buxton perfectly concurred in the opinion of the right hon. gentleman, that if the allegations in the petition were well-founded, a case of grievance was made out, to which parliament ought to apply a remedy. He felt himself much obliged to the right hon. gentleman for having given him an opportunity of seeing the petition before he presented it to the House, as it had enabled him to inquire into the subject; and he could now positively declare, that all the substantial allegations of the petition were not borne out by the fact. The petitioner said, that in 1817 he had taken a piece of land for building. In the same year he made his first application to the magistrates for a license. Under those circumstances, the magistrates might probably have thought such an application premature. The following year the petitioner made a second application; but it was refused, because the greater part of the houses which he had built were untenanted. In the following year it seemed, the magistrates had licensed the house. Now, as the petitioner complained that the house had not been licensed during the first two years, he certainly could not complain of the magistrates for licensing it in the third. In licensing it they had done, even according to the petitioner's statement, what was right; and the only charge against them therefore was, that they had done what was right from a corrupt motive. The only fact in the shape of a charge conveyed by the petition, was, the statement, that Brown had transferred his trade from Messrs. Barclay's house to that of Messrs. Hanbury; but all who knew any thing of the brewers trade would be perfectly aware that the circumstance was one of every day's occurrence, and that no inference whatever of a corrupt nature could justly be deduced from it. Now upon that showing only, the single fact stated in the petition was answered; but it should be answered still more completely, Supposing Messrs. Hanbury to possess the influence attributed to them, the House would hardly suspect them of using it for any one's benefit but their own; and he did assure the House most unequivocally, that no agreement of any description, either made or understood, existed between Messrs. Hanbury and Mr. Brown. Brown was perfectly independent: he was no more confined to his brewer, than the right hon. gentleman was to his baker; he had brought his trade to the House, and would probably continue it as long as he found himself well treated. So much for the first part of the petitioner's case. The second called for still fewer observations. The petitioner complained that (after failing as to his first house), he had built two more houses, and that licenses had been refused to them; and that, after such refusals, a house upon the same spot, in the interest of Messrs. Hanbury, had been licensed. Now, the objections to the petitioner's two houses had been these—The first stood only 200 yards from the house occupied by Brown, and the second only 160 yards. The house licensed to Spratley (the successful applicant) stood 320 yards from Brown's house, and not in the same street. Adverting to these circumstances, he begged to ask the right hon. gentleman, whether the discretion exercised by the magistrates had not been such as he would have exercised himself? But he begged entirely to deny the allegation in the petition, that the house licensed to Spratley was let to Messrs. Hanbury.—Having disposed, then, he trusted, of Mr. Churchward's petition, he now came to the question which had been put to him by the right hon. gentleman. And first, he wished to point the recollection of the House to the circumstances under which that question was asked. When the subject had first come before the House, he (Mr. B.), without an opportunity of consulting the other brewers, had been induced, by some observations from the right hon. gentleman, to pledge himself that the price of beer should be reduced, as soon as the stock on hand, brewed from malt at the full duty, was consumed. He knew what it was that government expected. They had granted a farthing, and they wanted a halfpenny. But the pledge was redeemed, for the price of beer was lowered already. [Cries of "How"; "how much?"] It was lowered a halfpenny a pot; and government had only lowered it a farthing. He knew that a prejudice existed in the House against the class of persons to whom he belonged. He knew that complaints were made, over and over again, of the extensive property in public houses possessed by the brewers. In answer to such complaints he could state one fact. The firm to which he belonged supplied 766 publicans; 105 of those customers lived in the country. Of the others, only 49 occupied houses belonging to the firm: 22 were confined to the firm by loans; but 600 were independent. A small part of that number had loans, but the greatest part of them were entirely independent. As for the feelings of the brewers with respect to restrictions upon their trade, he appealed to the hon. member for Shrewsbury whether he (Mr. Buxton) had not afforded him every assistance in the preparation of his bill, and whether he had not suggested to him that clause which prohibited brewers from purchasing or becoming the lessees of public houses? He felt that such a measure would restrain the trade; but he thought that it would be a beneficial one, and he was content to abide by the restriction. There was only one more point upon which he would take up the attention of the House; and that was the subject of the strength of beer. A gallant admiral speaking of the quality of porter, had said, that if beer were brought back to the strength which it boasted in his younger days, he should be content. It appeared by the books and records of the Excise, that the beer now made and sold in London was stronger by 25 per cent than that made 20 years ago. The hon. gentleman sat down by observing, that six parts in seven of his trade was in free houses. Referring to the alleged want of sufficient competition, he wished that the hon. gentlemen complaining would themselves become competitors.

Mr. Calvert believed, that the right hon. gentleman was satisfied with the competition existing in the country, but not with the degree in which it existed in the large towns. He (Mr. C.) thought the reverse was the fact. In many parts of the country he knew that brewers commanded an entire monopoly in their own neighbourhood, shutting out competition entirely. He had himself frequently communicated with magistrates upon the subject, and had suggested that such extensive influence ought to be restrained. If he were one of the magistrates, he should feel it his duty to see that a competition really did take place. The licensing system was open to many abuses, and he would lend any assistance in his power to remedy them.

Sir J. Sebright said, that the licensing system, as it existed, produced the worst effects, not only on the public-houses themselves, but on the morals of those who frequented them.

Mr. Bennet felt himself bound to acknowledge, that he received the most liberal assistance, in 1819, from Mr. Buxton. In performing this act of justice to his hon. friend, he should take the opportunity to state, that he fully agreed with him as to the effects of competition. At the same time, he must express his belief, founded upon evidence, that a great part of the metropolis was portioned out among the brewers, and that a brewer applying for a licence in it destroyed every thing like fair competition. Indeed, it appeared, that when a brewer and another party applied for a license, the brewer obtained it from his rival, on the ground of being a known and responsible person. With regard to the introduction of a clause into any future act, prohibiting brewers from purchasing public-houses, he deemed it to be totally impracticable; inasmuch as public-houses might still be purchased for them on trust. The point principally to be attended to in London, was the prevention of disorder in the different houses and the placing them under some specific control. With regard to the country, he must say that there was scarcely a free house in any village. They were all in the power of the brewers, who drenched their wretched inhabitants with all kinds of vile poison. The only way to remedy the evils of that part of the system was, to allow every individual to sell beer as they might bread. It was said, that the alteration of the present system would tend to the destruction of much private capital embarked in the trade. If that were the case, he would prefer giving a fair compensation to the injured parties to continuing the present system, which was as detrimental to the morals as it was ruinous to the health of the common people.

Mr. Calvert trusted that his hon. friend would do the same justice to him as he had done to the hon. member for Weymouth.

Mr. Bennet had great pleasure in stating, that nobody had been more anxious to correct the abuses of the licensing system than the hon. member.

Mr. S. Whitbread defied any man to say, that the firm with which he was connected had ever used any improper means to obtain licenses. He could assure the House, they would willingly consent to any prospective measure that would tend to keep the trade open. He thought that any act of parliament would be advantageous to the public which should prevent brewers from holding the licences of public houses.

Mr. Monck was an advocate for having the trade in beer more open, at the same time, he would not deprive the brewers of any of their existing rights and interests. He thought that the magistrates ought to be deprived of a great portion of the discretionary power which they exercised at present in the licensing of public houses, inasmuch as it was in consequence of that discretionary power that so many people were obliged to drink bad beer, and at the same time to pay a most extravagant price for it. He had that morning received a letter from a physician at Bath, whom he had known for 30 years, in which that gentleman imputed most of the diseases prevalent there, and especially the colic, to the bad beer drunk there. He was glad to find that the licensing system had attracted the attention of the hon. member for Shrewsbury; and still more glad to find that the House generally seemed to be of opinion that it stood in need of amendment and alteration.

Ordered to lie on the table.

AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS REPORT.] On the order of the day for going into a Committee on the Report of the Committee on the Agricultural Distress,

Mr. Ellice assured the House and the noble lord, that after what passed on this subject on a former evening, he would not have interrupted the course of these proceedings, if he did not feel himself called upon, after the most mature consideration of the various resolutions on the table, to take the opportunity of protesting against them all, by now opposing the motion for the Speaker leaving the chair. He certainly would have abstained from this opposition, if he conceived there was the slightest chance of any amendment, or modification of the propositions in the committee, according to the prevailing opinions, or he would rather say prejudices on this important subject; but as no improvement was likely to result from them, in the present system of the corn laws, the wisest course, appeared, to him, not to touch that which it was not intended to improve, and which there was in some quarters a pretty obvious disposition to render more injurious to the public interest. The noble marquis proposed to debate first in the committee, his resolution relative to the advance of a million on bonded grain, protesting against going into the general discussion; but this opened the leading points in the general question, and those to which evidently the greatest importance was ascribed by ministers and the committee—the effect of the proposed advance from the Bank on the currency, and the price of grain. It was not now disguised, the sole object sought to be obtained was, a forced advance in the value of agricultural produce. On the appointment of the select committee he had stated his apprehensions, that all other considerations would be neglected. When he found his apprehensions realized, on their report he ventured to recommend to the House the greatest caution, before they embarked in the senseless and desperate expedients proposed in it. After having listened with the utmost attention to all that had fallen from the noble lord on the former evening, and the different gentlemen who had spoken in the course of this debate, his conviction, if possible, was confirmed, that no possible good could arise to the agricultural petitioners, and infinite mischief might be inflicted on many other interests, by the adoption of the measures before them. His duty, therefore, compelled him to attempt, at least, to arrest the course taken by ministers, by opposing this further progress of the committee.

He would not enter into a detailed consideration of the various resolutions on the table, involving the most opposite and contradictory opinions and principles, and he scarcely knew whether either, so entirely did he object to all, could be called better or worse than those of the noble lord. The same fate would probably attend whichever the House in their wisdom might adopt. The bill would remain a dead letter on the Statute-book, as another proof of their fever for legislation, and of their perpetual reliance on temporary and pernicious expedients, to arrest the necessary effects of great and obvious causes, which gentlemen carefully and studiously kept out of view; until a bad harvest brought the provisions of the act into operation, when parliament would be as ready to repeal, as they were now to enact them. Of all the resolutions before them, those of the hon. baronet, the member for Somersetshire, were the most monstrous. He (Mr. Ellice) concurred, in principle, with those of the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Huskisson), and of his hon. friend, the member for Portarlington; but he could not bring his mind to sanction the conclusion at which either arrived. A certain protection, looking to the peculiar taxes which affected the farmer, until these could be repealed, or thrown generally on the community, might be necessary, and some regulations to prevent a sudden inundation of foreign corn, beyond the wants of the country at particular periods. The latter evil was caused by the present state of the law, which certainly, so far, his hon. friend's proposition would counteract; but no grounds had been laid, or proofs brought forward to establish the claims of the agriculturist to the enormous protecting duty of 20*s.*; and when he reflected, that the price of grain in other countries did not greatly exceed this amount, he could not consent to impose so great an additional burthen on the consumer, in a period of scarcity, when the proposed law could alone come into operation.

The whole question resolved itself into this—What temporary protection could be given to the farmer, consistently with the equal interests of other classes of the community? In looking at this, they must take into consideration what was the present state, and likely to be the probable state of foreign markets, and what was the present, and probable future state of our own? The price of grain in England and on the continent, previous to the late war, was generally nearly the same; and as often higher as lower. Under the regulations existing at that period, any great difference was soon adjusted, either by an exportation of our surplus, or an importation of our deficiency, to meet the wants of our neighbours, or our own. At present, in all other countries, the price had again returned to the former standard of about 40*s.*: while here, although the average in the gazette might be under 50*s.* in consequence of the large proportion of the late harvest damaged by the wet season, good sound bread corn had never been cheaper in the great markets than 55*s.* and 60*s.* This was at least 25 per cent higher than in any other country in the world. The price of bread in London was actually one half dearer than in Paris; and yet such was the state of things of which the English grower complained, and the only remedy the propounders of the present measures could devise for his distress, was, an attempt to augment this already singular difference, and to throw the burthen off his shoulders upon those of the consumer! At all events, if they were to adopt the principle of these measures, let the House understand the extent to which it was supposed its application could be carried. The noble lord should distinctly state the rate at which, in his opinion, it would be desirable, and just, both to consumer and grower, that the price of corn should be maintained in ordinary years though there the folly of attempting to regulate by legislation that which depended so entirely on the fluctuation of seasons met them at the outset. On the former occasion, which gave rise to the present law, of the inadequacy of which, although under it they had enjoyed an absolute monopoly, the agriculturist now complained, 80*s.* was the rate on which their proceedings had been founded. Taking into calculation the alteration of the currency, 55*s.* to 60*s.* was now equal to 80*s.* at the former period. Would that satisfy the agriculturists, even if they could assure it to them? The answer was obvious: that was now the price, and the complaint in the petitions on the table was, its total inadequacy to enable them to pay present rents and taxes. [Hear, hear.] There he agreed with them; they came there near the root of the evil. Both must be reduced, but the reduction of the former would do little good, without a large repeal of the most oppressive taxes; and that, and not a futile and useless attempt to raise artificially the price of corn, should be the object of the country gentlemen. What protection could do more than the absolute monopoly the present law secured to them? And odious as it was in principle and oppressive as might be its provisions, he would rather leave them to the full enjoyment of it, until a change of circumstances should render its total repeal necessary, than consent to any aggravation of it, by adopting either of the propositions now before the House.

It was curious, and not uninstructive, with respect to their present proceedings, to take a retrospective glance at the course in which the legislature had gradually embarked in an attempt to prop up the landed interest, by sacrificing to it all the principles on which the corn trade ought to be regulated in a commercial country, if, indeed, the true policy was not to leave it entirely free. Every succeeding enactment since the first, or at least the first imposition of restrictions in modern times, had been progressively unjust, until they had arrived at such a state of delusion on the subject, that even his hon. friend, the member for Portarlington, the able advocate of free trade, had consented to clog his resolutions embracing that principle, with a duty totally destructive of it in effect, and within 4 or 5*s.* of what had been considered absolutely prohibitory, as late as 1804. Without going further back than 1773, when the price of wheat was very high, 60*s.*, if they referred to the law of that year, they would find the only regulations were a permission of free import when the average exceeded 48*s.*, and of export when it fell to 44*s.* The next alteration came in 1791, when the price was 49*s.* By the statute of that year, a duty was imposed of 2*s.* 6*d.* when the average was 50*s.*, only 6*d.* when it rose to 54*s.*, and under 50*s.* for the first time, a prohibitory duty, as it was called, of 24*s.* 3*d.*, although looking to the prevailing feelings and opinions of the present day, that was considered a very moderate imposition. The Bank stopped payment in 1797. The price of corn naturally rose with the first depreciation of the currency, with that of all other commodities, and in consequence of the two bad harvests of 1800 and 1801, reached the enormous and before unheard of rate of 120*s.* In 1802, 1803, and 1804, a more abundant supply reduced it to 65*s.*, still an unusual price, but the land owner accustomed to that of preceding years, forced the legislature again to interfere for his protection. The principle adopted in the previous bill of 1791, was still pursued; 2*s.* 6*d.* duty was imposed on importation when the average should be between 63*s.* and 66*s.*: 6*d.* when above 66*s.*, and the old, and still considered as such, prohibitory duty of 24*s.* 3*d.* attached when the average was under 63*s.* Committees were subsequently appointed in 1810 and 1814, and although their recommendations were not acted upon by the House, they were framed in the same spirit, which distinguished all these proceedings, the proposal being at that time to devise regulations by which the price of wheat should be permanently maintained at the enormous rate of 100*s.* Lastly came the bill of 1815, prohibiting importation while the average was under 80*s.*, and as if this was not sufficiently oppressive to the community, the house were called upon again to legislate; let it also be kept in view, by the party supposing themselves aggrieved by the low price of produce, and with the sole object, not implied, but openly avowed by the supporters of the present measure, of enhancing its value. Was this just, under the present circumstances of the country? Was it practicable, even if just and expedient?

In his opinion, their time would be much better employed in investigating the causes of the present distress, with a view to some efficient remedy, if that was within their power than in discussing propositions, from which it was scarcely possible to imagine any practicable or useful result. What, then, had brought the country into its present situation? The progressive depreciation of a paper money, by which prices had been gradually augmented, in proportion to the calls of an almost overwhelming taxation during the late war, and an attempt, on the restoration of peace, to restore the former currency, which had in the same manner again reduced the value of all property without any proportionate reduction of the demands of the tax-gatherer or other creditor. The country gentlemen and farmers, with all proprietors or capitalists, whose capital was engaged in property, had gone on on the same scale, and their wants had been supplied from the same sources, as those of a profuse government. Their engagements had increased in proportion to the artificial and temporary advance in their rents and value of their property, as the public debt had been increased according to the nominally increased means of the country, and they were now both left to face these engagements, with their means reduced one half, either by the actual improvement of the currency, or the effects resulting from it. According to Mr. Colquhoun, (and his calculation was confirmed by the returns of the property tax,) the rental of England in 1813, when corn was at 90*s.* and 100*s.*, and every species of farm produce at double its present price, might be taken at 43 millions; the farmers profit according to the rule laid down for their assessment to the same tax at 32, together 75 millions. If 75 millions was the profit on the agricultural transactions of the country under such circumstances, what must the result be now, with scarcely any reduction in the amount of charges, proportioned to former prices? If the rent was rightly calculated at one-fifth of the gross produce, and the gross produce had fallen a third, or a half, it was obvious a sacrifice of the whole rent would not remedy the evil. It was impossible to predict what might be the consequences of a continuance of the present state of things. Certainly, neither the present, or any former measures brought foward by ministers, were calculated to dispel the alarm, which the prospect before them naturally excited.

If they referred back to various periods of our history, they would find the prices of corn had been necessarily affected in the same manner by the same cause. Shortly after the Revolution, between the years 1693, and 1699, the guinea was worth 30*s.*, the ounce of gold 6*l.* 5*s.*; the price of corn then rose to 60*s.* The currency was reformed in 1700, and between that year and 1708, the average was again reduced to 32*s.* and 35*s.* Although considerable difficulties ensued from such changes, the transactions of the country, and its population were on a much more limited scale, and there was no national debt, to require the imposition, or render the continuance of taxation necessary to so disproportionate an amount, after the value of the currency had been augmented. Great care was also taken to relieve as much as possible embarrassment to individuals. The debased money, for there was then no paper currency, the exact depreciation of which could not be ascertained, was taken at its full amount in payment of taxes, and every measure adopted to prevent more inconvenience than was unavoidable to the public.

But he would ask hon. gentlemen who advocated the expediency of the present measures, whether they were prepared to extend their protection to all other articles of produce foreign or domestic, equally depressed, and how they would propose to ensure a remunerating price for them? They must be also anxious to restore former prices for cattle, wool, timber, bark, iron, and other articles in which they were interested. The colonist had an equal claim to some legislative protection in favour of his produce, which had been most strangely depreciated in the same manner, and at the same moment. All staple articles of our manufacture, the produce of other countries were in the same situation—cotton, hemp, flax, silk, and tallow, had fallen from 50 to 100 per cent. Could his hon. friend, the member for Portarlington, produce any proof to satisfy them that over production was the cause of all this depression? He was not disposed to dispute the grounds on which he had stated his opinion, that some allowance should be made for the effect of one, or a series of abundant crops, and for other causes affecting the transactions of a great country, arising out of the protracted war in which they had been engaged. But the true evil and paramount cause of these changes was the paper system, with its perpetual fluctuations, to suit the convenience, or profligacy of the government. Without entering into many details, he would state to the House what these fluctuations had been; and they would then be able to judge how far the effects had been proportioned to the cause he assigned for them. Since the enormous and unlimitted issues of later years, who, indeed, could form a satisfactory calculation, or who could pretend to foretel till we had experienced them, all the effects to be still felt from the restoration of the standard? Putting entirely aside the index of his hon. friend, the member for Portarlington—the price of gold as a commodity, which was now less in vogue—it appeared to him a rational estimate, and their effects could only be deduced from the influence of the contraction and expansion of the paper currency at particular periods on general prices. Let the House then subject the fluctuations which had hitherto been so remarkable to this test. In 1809, Mr. Horner found the Bank of England paper suddenly increased $1\frac{1}{2}$ millions, which was followed by an increase of three millions of country paper, forming together a greater addition to the circulation of this country, than the produce of the American mines had added in the same period to the general circulation of Europe. In 1810, after this addition, the Bank of England paper was only eighteen millions, and supposing the amount of country paper, which he believed would be generally found equal to that of the Bank, the same, the whole circulation of the country amounted to thirty-six millions. Mr. Horner estimated the depreciation at fifteen per cent, nearly the difference at the time between the market and mint price of gold: but he distinctly says in his report, that he doubted whether this could be then considered a fair standard of depreciation, and that he was certain the price of gold must entirely cease to be so, if the uncontrolled issue of paper should be carried to a much greater extent. The uncontrolled issue, however, proceeded steadily increasing till 1814, when the Bank of England notes had advanced to twenty-seven millions, and the country notes according to the former proportion, in an equal ratio; forming together an amount of currency in circulation of fifty-four millions. At last, in 1818, it increased to the highest amount known in the history of the system, and arrived at the enormous extent of thirty millions of Bank notes, and, on the same scale, thirty millions of country notes, together sixty millions; and because, while prices of other articles invariably rose the price of gold owing to particular circumstances, capable of easy explanation, happened at the precise moment, when the amount of paper was most excessive, to be only 3*l.* 18*s.* the effect of the necessary reduction of the paper currency, previous to the restoration of the former standard, on all the transactions of the country, was to be measured by 2*d.* per oz. in the value of gold! At least, this was the doctrine of the committee; and the country were now deriving full benefit from this great effort of their wisdom and experience!

But, to take another view of this subject. Look at the enormous and otherwise unaccountable advance, exclusively in this country, at least to an infinitely greater degree than in others, of all commodities, during the rise and progress of the system, and the rapid decline since the restoration of the old currency. So far from corn being the only article which had fallen, he should be glad to be informed where an exception was to be found to the general depreciation? In 1813, the prices of all staple articles of manufacture or consumption, foreign or British arrived at nearly their highest point, and were from 50 to 100 per cent invariably above the rates both of 1790 and 1822. Did this ever happen during any former war, or at any former period of our history, except where the same cause, a debased currency, led, in particular cases, to the same results? In 1815, at the termination of the war, the chancellor of the exchequer made an attempt to repay the Bank advances to the public, that they might withdraw part of their paper and resume their payments in specie, and certainly that was the fit moment, if it ever was expedient to return to the old standard. What followed? The distress of 1816, and the remedy of that distress—the re-borrowing and re-issuing the former amount of paper repaid and withdrawn from circulation. The right hon. gentleman put an additional guinea in the pocket of every person in the kingdom. There was no doubt the same measure now would produce the same relief. Would the right hon. gentleman venture to propose it, or was it possible to increase the present paper currency one-third or a half, to restore the amount of 60 millions in circulation in 1818, and to continue in operation the provision of his right hon. colleagues bill in 1819? The loan from the Bank in 1816 led gradually to the over-issue in 1818, and the measures in contemplation of the resumption of cash payments in the end of that year, and finally the report of the committee had led to the present contraction; so that the country doomed to perpetual disease under the hands of these physicians, suffered in turn from the alterative system prescribed for it. From the end of 1818, putting one pound bank-notes, and gold, on both sides, out of the question, the Bank of England circulation had been reduced about a third, and from the best calculation the country paper a half, and still the effect of all this, according to the dictum of the hon. member for Portarlington, was to be estimated in proportion to the difference of 2*d.* in the ounce of gold! And it must also be observed, that the same amount of currency being absorbed at both periods in the transactions of the revenue, and payment of dividends, how infinitely less that proportion must be, which was left for the general circulation of all other transactions. It was said, that taxation had nothing to do with the distress. Was the same taxation as easily paid with 30 or 35 millions of currency, as with 60? This was the main and paramount cause of all the distress, and either paralyzed equally all interests of the country, or threatened them at no distant period with the same consequences which were now felt by our agriculture. It was a mistake to suppose, the least caution had been observed, in preparing for the change in the currency. He had already stated the issue of paper was most excessive in 1818; since which time it had nearly been reduced one-half.

The noble marquis, had in the course of his recent observation on the state of the country, talked of our commercial prosperity; but certainly he was the only authority from whom he had been able to collect such an opinion, either connected or unconnected with that branch of our industry. On the contrary he believed no class had suffered so much from the great cause to which he ascribed, not the ruinous situation of the country, for to whatever results these wretched measures might lead, it was scarcely in the power both of legislature and government to exhaust our immense resources, but the general and most unjust derangement which had been produced in the relative situation of the industrious and unproductive portions of the community. Could the noble lord communicate to the House from what source he derived his information, that the ship-owner, the tradesman, the foreign and colonial merchant, the importer or exporter of domestic or foreign productions, or the general dealer in our home market, were now carrying on their business with profit? As far as he had access to persons of all descriptions, the answer to inquiries on this subject was universal: We certainly are carrying on our business with no profit or rather to a loss, but with the same vague expectation which encouraged the farmer to persevere, that the times would mend. The situation of the merchant, who in the ordinary course of his business had extended his transactions, exporting the productions of this country, or entering into engagements on the faith of his usual returns from the colonies was peculiarly deplorable. His bills must be paid, he could not, like the farmer, ask and wait for an abatement of his rent, and the returns for his exports, equal in quantity to the amount he had formerly received, were deficient half in value. He could not deduct equally from his engagement, and although from the very circumstances of the case, complaints of this description were not so loud as those of the agriculturists, let not the noble marquis console himself with the idea that they did not exist, or did not bear with an equal it not more severe pressure.

The noble marquis then went on to congratulate the country on the state of the manufacturing interest, and certainly, looking to the accounts before the House on some more reasonable grounds. But even here, if the particular circumstances which had lately occasioned an excessive demand were duly considered, it might be very doubtful, how far all that apparent comfort which prevailed among the manufacturing population, and the prosperity of their employers was likely to be permanent. The right hon. gentleman (Mr. Peel) had truly stated his bill was productive of beneficial results to this class of the labouring population, the invariable effect of an enhancement in the value of money, being immediately to reduce the price of all commodities, before that of labour: but it must be recollected this effect was only temporary, and that ultimately, and at no protracted period the price of labour must adjust itself to that of provisions. He did not mean to say, that in many of the manufacturing districts wages were too high, consistently with the comforts the poor man ought to enjoy, but in the metropolis and in the great towns, there had been scarcely any decline, and wages remained at the same rate, to which they had been raised during the war, while the means of existence had declined one-half. Might not the great increase in the revenue be in some degree ascribed to this? If half the amount formerly required was sufficient for the purchase of necessaries, would not the surplus be expended in luxuries, and unfortunately, and it was a most melancholy consideration, find its way to the ale-house and gin-shop, the ready receivers of the chancellor of the exchequer? If any part of this statement was correct, if the prices of labour and provisions had not yet adjusted themselves, and if no high profits, which was admitted was the case, resulted to the masters from their trade, must not the attempt be made soon to increase them? Or supposing the demand to decline for manufactures at present price, to endeavour to produce them at a lower cost, by pressing upon the labourer a reduction of his wages? Suppose a material falling off in our exports, what might be the consequence? The late unprecedented and extraordinary demand was to be ascribed to two causes. Great speculations to India and South America, neither of which were likely to answer the expectations of those engaged in them, and a necessity of importing in a short period an immense amount of specie for our circulation. We had imported in two years, at the lowest calculation, about 20 millions of gold and silver. Was that to continue?—and if it was not, what other substitute was to be found, against which we could, to a similar extent, calculate in the same period, an exchange for an equal quantity of our manufactures? Restrictions upon restrictions were heaped upon our import trade, and the wise legislators of the present day supposed, as was proved in the case before them, that we could continue supplying all the world with the produce of our own industry, without receiving any thing in exchange for it. Our home market in the present state of agriculture did not promise an increased demand; our exports were exposed to fluctuation and diminution from the circumstances he had stated. What then would be the consequence if at the very moment when the provisions of the present bill came into operation, and raised the price of all the necessaries of life, the price of labour should be suddenly reduced, and the dangers arising from discontent, be added to a reduction in our revenue and in the sole remaining prosperous branch of our industry? Would any government attempt to force upon a discontented population, under such circumstances, the unjust operation of the present bill?

Looking at the various propositions, it was scarcely possible to determine whether their injustice or perfect inefficacy even for the object in view distinguished them most. While the agriculturist maintained his present monopoly the bill was useless and would remain a dead letter on the Statute-book. If a case should arise in which he supposed he might derive some advantage from its provisions, the state of society was likely to be an insurmountable bar to his attaining it. If they would make the poor man eat his bread at double the price of any other consumer in the world, they must give him the means of buying it, and where were these to be obtained? Only through the exertion of his labour and industry, and if the manufacturer could not employ him at as cheap a rate as his foreign competitor, that would soon fail him. Foreign nations did not purchase commodities from any particular predilection for the country of their production, but where they could be obtained cheapest and best—and was it the precise policy for a country depending almost entirely on her commerce and manufactures, so to advance the cost of production, by enhancing the value of labour and provisions, as not only to encourage competition on the part of other countries, but absolutely to ensure the destruction of her own industry? The price of bread he had already said was now double the price in France and other countries, and there were already indications of this disparity producing its necessary results. An hon. friend of his, the member for Nottingham (Mr. Birch), had informed him, that complaints had very much increased, of the continued emigration of their best workmen—and it was notorious in the capital, that every encouragement was given to our machinists and engineers to embark for other countries. If he was not misinformed, government had also been lately called upon to enforce rigorously, those odious statutes, which prevented the industrious man from carrying his talents and industry to the most advantageous market. To inflict penalties, he would add, the most unjust in our laws under any circumstances, upon persons of this description, was as cruel, as it was likely to be ineffectual:—but to do so, after the passing of this bill, depriving the poor man of his comforts in the first instance, and subjecting him by its consequences, to the risk of finding no employment at an adequate remuneration, was to add the most cruel oppression, to the grossest injustice. If any person had asked him (Mr. E.,) three years ago, whether it was probable America would soon become a manufacturing country, he would have answered, that while the fee simple of good land continued at 20s. an acre, and there was a moderate market for its produce, few men were likely to abandon a country life, with the hope of independence it held out, for the more unhealthy and confined employment of a manufacturing one. But, then he could not contemplate the continuance of restrictions which prevented the American agriculturist from exchanging his productions with the British manufacturer to their mutual advantage. The consequence had been the recent establishment of many considerable manufactories in the United States. Spinning mills, with all our improvements, were erected in Massachusetts, where the cotton from the Southern States was spun, the yarn returned to Philadelphia, and then wove into as good and as cheap cloth as we could manufacture. The countervailing duties of about thirty per cent, imposed beyond all the charges on our manufacture, insured a good profit to the American, and the trade had answered so well, that these establishments were rapidly increasing, particularly in Pennsylvania. These were some of the necessary results of measures like the present, and with all our capital and ingenuity, our trade and manufactures must in the end be sacrificed to a perseverance in them. If we continued in this manner to heap restriction on restriction, under the name of protection, all productive industry, as was the case in Holland, must be gradually banished from the country, and our decline would be accelerated, by furnishing to others the very elements to enable them in the first instance to compete with, and under the unsupportable oppression of our taxation, at last, to destroy our trade.

He had already entered much more at large into the subject than he intended, when he first rose to address the House, but he must still add one or two observations on the other projects of the noble lord, and on what he considered the most advisable course for the House to pursue. First, with respect to the advance of a million on bonded corn. It was almost impossible to treat this speculation in a serious manner, but it was necessary to advert to the grounds which had been adduced in support of it. These were, the probability of adding to the currency, and of relieving the farmer, by enabling him to watch a proper opportunity of disposing of his corn, it being alleged that the present low price was occasioned in some degree, by a pressure of produce on the markets, arising from the distress of the agricultural body for ready money. The first ground was too absurd to admit of any argument. Since the restoration of the standard, and the convertability of paper into money, no measure could have the effect of increasing the quantity of currency in this country particularly, which did not produce an equal effect on the general money market of the world—unless to be sure we were driven to another depreciation, a question which it was unnecessary now to discuss. Then, as to relieving the farmer by enabling him to borrow money on a deposit of his corn? Did he now want this facility, or was not the country banker and broker, ready to advance, even on the credit of his possessing the means of repayment, without an actual pawning of his produce? And, if he was to pawn it, which part of his corn was he to pawn? The good, for which there was now a ready market at 55*s.* or 60*s.*, already too high for the interest of the consumer? or the bad, that owing to the condition in which it had been got in, it might rot in the granaries? He had heard it said, why should not such a measure be extended to the relief of the agricultural, which had so often been beneficially applied to commercial distress? The answer was simple. The cases were in no respect analogous. The merchants had applied at different times, when, in consequence of particular events during war, their warehouses were overloaded with colonial produce, or manufactures, intended for markets, then closed to their admission. Exchequer bills had been issued to enable them to meet pressing engagements founded on this property, for which it was impossible to find a sale, but the moment the restriction was removed, and the accustomed markets opened, the relief came, and the advance which, had not injured the community, and in many cases saved the merchant from ruin, was repaid with facility. How could that case be compared with the present? Instead of a scarcity of money; which was invariably the case when the measure was before resorted to, they had now abundance, and there was no complaint on that subject from the agriculturists themselves.

The only remedy then, and he confessed he was not among those who considered it adequate to the evil, but it was all they had in their power in the present indisposition of the House to enter upon the consideration of the effects produced by the currency, was, to require from ministers a reduction of every shilling of taxation which was not absolutely required for the

expences of government, and the payment of interest on the debt. He could not help thinking, if the landed gentlemen would exert themselves to enforce a system of the strictest œconomy, some considerable relief might be granted. In the commencement of the session, they had been told, it was impossible to do more than take off 1s. a bushel on malt, on condition of the plan succeeding for the reduction of the 5 per cents. Since that time, a new light had broken in upon administration, and although they manfully resisted the proposition, that taxation was an evil, they had been compelled to submit to a further reduction of about two millions. To be sure, the plan they had devised to do this, and maintain their own consistency, was one of the most extraordinary description, calculated, unfortunately, to cheat the country, as much as themselves, the latter of which could only have been the intention of the chancellor of the exchequer. His hon. friend, the member for Winchelsea had blamed members for not being in their places to resist this scheme; but he (Mr. E.) was satisfied, from some experience of the House, that opposition to any useful effect was fruitless, and he did not feel himself called to debate such absolute quackeries and absurdities. When this scheme for relieving the present generation of what was called the dead weight was first suggested, he had asked in vain, why the amount of taxation to be repealed could not be deducted from the sinking fund, which must be the case at last? or why, if all this complicated process must be submitted to, to save the consistency of ministers, with those who could be blinded by such clumsy artifices, the profit arising from the transaction, or the expenses to be incurred, might not be gained, or saved to the public, instead of going into the pockets of contractors? The plan, he believed, would be found perfectly impracticable, and that no persons would be induced to undertake such a contract; but as the remission of two millions of taxes was only to be obtained in that way, he was far from advising the House to reject the good part of the speculation. Let the country gentlemen only persevere, and at last they must get rid of taxes to the amount of the annual sinking fund. He had, to be sure, no great faith in the real existence of any such fund; but if it did exist, as was pretended, was it wise, was it prudent, looking to the grievous oppression under which the country laboured, to force the last shilling from the pockets of a suffering population, and which might still be usefully employed in their respective occupations of industry, to add to the already enormously disproportioned profits of the fundholder? As long as a sinking fund could be maintained out of profits, it was a most expedient measure; but would the right hon. gentleman deny that a much larger proportion of the existing taxation was now drawn from the reduced capital, at least in nominal value, of the country? The object of all this was, to raise the price of stock, and to reduce the rate of interest, without reflecting that an useless accumulation of capital, so drained from the productive industry of this, must, when the desired effect was produced, be transferred to other countries for investment. Did the right hon. gentleman hear nothing of the foreign loans, negotiated and negotiating, and was he not aware that every pound unnecessarily exacted by taxation encouraged this perpetual transfer of capital? It was impossible to enter upon the consideration of the particular subject before the House, without adverting to the whole system which had produced so great a convulsion in all our various interests, and which now induced the landed interest to look only for relief from the injurious and oppressive measure under discussion. If the committee had suggested any amendment of the corn law, which was certainly not much better in point of principle than the proposed alteration, he could have willingly lent his assistance in endeavouring to reform it; but when he saw that was not intended, he must protest against any useless aggravation of it. At present the landowner possessed a complete monopoly, with every prospect of its continuance, and his conviction was, that such a scarcity as would require relief by importation, under the provisions either of the present or the intended bill, would compel the House to adopt an entirely opposite policy on this subject, and instead of imposing restrictions, to encourage by bounties a supply for the absolute wants of the people. Great changes must take place in the general situation of the country before another session. It was notpretended that any benefits were likely immediately to accrue to the party seeking them from this bill. In the mean time he had a decided feeling that the best character which could be given to the proceeding altogether was, its absolute inefficiency either as to good or evil; but when he reflected upon the consequences which had been brought on the country by the hasty proceeding of 1819, he could not but consider the wisest course under present circumstances was, to abstain from all legislation affecting so seriously important and opposite interests, either until an absolute necessity forced us to interfere, or till we had the benefit of further experience, and some fairer prospect of a satisfactory solution of the various difficulties which surrounded us. It was on these grounds he should oppose the further progress of these proceedings.

Mr. Benett, of Wiltshire, said, that as he had originated one of those propositions* which his hon. friend had designated as monstrous, he thought himself called upon to defend it. His hon. friend had also been guilty of one or two errors in his statement, which it was important to correct. The last returns stated the average price of wheat to be 44*s*. 7*d*. His hon. friend had taken it at 55*s*. Now the price of corn being so much lower than his hon. friend had stated it at, the situation of the agriculturists was really much worse than his hon. friend had imagined. His hon. friend had said, that the corn bill had given a monopoly to the land-owners. Now, when the ports were opened, they had been glutted with a supply of foreign corn that had lasted four years; and the fact was, that for the last three years, even the corn bill had not given the land-owners a monopoly. The extent of that importation might be judged of, from the increase in the exports of corn from Ireland alone. The quantity of corn, reported as of Irish growth, and as exported from Ireland, could never have been grown in that country: for, during the four years he had mentioned, the accumulation of corn imported from Ireland was as sevenfold; and what was still more remarkable, the accumulation of flour imported from the same quarter was as elevenfold. If the corn had been grown in Ireland, the traces of increased cultivation must have been visible. But where were they to be found? If the flour, again, was really Irish, mills must have multiplied throughout that kingdom in a very surprising degree. He had never heard that such was the fact. Perhaps he should be told, that much of the pasture land in Ireland had been converted into arable; and that the imports of pigs, bacon, butter, and cheese, had decreased in proportion. This, however, was not the case; for they, also, had very considerably increased during that period. He perfectly agreed with his hon. friend, that the proper and effectual relief to be afforded to the agriculturists must be a remission of taxes. Much had been done in this way; but much more remained to be effected. Even these remissions would not entirely effect the object.—They could not relieve the country from the poor-rates, or from the tithes. He must defend the proposition which he had made in the committee. The duty he proposed on imported corn, was 3*d*. lower than the duty of 1792. For his own part, he had not desired any monopoly; his anxiety had been, that the ports should be always open, and that the country might get rid of the corn law, and all its horrible and odious attendants. The House had shown itself always extremely anxious to protect at all events, the consumers of corn. Now, who were the consumers? The farmers, the labourers, and the manufacturers for home consumption. These were the consumers; and their best interests were bound up in the general interest of the country. What was the reason that the manufacturers were now in distress? Because the home trade was now, as it ever had done, following the distress of the agriculturists. What had gone to

* The following are Mr. Benett's proposed resolutions:

1—"That it is expedient to provide, that the foreign corn now under bond in the United Kingdom may be taken out for home consumption, whenever the average price of wheat, ascertained in the usual mode, shall exceed 80*s*. per quarter; and the trade in corn shall thenceforth be permanently free, but subject to the following duties upon importation; viz.

Wheat	24*s*. per quar.
Rye, pease, and beans	16*s*. ditto.
Barley, bear, and bigg	12*s*. ditto.
Oats	8*s*. ditto.

2d.—"That a drawback or bounty be allowed on the exportation of corn to foreign countries:

On wheat of a marketable quality	18*s*. per quar.

ruin the agriculturists, had gone to ruin them. There was, however, one class of consumers, who had profited by the fall of prices of agricultural produce: he meant those who lived by the interest they made upon their own money, and who most profited by the bill of 1819, to which his hon. friend had attributed all the distresses of the country. His hon. friend had often expressed his feeling for them: but for himself (Mr. B.) he had no feeling whatever for them. The value of their money had risen, as the price of produce had fallen. He knew not whether the depreciation of the currency operated in the ratio of 10*l*. per cent or of 40 per cent; nor was he anxious to enter upon that discussion, because he feared, that while every gentleman ran away with some favourite theory of his own creation, the interests of the country were likely to be sacrificed. Much, unquestionably, of the existing distress was owing to the late war. During its continuance, we had been living on loans, and spending money which we certainly had no right to touch. The consequent increase of the currency had produced an artificial trade, which vanished with the return of peace, and the diminution of the currency. Besides all this, the country had certainly not returned so speedily as it might have done, to a peace establishment; and that delay had been a serious blow to the already dilapidated finances, and to the general prosperity of the country. The next blow we received was an enormous and overwhelming importation of provisions from foreign countries, which importation was not at all called for by any wants of this country. This last circumstance bore most severely on our agricultural interest. A third blow was given by the alteration effected in our currency.—The proposals which parliament was now to be called upon to sanction, were; first, the loan of 1,000,000*l*. on exchequer bills for the purchase of corn, the produce of our own soil, to be warehoused under particular regulations. Upon this he should reserve what he had to say till the House should have resolved itself into a committee. The second proposal referred to the relief to be afforded by remitting 1,800,000*l*. of taxes. If he was not exceedingly mistaken, he had, upon more than one occasion, heard the noble marquis assert, that it was idle to expect any relief from the remission of taxes. He was glad to find him in a different opinion. The next proposition or resolution rather, was, to the effect, that the only fair protection for the home grower consisted in the imposition of a fixed duty upon imported corn, equivalent to the amount of the existing taxation on its production; and this had ever been his (Mr. B's) own principle. His hon. friend had called this a monstrous proposal on his (Mr. B's) part, as if it extended too high a protection to the British agriculturist. Now, several hon. members, with whom he had conversed upon the subject, considered it to be too low. He had no hesitation to name the prices which he considered to be fair, and likely to afford the desired protection. He was, then, in regard to corn, only anxious that the grower should obtain such a price as would meet the rents as they stood in 1792. It was not, therefore, too much to say, that the land-owners should receive now, the same money amount of rent as they received in 1792. In order to show that this amount would not be too great, gentlemen must first assume the gross value of the produce of a farm, and then they must ascertain the value of the rent. To get at the value of the produce, they could not do better than to fix an average price of corn; for by the price of that commodity, the value of all other produce must be regulated. The average price of wheat for 10 years preceding 1792 would amount to about 6*s*. 3½ per bushel. Say that the whole produce of a farm was 2,000 bushels, they would produce, at 6*s*. 3½*d*., 627*l*. 3*s*. 4*d*. Now, the most eminent land surveyors in 1792, allowed one-third of the gross produce of the farm, as a fair rent to the landlord. One-third of this gross produce, therefore, would be 209*l*. 1*s*. 1*d*. Now, wheat at the present moment might be taken at 8*s*. 4½*d*. per bushel. The gross produce of the same farm, 2,000 bushels at 8*s*. 4½*d*., would yield 837*l*. 10*s*.: of this amount one-fourth must be taken for the rent; the same surveyors who gave one-third as a fair proportion in 1792, giving one-fourthh only in 1822, owing to the increase of taxes including the poor-rates, for which such an allowance was to be made as must affect the calculation to that extent. One-fourth of 837*l*. 10*s*. would give 209*l*. 7*s*. 6*d*. for the rent proper to be paid in 1822, being only higher by 7*s*. 6*d*. than that which was thought fair in 1792. Consequently, 2,000 bushels of wheat, now at 8*s*. 4½*d*., would afford the grower no higher remuneration than the same quantity at 6s. 3½d. in 1792. The principle laid down by the hon. member for Portarlington was, that the growers were entitled to a remunerating price in proportion only to the increase of rents. Now, all that he (Mr. B.) asked for was a protecting duty of 24s. Every body would, in fairness, admit that the landowner was entitled to a higher rent now than in 1792, because of the increased taxation; but the fact was, that he did not ask for a higher rent. He would not do so, because he anticipated a very great reduction of taxation, and it was for the landlord to look for his relief from that circumstance alone. He should not be surprised if, the very moment the ports should be opened, 500,000 or 600,000 quarters of corn, should be immediately brought into this country. That importation would carry at least 700,000*l.* or 800,000*l.* into the Treasury, and would thus enable the government to relieve the people from a part of their present burthens, and place them in a situation to pay the British grower a protecting price. When he saw some of the greatest land-owners in the country affected by the general distress of agriculture, and knew that he must depend solely upon the value of the land and the produce, he should advocate any proposition which might tend to restore them to their former flourishing condition, more especially as he conceived their prosperity to be intimately connected with that of the state. He was anxious to correct an ill-feeling that had gone abroad, with respect to the power of landlords over rent. They had been accused of racking rents as high as they could: but every country member who heard him knew that that was impossible. Human nature was always the same. The landlord naturally strove to get the highest rent, and the tenant endeavoured to reduce it to the lowest proportion: but it should not be forgotten, that the theory of rents was this—the purchaser made the price, and not the seller. When to this consideration the House added the local attachments both of landlords and tenants, they would see that the charge was of a very improbable nature. One of the finest farms in Somersetshire, which had let but a very few years ago for 1,400*l.* per annum, had since been rented at 700*l.*, and was now untenanted, for nobody could be induced to take it. Instances of the same sort had occurred in Wiltshire. This state of things would, in the end, occasion high prices. But, for whose benefit? Not for the farmers, but for the merchants and the foreigners, at the expense of the agricultural interest. The farmers would then be told that they should be content, because they had a high price for their corn—but by that time they would have no corn to sell. He wished it to be understood, however, that nothing would benefit the country, without a reduction of taxation. That reduction would enable the farmer to supply the home market, at a much lower price than would now remunerate him.

Mr. Monck contended, that the distresses of the country were mainly imputable, not to low prices but to high taxes. None of the recipes of the five or six state physicians made, therefore, an approximation to the true remedy. Every corn bill was intended to benefit the agriculturists at the expense of the other classes; and instead of looking at the present low price of grain with dismay, it afforded him sincere satisfaction, because it would compel country gentlemen to do their duty to their constituents. The existing corn bill gave a complete monopoly. What were called its defects did not injure the farmers, and were a great benefit to the consumers. Dr. Paley had considered the uncertainty of crops and seasons as a providential ordinance, because it prevented the landowner from extracting the last farthing from his tenant. He (Mr. M.) was, however, decidedly of opinion that there were no bad seasons: one county or one country might produce less than another, but the gross produce of the world was always the same, and a perfectly free trade in grain ought therefore to be established.

The House having resolved itself into the committee,

The Marquis of Londonderry rose to call the attention of the committee to his first resolution. He should do injustice to the agricultural committee, and injustice to his own opinions, if he did not desire it in the outset to be understood that he was not prepared to justify the proposition upon general principles: it was only to be tolerated as an exception to them, and employed as a temporary law. It would, he conceived, be nothing but pedantry, to say that no case had arisen, or could arise, in which they might not be relaxed. The hon. member for Taunton (Mr. Baring), in a former session, had proposed a departure from them as a permanent part of the corn laws, when he suggested the employment of a capital of three millions, in order to keep up a stock of corn in the national granary, that might be replenished from time to time. The agricultural committee had had two distinct propositions under their consideration—the one, the application of a sum of money, not exceeding a million, for the purchase of corn by an agent of the government—the other to give encouragement in some mode afterwards to be considered, not by purchases to be made by an agent of the government, but by individuals acting with a view to their own interests. They would come into the market as ordinary purchasers, with a portion of capital advanced to them on moderate interest, or having an allowance in the nature of a bounty, to be applied towards covering the expense of depositing the corn, which they might subsequently sell at a profit. After a very full discussion, the first proposition was laid aside, without any reproach to the hon. gentleman who suggested it, because the hon. member for Taunton had contemplated a similar project as a permanent measure. The committee did not think that even the exigency of the present moment warranted government in putting forward a purchaser, who was to buy corn when it was cheap, and to sell it when it was dear. Such an agent would drive all other speculators out of the market, for it would be impossible to compete with an individual, whose purchases were not contracted or limited by any view to his own interest. It was thought that it would be a most active corrective, but purchased at too dear a rate. Looking to the other principle, the committee had been of opinion, that some relief might be afforded by a permissive, not a compulsory measure. That strong distinction was taken: a million in the hands of a government agent might be looked upon as a compulsory measure; but in the other case, the money would not be laid out unless the individual thought that his own interest would be advanced by the speculation, by selling again afterwards at a profit. The committee found, on examining the quantity of corn sold in some of the markets, that last year, in the early months, it was nearly double what it had been in the corresponding months of the preceding years. Hence a superabundance of produce was inferred, aided by the wants of the farmers, who by coming to the market in such numbers, rendered it very ruinous to the markets. —As to the possibility of permanently raising the price of corn by any system of laws, he believed that notion was nearly exploded. The present measure neither could nor would raise the average price throughout the year; but it would have the effect of making a more convenient distribution of the supply. On a former night he had said, that the subject had received much attention from government, but ministers had laid it aside, under the impression that they would not be justified in bringing it forward as a measure of relief. They were led to believe that the country was not distressed so much from a want of capital, as from a want of conviction in the minds of those who possessed it that it could be advantageously employed in speculations in corn. There was besides another plan which ministers had thought would give more encouragement to parties storing grain: they preferred giving a small monthly amount on the corn stored. He had distinctly stated, that he brought forward that measure in preference, because it had more activity of encouragement in it. Ministers at that time were rather looking for the means of locally applying funds, which funds they conceived existed and were not applied; and they thought that four millions thrown into circulation would afford of itself a means of purchasing corn, and thereby afford relief to the agriculturists. They thought that the monthly allowance, though it would not amount to a premium to force speculation, would nevertheless cover the expenses of warehousing, and the interest of money, and thus tempt individuals to make speculations in grain. It was due to the committee to remark, that this permissive measure, if it did no good, could do no harm. The plan held out no inducement to any one to embark in an improvident speculation, if he thought the market was not likely to rise; if it were likely to rise, then at the time of the greatest glut purchases might be made, which, with the assistance proposed, would render a profit at a later period. He had not voted for this measure in the committee, nor had he supported it with any warm tone of argument. He would say, however, that on the present occasion he felt no repugnance in offering it to the fair consideration of the committee of the whole House. He had learnt from gentleman connected with the landed interest, that whether right or wrong, this was the proposition which the farmers themselves thought would do good. Upon these grounds, he had felt himself justified in bringing it forward, and would move, "That his majesty be enabled to direct Exchequer bills, to an amount not exceeding one million, to be issued to commissioners in Great Britain, to be by them advanced; under certain regulations and restrictions, whenever the average price of wheat shall be under 60*s*. per quarter, upon such corn, the growth of the united kingdom, as shall be deposited in fit and proper warehouses."

Mr. Curwen felt that there were great objections to the measure in point of principle, but he did not see why it might not be adopted as a permanent means of relief in times of distress, as he conceived that much advantage might result from it. A time could scarcely arrive when the demand and the supply would be equal; and in years of abundance the scheme would hold out an important inducement to speculators in grain. It was quite idle to hope, that a time would arrive when there could be an export trade in grain, the growth of this country. As a measure of relief the proposed plan could do no possible harm, and might be productive of some good. It had been stated, that all these measures were intended to benefit one part of the community at the expense of others. Now, he would ask what could be done to assist the grower of corn that would not be useful to all classes of the community? These measures were not intended for any particular class. The effect of them would be, to induce the cultivator of the soil to sow a sufficient quantity of corn for the use of the population, which was by far the cheapest mode of subsisting the country. The production of corn ought to be viewed with reference to the real wants of the country. If they did not proceed on a system of protection, they would destroy their own agriculture; and then the country would be at the mercy of a few interested merchants. The great object of parliament ought to be, to render the country independent of foreign corn, and at the same time to afford the consumer an opportunity of purchasing it at a cheap rate. He would always support the principle, that they ought to rely on their own produce for consumption, instead of depending on foreign states for the necessary supply. Some gentlemen argued, that it was better to throw the ports open, and to encourage a free trade in corn. But, if that course were taken, what was to become of the great body of agriculturists? He might be told, that agricultural capital would find its way into other channels, and that greater exertions would be made by the manufacturing interest. He was of a different opinion. Such was the power and perfection of machinery, that the whole world could be supplied with manufactures, wrought by the number of hands who were now employed. How could amends be made to the country, if the corn trade were thrown open, for the loss of labour which must necessarily follow? There was not one individual who would be thus thrown out of employment whose labour was not worth 40*l*. per annum; and thus the country would be subjected to a loss of 40,000,000*l*. a year. The produce of all countries was so much increased as to threaten danger to the agriculture of England. If the ports were thrown open, there would not be a mere supply of corn for three weeks. No: a supply for six months would be poured in at once. He did not ask for great prices, but he wished to see them reasonable and steady. He merely asked for those prices which would keep the country in a state of cultivation; condemning, as he did, the throwing out of cultivation any large portion of the land of this country. Very large protecting duties would not, he believed, operate beneficially. His wish was, to limit the supply of corn, so as to procure as much as was necessary, but to avoid a glut. With that view, he would be satisfied if lower protecting duties were imposed.

Mr. Leycester said, there never was a more zealous friend to the agricultural interest than he was. He commiserated their distress, but he was quite convinced that it would not be alleviated by the plan of the noble lord. The measure was contrary to all legislative rule. Was it not most unjustifiable to expend the public money, for the purpose of raising the price of bread against that very public from whom the money was taken? Was it not most unjustifiable to raise the price of bread against those manufacturers, whose chins were merely kept above water by the existing low prices? The principle of the measure was most flagitious; and he did not think that the badness of the principle was redeemed by the equity of the plan. The question was, whether the present prices were forced or unnatural? If they were forced or unnatural, the evil would correct itself, and the prices would rise. In that case, it would be a gratuitous violation of principle to add a stimulus to that which would work its own cure. But, if the low prices were occasioned by an actual redundancy of produce, the measure certainly would do no good, but harm. It would bring large quantities of corn into local proximity with the market. In the event of a bad harvest, this might do good; but it would do much harm if the harvest were a large one.

Mr. Huskisson said, he would state the grounds on which he objected to this resolution. Looking to this as a temporary measure, his objection to it was, the time to which it was to be applied. His noble friend had stated that, since the last harvest, corn had been brought into the market to nearly double the quantity which had ordinarily been introduced at antecedent periods of similar extent. The reason his noble friend gave for this was, that the farmers were called on to pay their rents; and, from the difficulties which pressed on the landlords, the occupiers of land, in order to meet their demands, were compelled to thresh out their corn, and to send it to market at an earlier period of the year than usual. Now, if this reason were well founded, it followed, that many of the farmers were no longer in the market as sellers of this commodity, but as purchasers for their own support, and for the maintenance of the poor in the parishes to which they belonged. The consequence then must be, if this measure had the effect of taking out of the market any considerable quantity of corn, and thereby of raising the price, that it would bear hard on the lower class of farmers, and render the maintenance of the poor more onerous. He believed, if any practical man asked who were the most distressed? the answer would be, "look at their stack-yards." The yards of the wealthy farmers were well stored, while those of the lower class were emptied. How, then, could they be relieved by this measure? This plan did not accord with the general principles which governed the subject. The fact was, they were in an artificial state, which required frequent revision. With respect to the general principle, if there was any one article on which government ought not to lend money, that article was corn. Let the House consider what the effect of the law would have been, if it were passed last session. Agricultural distress was then pressing severely on the country; and, if the corn-market could then have been operated on to the amount of a million, he would ask his noble friend, who knew the state of the market in September, whether the price would not have been forced up to 80*s*., and the ports in consequence, have been thrown open immediately? On the 8th of Sept. the price of corn was 55*s*. 8*d*., and on the 29th it was 70*s*. 8*d*. being an advance of 30 per cent in twenty days. Now, if this plan had been then carried into effect, the corn-grower might, at the former period, have called for this million—the price would then have risen above 80*s*.; and that which the agriculturist most apprehended, namely, the throwing the ports open, would have taken place. What would be the consequence if there were a prospect of a rise in the market? Why, those persons who had received money from government at 3 per cent would be speculating against those who speculated with their own money, at an interest of 5 per cent. Considering the contingencies of this market, he thought it was truly desirable that its regulation should be left to the operation of nature. Prices were beginning to adjust themselves between landlord and tenant. They ought to be allowed to find their proper level: but this measure only tended to keep up the delusion, and to add to the difficulty. It would create a most dangerous precedent, which it would be necessary to keep up, if the harvest were abundant next season. Should the ensuing harvest be unfavourable, there would be no necessity for this assistance; and, if it were favourable, there would be a general scramble for this money. They would either do too little or too much. If the prices rose, there was no necessity to interfere; and if they were depressed, the measure would afford no adequate relief.

Sir J. Sebright said, he had had conversations with various farmers on this subject, and they all declared that the plan was of no value whatever. Legislative interference with the corn trade must, he was convinced, be productive of harm.

Sir J. Shelley thought the measure would not only not be beneficial, but that it was calculated to do a great deal of injury.

Mr. Whitmore said he had been obliged to thresh out his corn immediately, and carry it to market to prevent it from mouldering on his hands; and this had been the case with most of the farmers in his neighbourhood. The corn of the last year would be perfectly unsaleable after the next harvest, and the measure would consequently be wholly inoperative.

Mr. D. Gilbert thought the proposition would be a violation of sound principle, without any corresponding benefit. None but bad corn would be warehoused, if it were adopted.

Mr. Cripps could not look forward with satisfaction to the operation of this plan. The little farmer had, in a great measure, got rid of his property; and, therefore, with respect to him, it was too late. The damaged corn could not be dried, and kept in warehouses without great loss in weight and in other respects. He was quite persuaded that they could not get one without a fixed and permanent protection.

Sir E. Knatchbull thought, that the agricultural interest, were much indebted to ministers, and especially to the noble marquis. He appealed to the agricultural committee, and asked them, what situation they would find themselves in, if in this instance their recommendation and plan of relief should be thrown overboard. In justice to his constituents, himself, and the noble lord, he felt himself called upon to support the resolution.

Mr. Wodehouse did not think he should act right if he were to leave the noble lord in the lurch; although he regretted that a measure less exceptionable in its principle had not been brought forward. This measure, however, came a little too late, and was accompanied with so much doubt and hesitation, that many would be prevented from adopting it.

Mr. Bankes said, he had been of opinion that government should directly interfere and expend one million in purchasing corn. The present measure was a modification of that plan, but much less efficacious. As a general principle he was ready to allow the impropriety of such interference; but in circumstances of particular exigency, relief should be given according to the nature of the exigency.

The Marquis of Londonderry said, his hon. friend the member for Norfolk had been so good as to say that he would not leave him in the lurch. His hon. friend should rather take care that he did not leave himself in the lurch. He certainly had no disposition to ruin the cause; but he had given his reasons for not supporting the measure in the committee. Let the saddle, however, be placed on the right horse. When he saw the measure so tamely supported by some members of the committee, and when he heard nothing in support of it from others, who ought to regard it with parental feelings, he was not in any degree disposed to press the resolution. If other gentlemen did not raise their voices in its behalf, he begged leave to give notice that he would not divide the committee upon it.

Mr. Irving said, that the reluctance and diffidence he always felt in addressing the House, was his reason for not having before avowed, that he was the originator of the measure, and offered such reasons as he had given for this measure in the committee above stairs. He still continued to think it was calculated to be useful, although it had been ridiculed so severely by his hon. and learned friend. He had not proposed this measure in ignorance of the true principles of political economy. It was one of many expedients; and he had supported it as the least exceptionable. He was not more responsible for it than the committee. It was the measure of the committee, not his. He thought the scheme could be carried into effect without danger; and it was the duty of the House to adopt any measure which had the least tendency to relieve a class at once so important and so distressed as the agriculturists.

Mr. T. Wilson considered this the only practical measure which had been recommended by the committee. It was asked, what advantage could be proposed by advancing prices? The answer was—they would encourage farmers to keep in cultivation lands which would otherwise be thrown out of cultivation. The merchants had received advances in consequence of their goods lying by them. What danger was there in making similar advances to farmers? He was astonished to hear it said, that it was too late now, for that one half the benefit of it was lost. In God's name, was not the other half worth saving? We had now had a series of good harvests, and it was not unnatural to suppose that a bad harvest was not far distant. Therefore, they ought to accept this, the best measure the committee had offered to them. It was desirable to have cheap bread; yet they must not, for the sake of cheap bread, let land be thrown out of cultivation, and the cultivators be sent to the poor-house.

Mr. Brougham said, he would be the last man who would be slow to interfere for the relief of agriculture at the expense of principle. Least of all would he be slow to interfere thus in their case, when he well knew that general principles had not been attended to with respect to the other classes. He alluded to times when the mercantile, the colonial, and the manufacturing interests, had been suffering, and the House had interfered for their relief. Though there was this material difference, that in those cases there had been no deposit. It was clear the measure could only tend to raise the price, or keep it up when raised. Now, the persons who had the most need of relief were not those who had grain to sell, and who could take advantage of the high prices: they were those whom distress had already forced to sell all their produce for the payment of their rents; and, as they would have to come into the market to purchase produce for the maintenance of themselves and their labourers, that would add to their distress. He would ask one question. How was the corn to be protected in the dépôts? Could that be done without expense. The farmers were called upon to give their property for the money which was to be advanced to them; but the fact was, that they would soon have no property to give, and thus, for the repayment of the loan, they would be exposed to a hardship far more severe than any which they now felt —an extent in aid—the only misery from which they were now free. For these considerations, as well as for others which had been stated, he would oppose the measure as mischievous, as at best ineffective in its result, and painful in its consequences.

The Marquis of Londonderry said, that after the discussion which had taken place, and seeing that the resolution was not supported by those who brought it forward, he would with the leave of the House withdraw it.

The resolution was withdrawn. The chairman then reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again to-morrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, May 7.

NEWSPAPERS—GOVERNMENT ADVERTISEMENTS.] Mr. Hume said, that during the last session the House had made an order for a return of the number of advertisements from the different public offices inserted in the English newspapers. That return had not yet been made. It appeared, that some of the papers published in London greatly exceeded their cotemporaries in circulation. Now, it was evident, that if the intention of government in inserting advertisements in the newspapers was to give publicity to them, that object would be best effected by sending them to those papers which had the most extensive circulation. "The Times" had a greater circulation than any other two papers in England; and yet to it the government did not send one advertisement; whilst in other papers, which published only a few hundreds, they inserted the same advertisements over and over again. He trusted that the same system would not be introduced here which had grown up in Ireland, where some newspapers had been set on foot solely with the view of making profit by the government advertisements. Government advertisements had been inserted in some favoured Irish papers, two years and seven months after the transactions to which they related had been settled. It was shameful that government should use the public press in this manner. He had the authority of ministers themselves for stating that they refused to give the public the benefit which they would derive from having their advertisements inserted in "The Times" and one or two other papers. He concluded by moving, for the renewal of the order of last session, for a return of the amount of all sums paid to different English newspapers, for advertisements of all descriptions, from public offices.—Ordered.

FEES OF CONSULS.] Mr. Hume rose to move for certain returns respecting the fees of British consuls abroad. It would be admitted, that the officers appointed to superintend, our commerce and protect our commercial interests abroad, should be men acquainted with our commercial relations—men of experience, diligence and activity; and that it should be a duty with the government at home to make such regulations as would prevent the support of the consuls from becoming a vexatious burthen to the trade of the country. It was, however, curious to observe, that, though the greatest commercial nation in the world, we were almost the only one which had not established a regular system of fees to be charged by our consuls. The consequence was, that in every port they were different, in some very high, and in many instances they were most arbitrary. From this he would except the Brazils, where the fees were regulated by special act of parliament. In the United States there was a regular system of fees established. In France, also, the charges of the consuls were fixed. Some countries paid their consuls a fixed salary, and no fees were charged as in France, except some small ones upon the exhibition of the ships papers. These charges to an American ship would not exceed two dollars, whilst a British ship, of the same tonnage, would perhaps be 5*l.* or 6*l.*, and this charge varied according to the port; so that it was scarcely possible for any merchant to know, except, perhaps, the ship was proceeding to some part of Holland where the charges were well known, what would be the amount of charges to which she would be liable. The remedy which he should suggest would be, that government should fix a regular scale of moderate fees, and then give to every British vessel, at her clearing out from a custom-house in this country, a printed table of the fees charged by the consul in the port to which she was bound. He had some extracts from bills of fees charged by British consuls in several ports, from which the House would perceive, the difference in the charges and the total want of system. An English vessel of 150 tons paid consul's fees, for the exhibition of her papers, at Hamburgh, 1*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* At Rotterdam she would have to pay the same; but let her go to Rochelle, and she would have to pay 5*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.*; at Bordeaux, 8*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*; at Naples, 4*l.* 8*s.* 10*d.*; at Leghorn, 3*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.*; at Genoa, 3*l.* 15*s.*, and so on; the charge varying almost in every port, but exorbitantly high in all. A small vessel of 60 or 70 tons belonging to England, taking in a cargo of fruit at St. Michael's, would have to pay three guineas, whilst an American vessel of the same size, would only pay two dollars. So that, instead of the fees being less in proportion to the great number of mercantile vessels which the British navy have, they were greater. Besides these sums coming in a vexatious way from the pockets of individuals, the country was burthened with a large sum for the salaries of many of those consuls. The sum paid under this head in 1792 was 10,000*l.* In the present year it was 30,000*l.*; but he would not go at that time into the details on this part, nor would he stop to inquire whether it was just that we should be paying 1,000*l.* a year to a consul at Venice, where there were but a few British ships in the year. He put it to the House, whether it would not be more advisable to have regular tables of moderate fees drawn up for each consul, than to go on with the present irregular system. He was very glad to learn that this subject had occupied the attention of the board of trade, and that a plan was in contemplation for lessening the present charges. After what had passed between the president of the board of trade and himself on this subject, he should not have thought it necessary to have brought the question before the House; but he found that when questions of this nature were under the consideration of the government, they often remained year after year without any thing effectual being done. One word as to the selection of individuals to fill those offices. It was not necessary for him to show that such care should be taken in the selection as would place none in those situations whose character were not most respectable. There were, he was sorry to observe, some of this description among our consuls, vice-consuls, and others, who, from their former character and conduct becoming known in the places to which they were sent, were obliged to leave the situation. He would not now name individuals. He hoped the noble lord would have no objection to a return, showing how long consuls-general and consuls had been absent from their several situations since 1815. Many persons looked upon those offices as appointments for life, and that it was only necessary to go out to take possession, and then, obtaining leave of absence, to remain away for years. It was known that a vast addition to the number of our consuls had taken place in 1815. This made a considerable addition to the amount of fees, but it contributed very little to facilitate business. He did not see what necessity there was for giving a consul-general in the Netherlands upwards of 3,000*l.* a year. Another at Paris had a very large salary; and there, he must suppose, the business could not be very heavy, for the office was opened only from eleven to one o'clock. The hon. member concluded by moving for "a return of the table or rate of fees charged by British consuls-general, consuls, or vice-consuls, from British shipping, or British property in ports abroad, in the years 1792 and 1821; also, by what authority such charges were imposed." His second motion would be, for "a return of the periods each consul-general, consul or vice-consul, have been absent from their station in each year, since 1815."

The Marquis of Londonderry allowed that the subject was one of great importance. It had for some time been under the consideration of the board of trade, who were endeavouring to frame a law to regulate the fees of all the consular establishments. Although the consular system was in his (lord L.'s) department, yet it was always administered under the advice and recommendation of the board of trade. It was certainly highly desirable to arrive at some equalization of the fees, or rather, that the individuals in question should be paid by salary, and not by fees. The theory was excellent, but the practice was difficult; for to carry the theory into practice, it would be necessary very much to enlarge the present allowance for salaries, which was only 30,000*l*. It had been asked, why government did not select a respectable merchant of the place in which it was necessary to have a consul, and appoint him? In many cases that had been done with respect to vice-consuls. There was considerable danger, however, of such appointments being perverted to purposes of private emolument. The board of trade were preparing a bill on the subject, and it was his wish that it should be brought in as soon as possible. With respect to the attendance of consuls at their respective stations, he felt no difficulty in furnishing all the information in his power, and should be very happy to suggest any thing that could forward the object the hon. gentleman had in view; while, at the same time, he should feel happy in profiting by any suggestion which the hon. gentleman might throw out upon it. He would now advert to another topic, connected with this question, to which the hon. member had called his attention on a former evening. He alluded to the complaints alleged against Mr. Chamberlain, the consul-general at Rio Janeiro; and he could assure the House, that the charges made against that gentleman were without foundation. The amount of his fees could not be considered too great, when the very high prices of provisions were taken into calculation. As to his general conduct, Mr. Chamberlain was seven or eight years abroad, during four of which he acted as Charge d'Affaires at the court of the Brazils, during very arduous times; and in that capacity conducted himself with so much ability, that he (lord L.) should have considered him a valuable acquisition to the diplomatic corps of the country, but that he was unwilling to make a transfer from one branch to another. After residing eight years abroad, Mr. Chamberlain returned home in a very bad state of health, and though his situation was considered so very emolumentary, yet he would have been glad to have accepted the situation of consul-general any where in Europe, rather than return to the Brazils. He did, however, as no opening was made for him in Europe, return. With respect to the amount of fees, they had increased at Rio Janeiro in consequence of the great increase of trade, and they had been three times under revision in this country. It was said that trade was injured by the high rate of fees. He certainly would not sanction any thing which he thought would injure trade; but he believed it would be found, that so far from being injured, the trade in the port alluded to had very materially increased.

Mr. Robinson could assure the hon. member that he had never encountered greater difficulties in the investigation and arrangement of any subject, than in those of consular fees. They were at present levied by an authority, against which he certainly felt much disposed to protest. Conceiving it necessary that some more general and equal system should be adopted, he, with his noble friend, had gone through the various establishments with a view to ascertain how far it would be practicable to diminish the fees, and to substitute such moderate and properly apportioned salaries as would afford a sufficient remuneration. This, however, was a very difficult matter; as it became extremely difficult to ascertain the exact amount of duty performed and expense incurred by each individual. He (Mr. Robinson) trusted, however, that some arrangement might yet be made of a satisfactory nature, without any additional burthen on the country. Part of the expenses of the consuls was paid out of the civil list. The question was, how the difference between that which was allowed by the civil list, and that which it was necessary to allow, was to be made up? Whether by a tonnage on goods, or in what other way, he was not at present prepared to say.

The motion was agreed to.

Agricultural Distress Report.] On the order of the day for going into a committee of the whole House, to consider further of the Report of the Committee on Agricultural Distress,

Mr. Attwood rose and said, that, entertaining the opinions he did respecting the utter inefficacy, as to any advantage to the petitioners, from the resolutions intended to be moved in the committee, and more particularly in consequence of what they had witnessed the preceding night, he thought it his duty to call their attention to a consideration of the general subject before them, and of the whole system of measures which they had pursued on that subject. The House, he said, had then before it, bodies of petitioners more numerous and important, and a statement of distress more urgent than had been at any former period brought under their consideration; and the complaints of the petitioners were marked with a general and an increasing spirit of discontent and dissatisfaction, arising out of the manner in which their representations had been disposed of by the House. Undoubtedly, the whole of the measures they had adopted on this subject had been founded on a settled conviction previously entertained that the distress complained of was out of their power to relieve; but whilst the House acted on a conviction like that, it was essential, not only that they should be themselves well satisfied of its justice, but that their measures should, if it were possible, satisfy the petitioners themselves, that the evils they suffered were out of the reach of parliamentary interference; and the House ought, in his opinion, to be cautious that it did not add to the other calamities of the present times, that of causing to be withdrawn the confidence of the people from parliament, under the present circumstances in which they were placed. He would request them to review for a moment before they proceeded further, what their measures hitherto had been. They had delegated their duties to three successive committees, the proceedings of which committees had produced no other effect than this, that they had diverted the attention of three successive sessions of parliament from the adoption of any effectual measures of relief or even of effectual enquiry; and were they to be surprised if they found an opinion to prevail, that this, which had been the only result, had been the main object also for which these committees had been appointed? The House had limited on its appointment the powers of the first agricultural committee to an enquiry into a subject very trivial and unimportant in its nature, and which experience had shown to have been in no way materially connected with the distress of agriculture; and in that way one session of parliament had been lost without any steps taken that afforded the remotest prospect, either of relieving or satisfying the petitioners. They next appointed a second committee with instructions to enquire into the truth of the allegations which the petitioners had made, of the truth of which no doubt whatever was any where entertained; and when that enquiry was completed, and the committee had reported that the allegations submitted to the House had been confirmed to their fullest extent, there that proceeding dropped, nor had, up to the present day, any measure been proposed either by the committee itself, or by any other party founded on its report and enquiry. The House however proceeded to appoint a third agricultural committee, and the report of that committee was now before them; and a measure founded upon it had been introduced by his majesty's government, and by the party introducing it had been withdrawn, when it was perfectly certain that the House was disposed to adopt it. The further perseverance in measures such as these he earnestly deprecated. They fell very short of the duties which the House owed to the country; they were liable to be considered as little better than a mockery of the distress of the agricultural community; they were utterly unsuited to the exigence of the present time, and had lowered the character of parliament in the estimation and the confidence of the people, to an extent which had probably laid the foundation of great political changes. And with what prospect before them was it that they were now to resolve themselves into the committee which the noble marquis had proposed? Was it to see repeated the scene of the preceding night? Measures again proposed and again withdrawn? It was at least with the certainty before them of no measures being proposed there which could relieve the petitioners, and with an equal certainty of increasing their discontent.

In a condition of calamity and distress as extensive as that which now existed, no important measures of relief could be with advantage or even safety proposed, that were not founded on a comprehensive view and an accurate knowledge of the nature and origin, as well as the extent of the evils proposed to be removed. But the speech of the noble marquis who proposed the Speaker's leaving the chair, had afforded the House no light or exposition of that kind, and the three agricultural committees they had appointed, had failed altogether to arrive at any satisfactory explanation of the causes of agricultural distress. The evidence, indeed, which had been given before those committees was sufficiently distinct, intelligible, decisive and important, but it widely differed in all those qualities from the indistinct, vague, partial or trifling conclusions, which these committees had themselves formed upon that evidence. The evidence which the agricultural community had there given, formed a document as important, unless he greatly misunderstood its character, as had ever been submitted by a people to the consideration of a government, and the responsibility of the government was deeply involved, where a state of things existed such as was there described. The condition of calamity there exhibited to them, the wide extent of ruin there incontestibly established as existing, from whatever cause it had arisen, was altogether without example in any former period of the history of this country. The result of the agricultural evidence was, in short, this, that if no relief were given to agriculture, neither by raising the price of its produce, which he was convinced was altogether incompatible with the existence of the present standard of value they had adopted, nor by lessening the burthens under which it laboured, which they were told was equally inconsistent with the preservation of national faith and the support of the necessary expenses of the government; but whatever obstacles opposed themselves to that relief, the inevitable consequence before them was this, that if no relief were given, a great portion of the land at present under cultivation throughout the kingdom — that land from which the subsistence of the population was drawn — must of necessity and accompanied with a rapid deterioration in the cultivation of the remainder, and amidst the destruction of the farmers and labourers, be abandoned, and its cultivation be given up. It was from that soil, he again repeated, the cultivation of which rested on that precarious footing, that the subsistence of the people was drawn; and if there was any truth in the statements before them; if the whole body of evidence, taken before the agricultural committee of the last session, were not as full of deception and delusion, as the report accompanying it had been described to be, then the country had before it the prospect of dangers very different from those supposed to arise out of a redundance of agricultural produce; of dangers, the first approach of which they perhaps saw in Ireland, that country, overwhelmed, as they were lately told, with every species of destructive abundance, but where they now found, that the people were perishing with want. Under such circumstances, indeed, the necessity of measures, such as were now intended to be proposed, might be considered, in one point of view, manifest and apparent—not, indeed, as measures to relieve agriculture, for they had no such tendency; but to pave the way for the introduction of foreign grain, for that was their real object and tendency, and they had no other. And those measures might be considered necessary with reference to the general interest of the country, threatened with a danger which the present corn-laws would aggravate: but that the abandoning those laws should be brought forward under the pretence of relieving agriculture; that a committee appointed to consider of means for relieving agricultural distress, should have been made the organ and instrument of proposing measures like those; that was to redouble the inconsistency, absurdity, and confusion in which their proceedings had been hitherto involved. That proceeding, so originating, was a mockery of the distress of agriculture. The only consistent defence which could be set up for those measures, must rest on a determination to afford no relief to agriculture, but to prepare themselves to meet, as well as they were able, as well as the clashing interests of society permitted, the first and most immediate consequences of its abandonment.

It was important for them to consider to what cause, or to what combination of causes, as new necessarily, and as extraordinary as the effects produced, the state of things before them was to be ascribed. Were they content to believe, with the hon. member for Portarlington, that it had been occasioned by a few harvests more or less abundant, or by land better or worse cultivated; or by the transport of a little grain from one part of the kingdom to the other; by the transport of a little grain from Ireland, that country which had exported every thing, which had imported nothing; and which, when they came to examine its situation, instead of finding Ireland relieved by that export of grain, the importation of which had been represented as so destructive to the agriculture of England, they found Ireland in a condition still more ruinous and deplorable than their own. If importations from Ireland had occasioned, in any considerable degree, the distress of this country, whence had the distress of Ireland itself arisen? It was for the hon. member to reconcile that inconsistency in his theory. But causes such as those were of common occurrence and operation. No condition of national prosperity was exempt from evils, if evils they were, such as those. They might occasion partial and trivial depression, but were capable of interrupting only for a moment the career of general prosperity; and had never yet occasioned a demand, or necessity for land to be permanently abandoned, or for cultivation to be permanently depressed. The hon. member for Portarlington had, indeed, referred to two other causes, somewhat, it would be admitted, more extraordinary in their nature, but according to that hon. gentleman's estimation, very trivial and unimportant in their operation, and they formed but a small part of his system. These two causes were, first, the alteration effected in the value of the currency; and secondly, the enormous burthen of taxation. With respect to the first of these, the alteration recently effected in our monied system, and the manner in which that alteration had affected monied prices, and had occasioned undoubtedly the distress of agriculture, as far as agricultural distress was occasioned, by the low price of its produce; into that question he would not now enter, because there was then before the House the notice of a motion, on which the nature of that operation, its extent and effects, would be more appropriately discussed. But with respect to the effect of taxation on agriculture, and the share which those burthens had in producing the difficulties under which the cultivators of the soil laboured, to that subject he would now call the attention of the House. The member for Portarlington was not singular in his opinion as to the trifling operation of our taxes on cultivation. That opinion was maintained by others; and in a tone of confidence which did not scruple to cast imputations on the motives, or opinions of those who thought, as he confessed he did, very differently on that subject. They were told that taxation was no cause of the distress of agriculture, because a taxation, still heavier in amount than the present, had existed at a period when no agricultural distress accompanied it. They had been told, also, that the distress of agriculture was not to be ascribed to taxation on another ground; that it was the low price of agricultural produce which had occasioned that distress, and that it was not in the nature of taxation to produce low prices. And, undoubtedly, there was some truth in both those assertions; but they were both founded on extremely partial and narrow views of that subject. Certainly, during a very considerable period of the late war, and again, at another period, that of the year 1818, as high a nominal amount of taxation had existed as the present; and had been accompanied with no agricultural difficulties, or embarrassments. But if they carried their observations one step further, they would arrive at a period when low prices also existed, and when low prices also were accompanied with no agricultural distress. The prices of the present time were in no respect lower than the prices which preceded the late war, and that was a period of great and general prosperity. There was as much reason, therefore, for maintaining that low prices were not the cause of distress, as for maintaining that this distress was not occasioned by high taxes. Both opinions were partly true. It was not low prices alone. It was not high taxes alone. It was low prices and high taxes joined, that agriculture was unable to support. That was a state of things, a combination of circumstances which had never before existed in the country, except during one short and calamitous period, during the years 1815 and part of 1816, and then their effects were precisely similar to those now experienced. It was the taxes of the late war, combined with the prices that preceded it; the taxation of the paper standard; the prices of the metal standard; those taxes which could only have been imposed by the agency of their late paper money; those prices which could alone be sustained by the monied system they had now resorted to. It was the attempt to discharge debts and maintain taxes, in a species of money in which it was found utterly impossible to contract or impose them. That was the attempt of the legislature; the condition of the country was the evidence of its wisdom and success. Let the House consider what the full extent of that operation had been. Urged by the necessities of the late war; by the necessity of supplies which they found it impossible to obtain in money of the ancient value; they abandoned the old metal standard of value—they substituted in its place a paper money not convertible into gold—they depreciated that money, in other words—they raised all prices as estimated by it. In that money so depreciated, in those prices so raised, they imposed taxes and contracted debts, which it would have been impossible by any other means to have contracted or imposed, and having proceeded in that course for nearly the fourth part of a century, in which period not a year passed in which they had not added to their debts and taxes, an amount which never could have been raised in money of the old value, they proceeded at the end of that period, to withdraw from that enormous accumulation of taxation and debt, the means by which they had enabled the country to support it, the means by which they had induced the people to submit to it, and having completed that monstrous operation, they had left the country to struggle with its difficulties as it could, and appeared to be actuated by no other principle than an endeavour to avoid, if it were possible, the responsibility of their measures, and to evade from one session of parliament to another, the demands of the people for relief.

Could an operation like that before them take place, and no extensive derangement, no difficulties of an extraordinary nature follow? Was not the present condition of the country as much without example as an operation, such as that before them, had been before unheard of? When had it before been heard of in this country at any time, or indeed, in any country, of a necessity for abandoning the cultivation of the soil, and when had an operation like that been ever before gravely proposed as a means of relief? But it was said that cultivation had been recently extended and improved. Was that a new state of things in this country? An extended, an improved cultivation had been the common condition of the country from its earliest period; and the duty and the interest of that House, it had been hitherto held, was to promote and encourage that improvement, and to protect the interest of those who had embarked in undertakings of that nature. It was now for the first time that it had been heard in that House, that they had a different duty to perform; that their task now was to arrest the progress of cultivation and improvement, to force the stream of improvement backward, and to adopt measures, or to witness their operation, by which some of the most anciently cultivated districts in the kingdom were to be abandoned, and its richest beggared and reduced. He well knew that it had been said that it was land that had been recently inclosed, land recently and rashly cultivated, that it was now necessary to abandon. But all the evidence they had before them was in opposition to that assertion. The whole evidence before them went to this, that land which had been the most anciently cultivated, was amongst that which must be the first abandoned; that land which had existed in cultivation for centuries, and which, during the whole of that time had never failed to yield wages to the labourer, and profit to the farmer, and rent to the landlord, without all of which cultivation could not proceed, was now incapable of yielding that return, and for that state of things, without any former example, he denied that any other explanation could be given than this; that they had burthened this land with a cost of production equally unexampled also, and that it was that increased cost of production which the land was unable to support. But they had other alternatives before them than that of abandoning its cultivation. They had first to reduce the burthens by which it was oppressed. They had first to retread those steps by which they had lowered the price of its produce; and it was not till every other means had been attempted, till all other measures had been exhausted, that they were called on to yield to that last and dangerous alternative, that of abandoning at once the soil, and the population it supports; an operation full of all the elements, not of suffering and calamity only, but full of all the elements of disorder, convulsion, and change, which they deceived themselves, if they believed that it was in the province of political economy to calculate.

He could not indeed, but consider it as somewhat surprising, that in the present day, when that new school, or new science as it was called, of political economy, was supposed so greatly to flourish, and was certainly so widely extended; that in that House, experienced undoubtedly, in matters of taxation, beyond any assembly that had ever existed on the earth, doubts should be found to exist as to what the effect of taxation was: and whether it were capable even in its excess, for it never could be excessive in any country at any time, if it were not in excess in this country at the present time, of materially affecting or deranging the great interests of society. They saw the people labouring under unexampled difficulty: they saw them oppressed with unexampled burthens; but they refused to believe that one of these had arisen out of, or was materially connected with the other. The hon. member for Portarlington—(and if he referred so repeatedly to the opinion of that hon. gentleman, it was because he was the only individual of equal authority, who had given any consistent exposition at all of the causes of agricultural distress, and he thought that the agricultural interest was on that account indebted to the hon. gentleman, at least, for his intentions, although he (Mr. Attwood) did not agree with him, in scarcely any one of the opinions he entertained; and was convinced that those opinions had produced extensive mischief and were calculated to occasion still more);—that hon. member had taken a survey of the condition of agriculture, and he found it suffering under great embarrassments; he had found that corn could not be produced in this country, at the present time, for the same monied cost at which it had been formerly produced here; and at which it could now be produced in the countries around them; and what was the explanation that he gave of the causes of this change? He told them that to feed an augmenting population, they had been driven to the cultivation of inferior soils; that those soils could be alone cultivated by the application of additional labour; that they yielded a smaller surplus produce: that none but a higher monied price could be a remunerative price for corn so grown; that this was the main source of the difficulties of agriculture, and that the relief from those difficulties was to be found in abandoning the cultivation of those poorer soils. But as this was the main ground on which the whole system of the hon. member rested, he would beg to state his opinions in his own words, as they were found in a pamphlet recently printed by him on that subject. [Mr. Attwood then read from a pamphlet of Mr. Ricardo]—"The words remunerative price, are meant to denote the price at which corn can be raised, paying all charges.—It follows, from this definition, that in proportion as a country is driven to the cultivation of poorer lands for the support of an increasing population, the price of corn to be remunerative must rise. It appears, then, that in the progress of society, when no importation takes place we are obliged constantly to have recourse to worse soils to feed an augmenting population, and with every step of our progress the price of corn must rise." This was the hon. gentleman's theory, by which, as applied to this country, he explained the cause of the rise of corn since 1793, and why it was, that corn could, not now be grown in this country at a low price. Now he (Mr. Attwood) was convinced, that there was no foundation, in fact, for the assertions here maintained, and on which this system was founded. He believed, that the fact thus assumed was directly the reverse of that which did in reality exist; that, so far from the average quality of land becoming poorer as population and wealth advanced, it became richer; and he had no doubt, but the average quality of the land under cultivation in this country, at the period of its highest prices, and of the greatest prosperity of agriculture, at the period prior to the close of the late war—that the average quality of land was then more fertile; that it produced more corn on an average by the acre, and with less positive labour; that it yielded a greater surplus produce, than at any former period. It was not true, that the cultivation of any country, proceeded in the manner, and according to the calculation here assumed. It was not the best land, which was first cultivated; nor the worst land which was last cultivated. This was determined in a great measure by other circumstances; by the rights of proprietorship, by locality, by enterprize, by the peculiarities of feudal tenure, its remains still existing; by roads, canals, the erection of towns, of manufactories; all those and other obstacles of a similar nature interfered with the calculations of the hon. member; and bad land when it was once brought into cultivation, and subjected to the operations of agriculture; by draining, by watering, by the application of various substances, frequently became the best land, and was afterwards cultivated at the least expense. The committee on waste lands of 1795, calculated that there then remained unenclosed, in England, Scotland, and Wales, a million of acres of land capable of conversion into water meadows; the most profitable of all land; and the whole unenclosed land of England and Wales, was, by that committee, calculated at only nine million acres. In proof of our having been recently driven to cultivate bad soil, the hon. member had produced from the agricultural evidence, instances of land yielding no more than twelve bushels by the acre; but if he had directed his inquiries to the produce of land at those earlier stages of cultivation and population, when, if he was right, the people were cheaply fed from rich soils, he would have found the fact to have been, that a greater proportion of the land then cultivated, yielded no more than six bushels, than now of land that yielded twelve. But the statement of the hon. member permitted this question to be placed on a footing that admitted of no further dispute. He had referred to prices. He said, that the constantly increasing poverty of the land to which a people must have recourse in their progress in society and population, would be marked by a constantly advancing price of corn, accompanying every step of that progress. Of the quality of land at different periods, whether it was better or worse, it would be difficult to furnish decisive evidence: it was different with respect to the price of its produce. That was capable of being ascertained. The fact was, that the price of corn never had risen, in the way the hon. gentleman had supposed. It had been for about a century and a half, prior to the late war, that money of the present standard and value had existed in this country. Dr. Smith had estimated, that the increased supply of gold from the American mines had ceased about 1640, and from that time, therefore, to the late war, the present standard might be taken to have continued. In the whole of that long period, no advance had taken place in the price of corn. The average price of corn, had been as high at the commencement of that period, as at its close. If they took the price of corn for 50 years ending with 1794, the average price for that fifty years was 39*s.* 3*d.* a quarter (he took that amount from the report of the corn committee of 1813), and the average price of corn for 50 years ending 1696 was 39*s.* 4*d.*, a difference of 1*d.* in that whole century. That had been a period of improving cultivation, of increasing population; when, if the hon. member was right, we must have been driven to poorer soils, when a rise in the produce of land, must of necessity have followed, and when, of course, that rise of price would be found marked in the tables. But corn had not risen in price, in that period; or in any other period, as the hon. member imagined, or for the causes he ascribed. It was a most important fact, and he mentioned it to the House more particularly because it explained the causes of the extraordinary advance in agricultural prices during the war—that no rise in the monied price of corn—he, of course, meant no permanent and general rise,—had ever taken place in this country, from the period of its earliest cultivation, down to the commencement of the late war; except on one occasion; and that was on the occasion of an event, of no less magnitude, than the discovery of the new world, and the consequent introduction into Europe and this country, of the long accumulated produce of the mines of that great continent. There was no fact in history, better attested than that. The tables of prices of those former times had been investigated by Smith, with the accuracy which distinguished that great writer, and the conclusion he drew from them had never been since contested. Those tables exhibited the fact, that from the earliest periods of which the prices had been recorded—from the days of the Norman invasion, down to the days of the Spanish armada,—no rise whatever had taken place, in the monied price of corn in this country; on the contrary, it had regularly fallen, the price of corn had been 20*s.* at the commencement of that period, and had fallen to 10*s.* at its close. Ten shillings continued to be the price of a quarter of wheat, at the beginning of the reign of Elizabeth; and then it experienced a rise to four times its former price, it rose to 40*s.*; and that rise was permanent; and it was final;

it was common to this country with all Europe, and the price of corn in Europe, had never since risen beyond the price it then attained. It had never risen beyond that price in this country, until we abandoned at the commencement of the late war, the precious metals as our standard of price, and having adopted a species of money, over the amount and extent of which we had full power; we poured that money, into circulation with increased abundance, in the same manner in which the precious metals, had been poured into circulation in the reign of Elizabeth, and produced by that means similar effects. No advance in the progress of society, no increase of population, had ever yet occasioned an advance in the monied price of corn. Nothing but a fall in the value of money, nothing but its increased abundance, had ever produced that effect. Let the House compare these facts with the rise in corn during the late war, and they would want no other argument to show them what was the cause of that advance, and if any further evidence were wanting it would be found in this circumstance, that corn was now again fallen to its former monied price. But if their land then was not become inferior in quality, if it were not cultivated with greater labour, whence was it, that corn could not be now produced, as cheaply as at former times? Adam Smith, the greatest of authorities on the subject of political economy, would tell them, that the operation of excessive taxation on agriculture, was precisely similar to that which the member for Portarlington traced to an imaginary poverty of the land. The effect of taxation on agriculture, as explained by Dr. Smith, might be stated in these words; that it was an effect similar to that which would be produced,—by an increased barrenness of the soil; by an increased inclemency of the sky. They arrived then at the same result, through the burthens of their taxation, which they knew well to exist, as that which the hon. member would explain, by an imaginary barrenness of the soil, which had, in fact, no existence. And, in what, then, consisted the difference between their own agriculture and that of those hostile or rival nations to which they were referred for their supply? That the land of those countries was more fertile, better cultivated, or yielded a greater surplus produce? None of these circumstances were the case, the advantage those soils possessed over our agriculture was this, that we had not been able to reach them, with the curse of our taxation. Those soils we had protected—indeed; our own agriculture was burthened for their protection, but no government had been able to tax them. Whence this absence of taxation in those countries? Had those governments experienced no necessity, or were they more moderate than our own? They had resorted to us in their necessity, and had been assisted by burthens imposed on our own agriculture; that agriculture which, having burthened for their protection, we would now abandon for their gain; and in pursuit of visionary theories and distant and doubtful advantage. The very absence of taxation in those countries, and its existence in our own, was of itself evidence of no greater surplus produce, and that the only disadvantage under which our agriculture laboured, as compared with that of foreigners, was, the amount of its burthens.

He would recall to the attention of the House, what the detailed operation of taxation on agriculture necessarily was. The operation of taxation was this; that wherever any certain number of individuals, were employed in cultivating the soil, or in any other branch of productive industry—the effect of taxation was this, to place a certain other number of individuals to be supported by the labour of the former; and to draw their support from the produce of that labour, before the labourer was himself permitted, to taste of the fruit of his own industry. As they proceeded step by step, in that course, increasing the number of those who, by means of taxation, subsisted on the produce of the labour of others, they arrived at length at that point, when sufficient would not remain, for the support of the labourers themselves, and of those by whose capital they were employed. Then it was, that production and cultivation, becoming more difficult as taxation proceeded; became impossible in its excess; and that was the point at which the condition of the country evinced that they had now arrived. But if the ultimate effect of taxation was thus certain, its immediate operation, through the medium of money in which taxes were collected and paid, was still more visible and manifest. Every monied tax on the necessaries of life, must be paid out of the wages of labour, and increased the monied cost of cultivation and production. As they proceeded in this course, they were led at length to that point, where the monied cost of the cultivation of land, exceeded the monied price of its produce; for the monied price of the produce of land, was regulated by the value of that money in which it was estimated. Then cultivation became impossible—then production ceased—it was attended with loss: that was the condition of difficulty to which they were arrived; and it was in that condition that they were told of remedies, which were in fact no other than the evils of which they complained, when they were told of relief to be found in abandoning—not indeed the taxes; but the land which they oppressed,—of diminishing, not the magnitude of the burthen, but the strength by which it was to be borne. Taxation had no power, to whatever extent carried, to effect that rise in prices so necessary to its support. In that the hon. member for Portarlington, he was satisfied, would agree with him. He would ask this question, whether if their currency had still continued on the footing of the war currency, and they had doubled all existing taxes by direct imposition; if they had by positive enactment made their 60 millions of taxes 120 millions; would that additional taxation have raised the price of corn? Not one farthing, if unaccompanied with the issue of additional paper money. The burthens and difficulties of agriculture would have been doubled; its prices have remained stationary. This then was the condition of difficulty to which they were arrived.

But if that was the nature of taxation, let them consider, then, to what extent taxation had been virtually increased, since that period, when agriculture had flourished in spite of the burthens which it endured. That increase must be admitted to be to that extent, whatever it was, into which the value of the currency had been raised. The extent of that alteration was now generally admitted to be 25 per cent. That estimate of 25 per cent was formed on a calculation, drawn from the price of gold; but the hon. member for Portarlington, who had chiefly insisted on that mode of calculation, had never hitherto been induced to explain, why gold, taken as a commodity, in the market, by the ounce, was to be considered as a better criterion than any other commodity; than hemp, or tallow, or cotton, or any other indifferent commodity, for the purpose of estimating the rate of a general rise, or a general fall of prices. But if that hon. member had failed to explain why gold was a better criterion, than any other commodity, he (Mr. Attwood) would show why it was undoubtedly a worse. In a rise of prices occasioned by the exclusive use of paper money, the great demand for bullion, that of circulation, at once ceased. The bullion market would then receive supplies from that quarter, from whence had previously arisen its principal demand. In the same manner when a metal standard was again resorted to, a new demand for gold would at once take place, precisely at that period, when there would exist, in consequence of a contraction in the general amount of money, a reduced demand for all other commodities. Gold bullion, consequently would be of all commodities, the last and the least to rise, in a general rise of prices, occasioned by the depreciation of paper money; and the last and the least to fall, in a general fall of prices occasioned by the restoration of that depreciation; and it would therefore of necessity prove the most faulty of all measures, by which such general rise, and general fall, of prices could be estimated. But if gold could not be used as a proper criterion to estimate the increased value of the currency, to what commodity or measure were they to resort? Undoubtedly, when the question was, to determine what was the increased pressure of taxation upon agriculture, occasioned by the change in the value of the currency; the most proper commodities to determine the extent of that change, were those in which agriculture was principally interested, corn and cattle. The price of corn during the last five years of the war, that period in which the last and the principal burthens of taxation had been imposed, was 107*s.* a quarter, for the average of that five years. The price of wheat was now 53*s.* a quarter; and the price of cattle had fallen in an equal degree. The pressure of taxation upon agriculture, therefore, had been doubled. Was not the farmer now compelled to pay the same amount of taxes out of every 50*s.* that he received, as he was formerly required to pay out of every 100*s.*? Do not the parties for whose benefit these taxes are paid, find that they now draw for every given amount of these taxes, a portion of agricultural produce, double that which they drew when these taxes were imposed? What became then of that preposterous argument which would represent that the taxes are no cause of the distress of agriculture, because agriculture had at one time flourished under taxes nominally as high as the present? What weight was due to the argument of the member for Portarlington, of 10 per cent additional taxation upon agriculture, arising out of the change in the currency; and his calculation of 4 millions and 2 millions, thus added to its burthens; and that sums like these were not sufficient to account for the ruin of the whole landed interest and agricultural community? These measures were not to be so estimated. Taxation had been doubled. During these last eight years in which they had been engaged in reforming, as they were pleased to term it, their currency; when they came to examine the result of their labours it would be found, that in that disastrous and dismal period, in which they had been so occupied, they had doubled the monstrous amount of 60 millions of annual taxes in their pressure on the agricultural community, and it was in the midst of that terrible operation, without example in the history of governments and of nations, and of the ruin and destruction which it had scattered throughout the different orders and interests of the state, that that, and the other House of Parliament, had been found discussing what the effect of taxation was; doubting whether taxation was in any way materially connected with the interests of those, by whom the taxes were paid; and turning to the price of gold, as it appeared in their tables, by the ounce, they at length reluctantly admitted that their measures had increased taxation on an agriculture which they had ruined, to an extent which was to be estimated by that absurd calculation; and by the price of a commodity with which agriculture had no concern.

Was this estimate of the increase of taxation too high? Not if the present prices of agricultural produce continued. It was upon that, that the question depended. Indisputably, at the present moment, the increased pressure of taxation upon agriculture, was as great as he had assumed; and if the present prices were permanent, that increase of burthen was permanently established. If that new standard of value which they had adopted should prove incapable of sustaining (as he was convinced it was incapable), any higher rate of agricultural prices than the present, then the act of parliament by which it was established, was an act by which they had at once doubled, all the weight of 60 millions of annual taxes, and of 800 millions of permanent debt, in their pressure on the agricultural community. Of how much importance, therefore, had it been that the House should have inquired, as it never had inquired, before it established that new standard, or old standard, whichever it might be called, what its character and probable operation was, and what were the effects to be expected from it; what measure of value it was calculated to give; what rate of prices to support? It was not through the medium of the public burthen and debts only, that that measure affected the landed interest; its influence was equally destructive, in its operation on all the private engagements, with which the landed interest was concerned. Let them consider the case of that individual landowner, which had been recently mentioned in the House by a noble lord, the member for Tavistock. That individual, as he understood the noble lord, possessed an estate, which produced a rent in the high prices of the paper money of 20,000*l.* a year: and it was burthened with rent-charges, annuities, fortunes to relations, and other outgoings, founded in those high prices also, to the extent of 10,000*l.* a year; and the rent had now fallen it appeared, or must fall, one-half. If this change had been effected by the alteration in their monied system; if these prices and rents were to be permanent; they had confiscated by act of parliament every shilling of the fortune of this individual; they had divested him of all property in his own estate, however long his ancestors had possessed it, however prudently he had himself enjoyed it: they had left him no longer any interest by law in any portion of the land of this country, except what he might derive as a pauper under the poor-laws. That was the violent manner in which their measures had affected the rights of property; whether to that degree or not, and to what degree was the only question that admitted even of a dispute. It was most important, therefore, to inquire, what that degree was, how far these violent measures were to be carried, who was to be affected by them, and who could consider himself and his property safe. And on that point, as to what the rate of prices was which their present money was capable of sustaining, and what measure of value their standard was capable of giving; on that subject he would not occupy the attention of the House, with any abstruse disquisitions. They had a better, and more certain guide before them, the obvious guide of experience, and he would refer to the information which that gave them. The money now again established, the standard of value adopted, was not new: it was that which had formerly existed, and he requested the House to consider what its former operation had been. The most extensive information before the House, on the subject of former prices, was given in the report of the corn committee of 1813, to which he had before referred. That report had given the prices of corn for a century, prior to the late war, and had divided those prices into average periods of five years; for corn, which fluctuated in price from one year to another more than any other commodity, was more uniform and permanent in its price, than any commodity, the produce of the labour of man, for any average period, of even a small number of years. The highest price, then, which appeared in that report for any average of five years was 49*s.* 9*d.* for a quarter of corn; and that price took place at the commencement of the last century. That was the highest average price, which in money of that weight and fineness in which corn was now again estimated, had ever been given in this country, or that had ever been given in any other country, in such money, for a quarter of corn. It had been the price of corn also, as he had before mentioned, for half a century, before this table commenced. The price of corn began with the origin of their present standard, now nearly two centuries back at about 47*s.*, as the highest average price for corn; and it ended at about 47*s.* as its highest average price, at the commencement of the late war. And, what reason was there for believing that a standard of value, which for so long a period had continued so uniform in its operation: which amidst all the changes which the country had experienced, of war, of peace, of taxation, of debt, of over-production, or scanty production, which had, amidst every kind of change, maintained so invariable a hold on the price of corn, would now assume a different character, and give a different estimate. It was for those who maintained that opinion, to show the grounds on which they supported it. That had not hitherto been attempted. Would it be contended that the precious metals had become more abundant, that they existed in greater quantities than before? That would appear in a rise of prices common to this country, and to the continent at large. The prices of corn on the continent, and in this country, as long as they were estimated alike, in money composed of the precious metals, had always nearly corresponded. From 30*s.* to 40*s.* of our money a quarter had been the price of corn in France for nearly the last two centuries, there had been a regular correspondence between those prices and their own. Those were the prices of France at this time. There had been no material rise of prices in France during the whole of the late war, that period marked by such an extraordinary rise in this country. France had not altered the character of its money. Prices had not materially risen there, they had not, consequently, materially fallen. And was it possible that any considerable alteration in the relative value of corn and the precious metals, could take place in this country, when none took place in the countries around them? That gold could fall in value in one country and not in others? That whilst the ancient price of two centuries, continued on the continent, the price of from 30*s.* to 40*s.*; a materially higher price of the principal article of subsistence, estimated in money of the same kind, could be permanently established here? No individual acquainted with the simplest maxims of political economy, would venture to maintain it. What result had the short experience they already possessed, of the effects of the re-establishment of the old standard given them? The price of corn he believed had already fallen to nearly its original rate. It was now about 50*s.* It had fallen to the same price, during the short period, in which they had attempted to re-establish that standard in 1815. The agricultural committee of the last session, in the laborious and perplexed inquiries, in which they had involved themselves respecting the prices of corn, had entirely mistaken the course which they ought to have pursued. They found existing a species of money, a standard of value, such as had existed in this country in all former times. They found existing, also, a price of corn, such as that money had always given; such as that standard had at all times measured—and they proceeded to enquire, whence a circumstance so extraordinary as that could have arisen? Whence it had occurred, that the same commodity on one hand, and the same money on the other, should strike out the same price—the same substance, measured by the same standard, give the same result now as at all former times? The proper subject for their inquiry, was—what had been the cause of those high prices which had distinguished the preceding twenty years. Whence it had arisen, that the price of corn, which had continued so uniform for nearly two centuries; which had never during that period, reached a higher price than 50s. for any short average of years; and which had now returned to 50s. again; had, in the interval, suddenly risen, and had reached the price of 80s. for a period of five years; and then 80s. for a period of ten years; and lastly 110s. for a like average period of five years. That extraordinary state of things, would have been well deserving of their labours, to elucidate and explain; and in that course of inquiry, it would have been scarcely possible for the committee to have proceeded, without arriving at one plain and direct conclusion—that this rise of prices had been merely nominal; that it was the quality of the money, and not the character of the commodity, either in its production or supply, that had undergone alteration. That the old metal money had been abandoned, when these prices were obtained; that a paper money had been substituted in its place; that that paper money had been issued in increased quantities; that so issued, and so existing in circulation, great nominal amounts had been given in exchange for all commodities; that it was in money of that species, in pounds and shillings of that description, that first 80s. and then 110s. had been obtained for a quarter of corn—that with that species of money, those prices had ceased, and must of necessity have done so—that to hold out a contrary expectation to the people—to lead them to believe, that any higher prices than the present, could permanently exist, in conjunction with the money now again adopted—that the effect could remain, when the cause was removed—would be at best a gross and a senseless delusion, calculated to increase the calamities of the petitioners; to conceal from them their real condition: to prevent them from protecting their remaining fortunes by a just knowledge of it; and to aggravate all the sufferings which the committee were appointed to relieve.

It was not his intention however to enter into the question generally of the alteration in the currency: but to call the attention of the House to the causes which had distressed agriculture, and more particularly through the increase of its burthens; convinced as he was, that the House could not proceed with advantage, unless their measures were grounded on a full view of the whole extent of the evils before them, and their causes; he should regret if they adopted the partial and inefficient measures about to be proposed; and by which he was satisfied they would compromise still farther their own character, and increase the difficulties of the petitioners and the country.

Mr. Ricardo said, he rose, impressed with great admiration for the speech which the House had just heard. He thought the hon. gentleman had shown a very considerable degree of talent, much research, and great knowledge of the subject upon which he had spoken. [Hear.] Notwithstanding these circumstances, he could not help thinking, that the hon. gentleman had committed a great many errors. The hon. gentleman had spoken of him (Mr. Ricardo) as if he had always been a favourer of a paper circulation [cries of "No, no"]—as if, in fact, he had not been one of the first to point out the evils of a currency, in the estimation of which the House could have no guide, and which was at all times liable to be increased or diminished, as it might suit the convenience or the pleasure of the Bank. The hon. gentleman appeared to have founded the whole of his speech upon a passage in a pamphlet that he (Mr. Ricardo) had written, respecting what were called "remunerating prices." To the test of the doctrine and reasoning of that pamphlet, he should be very willing to trust the whole of the argument in this case. It could make no difference to the farmer how he obtained those remunerating prices, provided he got them; although it was very true (as had been asserted by the hon. gentleman), that in order to obtain such prices, he must be content to be paid in money or value of very different descriptions. But the important fact was, that it was impossible a man could long go on, producing any one particular commodity, unless he could obtain for it a remunerating price.—The hon. gentleman had spoken as if he (Mr. Ricardo) were alone responsible for the alteration which had lately taken place in the value of money. He would, however, beg the House to recollect the state in which the currency stood in the year 1819. At the time of the passing of the bill of 1819, the difference between the paper currency and gold was only 5 per cent. What he had then suggested was, that measures should be taken which, while they restored the value of the paper currency to an equality with gold, and thus put an end to the depreciation, would make any purchases of gold unnecessary. Under those measures, as there would have been no additional demand for gold, there could have been no increase in the value of that metal. But as that suggestion was not followed, but another which rendered the purchase of gold necessary, and which (as it had been carried into effect by the Bank) had made a considerable change in the value of gold, how was he (Mr. R.) responsible for the effects of it? If the change in the value of money had been 20 or even 50 per cent he should not have been responsible for it. Undoubtedly, as the hon. member contended, the burthen of money taxation was increased, in proportion to the increase in the value of money: the only difference was as to the amount of that increase. He (Mr. Ricardo) contended, that it was at the utmost about 10 per cent, and nothing like what had been contended by the hon. gentleman. The hon. member had said, that he (Mr. Ricardo) measured depreciation solely by the price of gold; and the same observation had been made in various parts of the House, and repeated elsewhere under an entire misconception of the meaning of the word depreciation. Depreciation meant a lowering of the value of the currency, as compared with the standard by which it was professedly regulated. When he used the word, he used it in this obvious and proper sense. The standard itself might be altered, as compared with other things; and it might so happen that a currency might be depreciated, when it had actually risen, as compared with commodities, because the standard might have risen in value in a still greater proportion. When he said, that the currency was relieved from depreciation to such and such an extent, did he say that the currency had not altered in value? The question of the value of the currency was quite a different thing from the question of depreciation; and if the hon. member could prove that gold had changed in value 40 or 50 per cent, he (Mr. R.) would allow that there was a proportionate increase of value in the currency. The hon. member asked why gold was a better standard than corn or any other commodity? He (Mr. R.) answered, that gold had always been the standard of the country; and if we had not passed the fatal law of 1797, we should have continued to this moment with a metallic standard. But, would it have been said on that account, that gold had not altered in value? If, while we had continued a metallic currency, any other country which had had a paper currency had been returning to a metallic standard, the hon. gentleman might have come down, as he did now, and said, that on account of the purchase of gold that had been made, the value of that metal had been enhanced and that the pressure of money taxes had been proportionately increased. But, did the hon. member mean seriously to contend, that corn was less variable in value than gold [Hear, hear!]? Let him propose, then, that the Bank directors should pay their Bank-notes at a certain rate in quarters of corn instead of sovereigns; for that was the bearing of his assertion [Hear!]. The hon. gentleman talked of the impossibility of the cultivators of the soil having recourse to land of inferior quality, but the hon. gentleman did not correctly state the argument. It was not that cultivators were always driven by the increase of population to lands of inferior quality, but that from the additional demand for grain, they might be driven to employ on land previously cultivated a second portion of capital, which did produce as much as the first. On a still farther demand a third portion might be employed, which did not produce so much as the second: it was manifestly by the return on the last portion of capital applied, that the cost of production was determined. It was impossible, therefore, that the country should go on increasing its demand for grain without the cost of producing it being increased and causing an increased price. If the hon. member saw in the present state of things only the consequence of the change in the value of money, he gave no reason for the amount of the distress. Let them suppose his (Mr. Ricardo's) own case. He was possessed of a considerable quantity of land, the whole of which was unburthened by a single debt. Now, according to the hon. member, he and the tenants on that land would have only been injured to the amount of the increase which the change in the value of money had made in the burthen of taxation. But they were, in point of fact, injured much more. The hon. gentleman was mistaken as to the fact, when he said there was little variation in the price of grain in the last century. In the first 62 years of the last century the average price of the quarter of wheat had been 32*s.*; but, in the years from 1784 to 1792 it had been 45*s.*—a very considerable increase on the value of corn. But, he would not rest on any scattered facts what was so evident in principle, as that the extension of cultivation must extend the cost of production of corn. The hon. member had said, that the effect of taxation laid on the land was the same as if the farmer had to support an additional man from whose labours he reaped no benefit. That he (Mr. R.) acknowledged was the effect of all taxation [Hear!]. The hon. member had seemed to think that he would deny this. On the contrary, no one could assert the mischievousness of taxation more strongly than he would. He would never consent that one sixpence should be taken out of the pockets of the people that could be avoided. But he was not, therefore, so blind as to say that taxation was the cause of all the present distress [Hear, hear!]. It was truly said, that the effect of taxation on the landholder was the same as if he had to maintain an additional man: but was not this also the case of the merchant and the manufacturer [Hear!]? If taxation, then, were the sole cause of distress, the distress would press on all alike. The theory of the hon. member was, therefore, totally insufficient to account for what they now witnessed. The hon. gentleman had asked, whether the price of corn would not be doubled if the currency were paper, and taxation were doubled? If tithes were doubled, poor-rates doubled and all taxes affecting especially the growth of corn were doubled, the effect would certainly be to increase the price of corn to that amount; but the country might be taxed generally without producing that alteration. The hon. gentleman had said that he (Mr. Ricardo) advised the abandonment of the land. Now he did not advise the abandonment of it while it was profitable; but he did undoubtedly advise farmers not to grow a commodity that would not yield them a remunerating price. He would give similar advice to the clothier and to the shipowner, if their circumstances were similar. He would not now enter into a discussion of the particular propositions about to be brought before the committee. He was content to have answered, however inadequately, the very able speech of the hon. gentleman, and he sat down with declaring that he did not entertain the slightest doubt of the validity of the principles he had maintained.

Mr. Attwood, in explanation, observed, that he had fallen into no mistake respecting the price of corn in the former part of the last century. He was perfectly aware of the fall which then took place, and he would remind the hon. member, that Adam Smith had ascribed it to an alteration in the value of money. He was aware also that, about the middle of the century, corn had recovered from that depression, from whatever cause, and had reached its former price, but had never exceeded it till the French war. If the hon. member would refer to the price for 20 years before the war, he would find no advance whatever in that time, and it was a period when much additional land was brought into cultivation, when importation above exportation was insignificant, and when population was rapidly increasing.

The House having resolved itself into a committee,

The Marquis of Londonderry said, that no individual listened with more satisfaction than he did to displays of talent, coming from any part of the House, on any question connected with the great interests of the country, but he must say, that if they did not confine themselves to some one practical view of the question before them, they would sacrifice the interests of the country. The hon. member (Mr. Attwood), whom he should have listened to with great pleasure on a more suitable occasion, had entered into the wide field of the bullion question, and he had naturally brought forward the hon. member for Portarlington, as the gladiator on the other side of the question. He humbly suggested to the hon. member, that if he was disposed to consider the effect of taxation on the country, he might have taken the occasion when the proposition was, to take off some of the taxes; and that if he chose to consider the state of the currency in its largest sense, he might have taken the opportunity which would be shortly offered, by the motion of the hon. member for Essex. He should not have said so much, but for the animadversion of the hon. member, on the narrow view which he conceived the ministers had taken of agricultural distress. That narrow view was, however, very important. It was the consideration of a measure, not of immediate relief, but of future safety to the dearest interests of the country. The question was, how far agriculture was menaced by the importation of foreign corn, in the event of the ports being thrown open, under the present law; and to this he would now direct the attention of the House. The practical question depended, first, upon the price under which it might be prudent to open the ports for the importation of foreign corn; secondly, upon the rate of duty at which such importation should take place; and, thirdly, whether, after the ports were opened, any rate of duty should continue? He would state shortly, in the outset, why the House was called upon to adopt some measure on the subject. The presumption certainly was against the ports being opened; but if they were opened, in the present state of the markets of the continent, the importation of foreign grain would be so much beyond the wants of the country, as for a long time most ruinously to depress the prices in the British market. All agreed that something should be done, and by means of duty. Five plans had been broached; and, taking the preliminary point for granted, he would come to the practical points which he had noticed. First, as to the price at which the ports should be opened for importation: at present it was 80*s*., and when they were opened, it was without restraint as to duty, and limitation as to quantity. All parties consented to proceed on the principle of the report of last year—that if a duty of restraint were imposed, there ought to be some relaxation of the price at which corn might be imported. The legislature was called upon by the petitioners to give additional protection to agriculture. Now, he had heard no case to show that the distress arose from a want of protection. The protection was now quite ample; but it could not give price. The price of 70*s*., he thought, in all ordinary years, would operate as a prohibition, and secure the monopoly to our own growers. The resolutions both of his right hon. friend, and of the hon. member for Portarlington, contemplated an immediate change in the import price. The latter opened the port at 70*s*., with a prior right of entry at 65*s*. to corn warehoused. The former allowed the introduction of warehoused corn at 70*s*., gave it the monopoly for 3 months, or until the price rose to 80*s*., and then importations were permitted. He freely owned, that, as far as his own individual opinion was concerned, he should feel no alarm if either proposition were adopted; but he had felt it right to propose, that the ports should open at 65*s*. with a duty of 15*s*. and a fluctuating duty of 5*s*. per quarter. The great mass of the committee had thought that it would be highly inexpedient to open the ports under 80*s*.; and if alarm prevailed on this point, parliament ought to endeavour to legislate in the tone of the sentiments of the country; it ought not to aggravate the real sufferings of the agriculturists by torturing their minds. He had thought that the great tide of foreign corn would be regulated by a duty with more effect if it began at an earlier point than 80*s*.: if the British market were not opened until it reached that price, the torrent of foreign corn would accumulate and swell, and when set at liberty, it would roll over rather in an overwhelming cascade, than in a regular stream. The hon. members for Somerset and Wilts concurred with the committee in the price of 80*s*., excepting that the committee admitted warehoused corn at 70*s*.—He now came to the question of duty, and here also different suggestions had been made. The hon. member for Somerset proposed 35*s*.; but he might just as well declare that foreign corn should not be imported at all. To the 35*s*. duty, must be added 10*s*. for expences, and 80*s*. or 90*s*. for the price of the corn; for it could not then be admitted until the average was 80*s*.; consequently some of the prices would be considerably higher. In a year of scarcity, a bill to repeal such a law would be passed, as a measure of public safety, through all its stages in a single night. The recommendation of the hon. member for Wilts, though more moderate, partook strongly of the same quality: to his duty of 24*s*. was to be added 10*s*. for the expenses and the price of the quarter of corn 80*s*. or 90*s*. These propositions led him to the question of a fixed rate of duty, without reference to the price of the commodity in the market. The hon. member for

Portarlington wished to have a fixed rate of duty always in operation; and it might be realized when the markets of the world were in a natural state. His right hon. friend (Mr. Huskisson) was not prepared to make it a fixed rate of duty. He (lord L.) did not believe it possible to levy a duty to a considerable amount after a certain price, because the moral feeling of the country would be against it: in point of fact, a high duty could not exist with a high price. He should infinitely prefer a simple measure of a fixed rate of duty, getting rid of all complexity, without any fixed price; but that theory could not be realized. He would state why it would not be safe to try the experiment now. If he could bring his own mind to think that there was no practical danger in it, he could not persuade the country to think so. In arguing the question of duty, he must begin at a more moderate rate than those of either the hon. member for Somerset or Wilts. The proposition of the committee was the lowest of all; but if no alteration was to be made in the scale of duty until the price reached 80*s.*, it would be necessary to look at the situation of the market when open to foreign grain. Taking the duty to be 15*s.* and the price 90*s.*, (to make the average of 80*s.*), deducting the duty, the foreign importer would be able to procure 65*s.* The value of corn on the continent was now so low, that he would be able to realize a considerable profit. On this point he had been somewhat mistaken out of doors. It had been supposed that he had said on a former night, that foreign corn could not at this moment be obtained in this country at 30*s.* or 35*s.* He had never so stated. The corn now warehoused might be obtained for 25*s.*, or even 20*s.*, because the holders were uncertain of a market. If, also, only a small quantity were at present required from the continent, it might be had at 30*s.*, or 35*s.*; but he maintained that it could not be imported at that rate in all years and in all quantities. The continental grower would not be remunerated at that price. It was clear, however, that even from Dantzic, where wheat was the dearest, it might be brought to this country with great advantage when the importer could secure 65*s.* If, then, some mode were not adopted for preventing it, foreign grain would continue to pour in until it found its level here with the rest of the world, and the result might be most prejudicial to agriculture. The experiment might be risked when the world had returned to its natural state; but, at present, duty only would not be an adequate protection. At present, any reasonable duty would leave such an interval between the price here and on the continent, that the influx might be ruinous. What, then, was the remedy? He knew of no other but that after the price had run down below what agriculture could bear, the import price should be taken in aid of the duty. The report of last year, had drawn a marked distinction between measures that might be necessary at the present time, and those which it might be desirable to adopt at a future period; but those ultimate measures it had recommended with great caution and great discretion. Now, he must say, that nothing had occurred in the course of the last year to satisfy him that we had approximated more nearly to a state of things in which we could legislate on general maxims. Therefore, he was rather for a modification, than for adopting the more sound and established general principles. He should feel great distrust in giving his own opinions in opposition to those of his right hon. friend and the hon. member for Portarlington, if he did not see distinctly the ground on which they differed. They thought that we were arrived at that period when the establishment of sound principles of a corn law was right and practicable. He was of opinion that we had not yet arrived at that period. He could not see that the market of the world was less superabundant; he did not think that prices had risen on the continent; he knew, unfortunately, that they had not risen in this country. If the country were in a more natural state of things, and we had opened our ports earlier, 10*s.* added to the foreign price he should think a right protection. If wheat were then 25*s.*, 30*s.*, or 35*s.*, the quarter on the continent, and if it rose from 35*s.* to 40*s.* which was its natural price, than 10*s.* of expense of importation, and 15*s.* of duty, would raise the price to 65*s.* This would be nearly equal to the home price of 70*s.* He admitted that it was desirable to dispose of the question of the corn laws at once. We referred to it with pain. His right hon. friend was therefore anxious to set the subject at rest, and with this feeling had shown a disposition to modify his general principles. The hon. member for Portarlington, too, had acted with as much accommodation as could be expected from a person who held so high the principles to which he gave his authority. That hon. member attempted to reconcile the measure which the present exigency required, with the measure which ought to be permanently established, by imposing now a duty, which, in the course of the next ten years, would fall to its permanent amount of 10s. He should like this proposition better, if it allowed a larger operation to the commerce in corn; and for that reason he had proposed 65s. in the committee. But if that should not be the price at which the ports were to be open, then he would support what was the general view of the committee. His right hon. friend proposed a duty of 15s. The committee recommended 12s., with an alteration of 5s. He would rather take the duty at 20s., or 25s., than leave the country exposed to the evils which were now felt in consequence of the irregular importation of foreign corn. It was upon those general principles that he ventured to submit the proposition to the House. Two or three shillings could not have such a charm with any member, as to render it worth while to spend much time in discussing it. The great object was, the substituting a more extended commerce in grain instead of a monopoly, and then prospectively the removal of restrictions. One thing he strongly deprecated. With every disposition to show their sympathies with the agriculturists, let them not contemplate an aggravated scale of protection. Such a measure as he proposed might pass very smoothly through the House; yet if they awakened the feelings of the people, their future legislation would be impeded by petitions, as at a former period, when such fatal consequences attended them. He had endeavoured to legislate with an even hand between the grower and the consumer. Unusual supply, and a violent transition from high to low prices, little accorded with the interests of either. He hoped they would be allowed to go forward with their legislation with the confidence of the country. But if an aggravated protection were sought for the sake of additional efficacy, they might expect to have the whole proceedings broken in upon. If the hon. member for Somersetshire proposed nothing but simplicity, and if he could persuade the committee to adopt the protecting duty of 35s., he (lord L.) would withdraw all the scale of duties which he now proposed.—The noble marquis then moved, "That it is the opinion of this Committee, that whenever foreign wheat shall have been made for home consumption under the provisions of an act made in the 55th year of his late majesty, the scale of prices at which the home consumption of foreign corn, meal or flour, is permitted by the said act, shall cease and determine."

Sir T. Lethbridge began by returning his thanks to the hon. member for Callington (Mr. Attwood) for one of the most able speeches he had ever heard in that House—a speech which would carry conviction to the heart of every man in the country. He agreed with that hon. member, that it was the duty of the House to legislate with a view to the benefit of the whole community, and he admitted, that he must be mistaken in the grounds on which he supported his present opinions, if they were opposed to that principle. The distinguishing feature in his proposition was, that it imposed a protecting duty on all agricultural produce. He was aware of the delicacy of legislating upon the food of man. In this commercial and manufacturing country this was always a delicate subject of legislation. But, if ever there was a period when it was incumbent on the House to look firmly at the question, this was that time. It was said, that a duty of 35s. was too great, and that it would be impossible to collect it. He was not satisfied that it would be so. What was the state of the market at the present moment? He had been informed by a merchant of high respectability, that he could deliver any quantity of wheat at 26s. a quarter. The agriculturists had been asked what they wanted in the shape of protection beyond monopoly? But he contended, that they had had nothing like a monopoly. In Feb. 1819, no less than 2,500,000 quarters of corn had been imported—a quantity which had had a sensible influence on the markets ever since. There were at present 500,000 quarters of corn warehoused in the country; and the object of one of the new measures was, to let out this quantity of foreign corn before the price reached 80s. But corn was not the only article to which the House ought to direct its attention. Last week, in London, 1,400 firkins of foreign butter had been sold at from 56s. to 60s., to which the price had fallen in consequence of the glut; but Buckinghamshire butter could not be sold at 6d. per lb., because the

Dutchman had sold his quantity the day before, and, after deducting all charges, got 3*d.* per lb. by it. In like manner, he had known the Somersetshire farmers refuse to sell their cheese for less than 33*s.*, when a cargo came from Rotterdam and filled up the vacancy left by the farmers refusing to sell. Hemp, tallow, and hides were in the same state. Unless protection was carried to a much greater extent than it now was, it was in vain to expect that the agriculturists could maintain their station in society. This might appear no evil in the opinion of some hon. members, but in his opinion, it was a crying evil, and required all the energies of parliament to prevent the consequences which were likely to result from it. The public creditor might be paid for a short time longer, but it was impossible that he could go on receiving his dividends, when so large a class of the community were in a state of ruin, and it would be unjust to expect it. Mr. Peel's bill was the main cause of the existing distress, and there could be no doubt that parliament would be obliged to retrace their steps. The tail of that bill must be cut off. It was impossible to go through with it; and the proposition with regard to country banks, proved that the government were convinced of the impossibility of pushing this measure to extremities. He knew not what the fate of the resolution which he was about to propose would be, but he was quite satisfied, that when the time should arrive for a free importation of corn, with regard to price, a lower rate of duty than that which he proposed, would not furnish an adequate protection to the agriculture of the country. He remembered an observation in that House which had made an indelible impression on his mind—that even with a duty of 40*s.* the country might at any time be inundated with foreign corn. The agricultural interest had always remained firm to their duty; and he doubted not that they would still continue so, if they were not goaded to desperation [Hear!]. He was one of those who would be heard; and he must say, that the measures which had been lately pursued, were calculated to drive the land-owners to desperation. He would not be put down, nor prevented from declaring his sentiments, and he trusted the House would not be led away by false speculations, and the abominable theories of political economists. [A laugh.] He hoped the House would put down those theories with all their might and force, and in so doing they would prove themselves to be the representatives of the whole people, and not of an interested class of the community. The agriculturists would be most grievously disappointed if the measures of the noble marquis were carried into effect. The resolution which he was about to propose, would afford a full and adequate protection to the various articles of native produce, and by that resolution he was prepared to stand or fall. The hon. baronet concluded by proposing the following resolution:—

"That it is expedient, for the protection of the agriculture of the united kingdom against foreign competition, that the following rate of duties shall be payable, and paid, on the import of any productions of foreign countries similar to those of our own soil; and that, subject to such rates and duties, the import of all such productions shall, whenever the ports shall open under the present law, thereafter remain free for the import of all such productions, viz.:—

Wheat... 40*s.* per qr.	Hemp... 15*s.* cwt.
Meal.... 10*s.* cwt.	Hides... 2*d.* lb.
Flour.... 14*s.* cwt.	Tallow.. 20*s.* cwt.
Rye..... 26*s.* 6*d.* qr.	Seeds... 28*s.* cwt.
Oats.... 13*s.* 6*d.* qr.	Butter.. 56*s.* cwt.
Pease.... 26*s.* 6*d.* qr.	Cheese.. 37*s.* 4*d.* cwt.
Beans.... 26*s.* 6*d.* qr.	Poultry, 33*l.* per cent ad valorem according to price current.
Barley, Bear or Bigg.. 20*s.* qr.	Apples.. 5*s.* per bush.
Wool.... 1*s.* lb.	Pears... 7*s.* bush.

All things not enumerated 33*l.* per cent ad valorem."

Sir F. Burdett said, he felt no inclination to agree to any of the propositions which had been submitted to the House. With regard to the proposition of the hon. baronet for imposing an import duty on the various articles of our produce, for the sake of keeping up the prices, it was, in his opinion, a matter of minor importance, if not of total indifference. The hon. baronet appeared to complain, very unnecessarily, of an attempt to put him down; seeing that his opinions, whether they were right or wrong, had been listened to with attention by the House. There was one point in which he agreed with the hon. baronet, namely, the utter futility of all the projects and resolutions which had been proposed to the House. The view which the hon. baronet had taken of this subject, such as it was, was at least clear and intelligible. Its object was, that such a duty should be imposed as would prevent the possibility of importation, until corn should rise to a price with which the farmer could pay what was required from him in taxation, and through another cause, which the noble lord had left entirely out of view—he meant the change in the currency. The hon. baronet required that wheat should be raised to 120*s.* per quarter [Cries of "No, no."]. He had misunderstood him, then. At any rate, he had said, that if prices were not kept up, the agriculturists could not be relieved. With regard to the noble lord, he knew not well what to think: he could not determine whether that noble lord was in jest or in earnest [Cheers!]. The noble lord had proposed a plan; but he (Sir F. B.) did not know in what light to consider it. He did not know whether the noble lord was more in earnest or less in joke than he was last night, when he brought forward a measure that he had treated with so much ill-placed levity. So much did the noble lord on this subject seem to forget the gravity that became a minister, and the seriousness that was due to the interests he was discussing, that if he (Sir F. B.) had a musical voice and wished to answer him in his own vein, he should be inclined to borrow the words of the old song, "Cease your funning." [A laugh.] This temper, on such an occasion he thought worse than levity. The manner in which the noble lord had introduced and surrendered the measure, showed inconsistency and incapacity. The noble lord's disposition seemed now humbled. Instead of threatening, as formerly, to yield nothing, he yielded every thing, as soon as he saw in the country gentlemen a desire to assert their claims. Nay, he yielded up his own conviction, and introduced a measure contrary to that conviction, because he thought it agreeable to their views; and, when he found that they received it with apathy, or treated it with aversion, he withdrew it with the same inconsiderate levity. The noble lord must have entertained a poor opinion of the House, or a high idea of his own powers of persuasion, when he undertook to convince it of the wisdom and policy of a measure of which he was not convinced himself. He had a right, therefore, to ask, was the proposition now before the committee the noble lord's own progeny, or if he found it as ill treated as the resolution of yesterday, would he come forward, deny the parental relation, and call upon the real father to relieve him from his ill-omened charge? Professing to be nurse or foster-father of this measure for agricultural relief, he scarcely allowed it to see the light when he extinguished it. The noble lord had recommended it to the House. He then came forward, and not only deprived it of existence, but seemed so ashamed of it, that he called upon the real parent to own his progeny, and free him from the imputation of being its parent. The noble lord's present project was, to impose a duty on the importation of foreign corn for the protection of the English grower; and various opinions had been stated as to the proper amount of that duty. Now, in his (sir F. B.'s.) opinion, there ought to be no duties at all. This was his sincere opinion; and it did not matter with him whether it was agreeable or not to the landed interest, or any other interest in the House. The noble lord himself appeared to have no opinion on the subject. Feeling perplexed in his place, and resolved to do something, without being able to decide on what ought to be done, he called upon the land-owner and the farmer to come to the relief of the minister. Though, from his official situation, he ought to be placed on an eminence whence he could survey all the interests of the country, and be able to apply all the measures which the exigency required, he professed himself to be guided by the views of the farmers and country gentlemen, and became the blind instrument of their will. To the plan which, at their suggestion, he brought forward, the noble lord contented himself with giving this recommendation, that "if it did no good, it could do no harm;" whereas he (sir F. B.) would maintain, that legislation which did no good on a subject like this, must do harm. But the noble lord could not advance farther; and when he found that the insufficiency of his proposed measure was detected and exposed, he declared that he put his trust in the healing effects of time. [Hear.] This had been long his infallible remedy. Time was to cure us of all our evils for the last seven years; yet, instead of being cured, they had only been aggravated. The physician had only exasperated the malignity of the disease, and increased the danger of the patient. Though the noble lord had not entered at all into the causes of the distress under which the country laboured, and seemed desirous of carrying the measure before the House, without proving its necessity or its adaptation to the end of effecting relief, he (sir F. B.) would go somewhat into the subject, to show that corn duties were not called for, and would be injurious. The great causes of our present sufferings were, the change in the currency and the pressure of taxation. He had not been present in the House when, as he had been told, a speech (Mr. Attwood's) of great ability was delivered on the effects of the change in the currency. There could be no doubt that that change, and not circumstances of partial operation or equivocal influence, was the cause of the general distress. It was a doctrine advanced by a noble earl in another place, that superabundance of produce was the cause of our agricultural embarrassments, and that no possible reduction of taxes would effect any relief; and the noble lord opposite, adopting the principles, but embellishing it with his usual exaggerations, had argued, that the remission of all the 70 millions of taxes would not sensibly alleviate the sufferings of the landed interest. What, then, would relieve us? He could not agree with the hon. member who spoke last in his denunciation of the principles of political economy; nor could he comprehend what that hon. member meant by political economy when he so abused it, unless he thought that it meant low prices. [A laugh.] The principles of political economy, when properly understood, meant only those principles which should guide the management of the public resources, and enabled us to explain those questions which related to them. According to any thing he could understand of political economy, it did not appear that the superabundance of produce, against which such complaints were made, could be proved to exist. It was stated before the committee, that the last two crops in this country had not been very abundant; and it was acknowledged on all hands that there had been no importation from abroad. It was a fact, likewise undeniable that during the war, when importation took place to a considerable extent, prices were high, and that when importation had ceased, prices had fallen. It did not seem, therefore, consistent with just reasoning to infer, that importation of foreign corn, or excessive supplies at home, had occasioned the fall of prices.—But, there was another fact which was connected with that fall, and which appeared more likely to be its cause. Simultaneous with the fall of prices, was a diminution in the quantity of the currency. The former might be the effect of the latter. A decrease in the quantity of an article might raise its price beyond the proportion of that decrease. But the currency had been diminished to a great extent. During the war, the Bank circulation rose to about 30,000,000*l.*, and the circulation of country paper amounted, on calculation, to 40,000,000*l.* more, making together 70,000,000*l.* Taking the circulation of the country to be about a tenth part of its income, then a diminution of one per cent in the value of the circulating medium would depress prices 10 per cent. Such change affected all classes to a great extent; and as the income of the consumers diminished, consumption was consequently lessened. The importation of corn could not in this or any other state of things have affected us. The importing country was always rich; and it was on imports that the value of our commerce depended. They invigorated manufactures, they stimulated labour, and they increased the market for all commodities of home growth. By stopping the importation of corn by means of the corn laws, he was persuaded that the evils resulting from the change in the currency had been aggravated.—It had been objected by some persons to the landlords, that they endeavoured to obtain high rents. For his own part, he professed that he liked high rents, for he thought that high rents were a proof of the prosperity of a country. When high rents were enjoyed by the landlord, the farmer enjoyed high profits, and the labourer adequate wages. This might have been the state of things without fluctuation, but for the measure of 1797; which, by occasioning a change in the currency, cut both ways, and caused transfers of property without doing any good, which it was surprising the nation could pass through without ruin. The acts by which the circulation was at first depreciated and then restored, combined an operation which no other government ever attempted, and which no other nation could ever have endured. It had been said, that the act of 1819 had not occasioned distress, because the distress had begun before it passed; but, the preparation for carrying it into effect had begun long before the bill had received the sanction of parliament. That bill merely prevented prices from taking a backward course.

The evils which the measure had caused in its contemplation and subsequent execution, were incalculable. It was the most fraudulent transaction that ever disgraced any country; and he knew of no greater crime than that involved in the unjust transfers of property which it created. Ministers ought to have been impeached, if they had been aware of the consequences of the measure without taking precautions against them [Hear, hear!]. They had thus forcibly altered all existing contracts—they had deprived one man of his property to enrich another. And how many might now be lingering in prison, who had been found by this iniquitous act in the midst of plenty, and had been left by it dry on the strand, to pant and expire without relief, like the fish of a pond after the water was withdrawn! By this interference with the currency sometimes the creditor suffered, sometimes the debtor; by it, the charges of the government and all the burthens of the state had been aggravated almost beyond endurance. In the mean time, the salaries of ministers, and the emoluments of office had not been affected, and the means of corrupt influence remained undiminished. It had been said, by those who wished to console us under our sufferings, that similar changes to this which he had described had occurred in other periods of our history; and the reigns of Edward 6th and William 3rd, had been appealed to as proofs of the assertion. True it was, that parts of the coin had formerly been clipped and debased; but a change had never before now been suddenly effected in the whole circulation of the country. When formerly the base coin was called in, or "cried down," according to the phrase used, notice was given that it would, after a certain time, be stopped, and a new coin issued. No inconvenience or loss was occasioned to the holders of it. Government at the time appointed, received it in the discharge of taxes. The country was thus relieved from a debased coin; which at any rate was of some value, and the holders of it were indemnified. But, what was the case now? Not a small portion of the coin only, but the whole circulating medium of the country had been altered 30 per cent. In the meantime, nothing had been settled. Ministers did nothing to compensate for the changes which they had occasioned; and the noble lord contented himself by standing up and referring the country to the general working of events, by which all things would be set to rights! Unless some compensation was made for this forcible change in the currency, there could be no claim for the amount of the present taxes [Hear!]. All our taxes ought to be lowered in proportion to the rise in the value of money: all our establishments ought to be reduced in that proportion—our civil list, and all the salaries of public officers. There was no use, for instance, for a civil list of 2,000,000*l*. It might be true, that they could not, at once remove so much of the taxes as would occasion a complete relief; but they should bear in mind that the last hair breaks the camel's back, and that, the one pound which they took off now would be a greater relief than that which they might take off next. The more distressed the country was, the more sensibly would the most trifling relief be felt and acknowledged. He, with this view of the subject, did not think the result of the vote for the reduction of one of the postmasters-general unimportant; and he hoped the noble lord (Normanby) who had managed the business in so spirited a manner, and conducted it to so fortunate an issue, would not stop in his career, but take up some other similar job; and he was sure he would find no difficulty in making his choice [Hear!]. No retrenchment could be obtained from the present ministers without compelling them to it; but a few votes like that of the other evening would procure for the country some relief. Ministers had declared, at the beginning of the session, that they could not remit a single farthing of taxes; and since then we had heard of a remission of several millions. Indeed, they were so inconsistent in their conduct, and the reasons which they gave for it, that they almost in the same breath declared that an abolition of taxes would afford no relief, and then proposed to remit taxes as a source of relief.—Taxation, then, joined with the change in the currency, was the manifest cause of the distresses under which the country laboured; and the country gentlemen of England, with whom as a class he was connected, and whom he always looked upon with respect—whose fate was bound up in that of their country—who could not leave it, but must stand or fall along with it—were imperiously called upon at the present moment to come forward, and force upon ministers the means of their own salvation. He was convinced, that, whether generally connected with ministers or not, they would do their duty: he was convinced that they would see the destruction that impended over them: he was convinced that they would not look upon it as a trifling matter, who should get possession of their estates, though the soil might be cultivated as before: he was convinced that they would stand up and preserve their fields and mansions, which they had received from their fathers, and which they were pledged to transmit to their posterity. This they could not do, if they supported the present weak ministers in their vacillating policy and foolish projects [Hear, hear!]. They had unwarily given their confidence to men who trifled with their dearest interests, and insulted their deepest distresses—who came forward with a proposition for their relief which they professed would do neither good nor harm, and afterwards withdrew that proposition with levity and jesting—who treated them with a debate as children with a plaything, and when the amusement had lasted a sufficient time, closed it without coming to any result. The noble lord had formerly asked the country not to turn its back upon itself; but he made no scruple of turning his back upon his friends. He had last night, in withdrawing his countenance from one of them, wished "the saddle to be placed on the right horse;" but he had not only put on the saddle, but had ridden the horse hard to boot [Hear, and a laugh.] He had abandoned the measure which he brought forward for them; but this was not to be wondered at, for he had abandoned some of his own. He had heard the noble lord's plans and projects at the beginning of the session (which he confessed he did not understand); and he now found that they were given up. There was a scheme to lend money to parishes on the security of the poor-rates, and others, equally notable, of which he now heard nothing. He never remembered to have read or heard of a ministry that presented itself before the country like the present. An hon. gentleman had said, that they possessed the confidence of the House; but he was sure if this was the case, that both they and the House had lost, and justly lost, the confidence of the country [Hear, hear!]. The noble lord had last night been extremely jocular, and treated the proposition which he introduced as a jest. It would now be necessary to ask him, if to-night he was in earnest. Let him say whether he meant to support his own scheme, or was merely introducing it for the sake of a speech. The House would then know what they were about. If the noble lord was serious, he (sir F. B.) would propose, for the relief of agriculture, other measures than that before the committee. He would propose that all the expenses of the state should be reduced to the scale of 1792, as all prices had fallen to that standard; and as the currency had altered all the charges of government, that they should be all adjusted anew. The noble lord had laid great stress on keeping faith with the public creditor; but was not faith likewise to be kept with the public—the people of England? It was not by high prices that agriculture should be expected to flourish, but by a diminution of the public burthens and an adjustment of the change in the currency. The public creditor, if he was to receive his due, ought not to receive more than he contracted for. The state of the farmer must be looked to as well as that of the public creditor. It must come to that at last. The country could not go on without it [Hear, hear!]. The proposition, that the distress of the country proceeded from superabundance was contrary to every principle of political economy. Whenever there was an abundant crop, the farmer was compensated in the increase of quantity for the diminution of price. He was himself a consumer, and enjoyed to the amount of his own consumption the benefit of low prices. He paid his rent to his landlord from his increased produce; and the landlord becoming his customer consumed more on account of the diminished price. The manufacturer, the labourer, and every class of the community enjoyed and consumed more of the farmer's produce, and were enabled to supply him at a lower price. It was quite impossible, in this view of the subject, that superabundance could produce mischief. But even if it could, what was the fact with regard to the reality of that overabundance? It did not exist, the last two crops were only average crops, and we had had no importation for three years. Providence had not therefore inflicted this imaginary evil upon us; our distress arose from the change in the currency and the pressure of taxation, and was not to be relieved by corn bills. The causes of our embarrassments were, our immense military and colonial establishments, our civil list, and our great load of taxation. The corn trade, as well as all other trade, should be free; and its freedom would occasion no inconvenience, if we were relieved from a portion of our burthens. The great evil was a ministry who had not wisdom to propose, or character to execute, any great or beneficial measure—who could take no large or liberal view of the state of the country—who thought only of preserving their places, and of obtaining a vote for the evening. Such an administration, with the noble lord at its head, was a national calamity. His vacillation, perplexity, and ignorance of what he should do, was owned by the noble lord himself—habes confitentem reum; and yet he was a bold man, too, for he hoped for shelter even in the storm that threatened and surrounded us. But, when the waves dashed, when the tempest raged, when they heard the wind whistling through the shrouds, would the gentlemen of England so stultify themselves as to continue their confidence in such a pilot at the helm? [Loud cheers.] Could they expect that, under the counsels of such an imbecile government, any country could stand? When we saw boldness and rashness joined to such imbecility, was it not time that they should be checked in their career? We had now been passing through our seven years' transition from war to peace, and nothing had been done. If the noble lord could not find out some beneficial measure, he ought to surrender a power which he could not direct to any good purpose. The noble lord had since the peace, been at conferences, at congresses—he had feasted with princes and sovereigns—he had attended balls and routs with high personages, and he might address to him what had been said on a different occasion—

Lusisti satis, edisti satis, atque bibisti;
Tempus abire tibi est.———

Any ministry at the head of affairs in this country, at this time, ought to be able to look its difficulties in the face, and meet them with corresponding vigour. This could not be done by men whose only object was to get a vote, and to stop discussion—who pretended, when the principle of a measure was before them, that they should postpone the debate to the details, and who then said, that after the details they could not return to the principle—who had, for three years, promised the agriculturists to do something, and who now confessed that they could do nothing—and who, when the latter complained, and justly complained, of high taxes, refused to reduce the establishments by which a part of those taxes might be remitted. Nothing wise or beneficial could be expected from the government unless we had a different set of ministers. It was impossible that the country could long go on under their counsels [Loud cheers].

Mr. Robinson began by stating, that the party invective in which the hon. baronet had indulged, seemed to him ill placed on a debate of this nature. If a specific motion were brought forward involving the conduct of ministers, he should feel no difficulty to meet and answer it. Even if he were to admit the propositions of the hon. baronet, that the present distresses were occasioned by taxation and the late change in the currency, and that the only remedy for them was the reduction of taxation on one hand, and on the other the abrogation of the law which compelled cash payments, yet, as it was not contended that any immediate benefit could result from either of those measures, whatever their remedial effect might ultimately be, he could see no reason why, on the present occasion, the House should not take into consideration the mode in which acknowledged defects in the existing laws relative to the trade in corn could most conveniently be removed. He had always taken this view of the question—that an alteration in the corn laws, either in the shape proposed by his right hon. friend, or the hon. members for Somersetshire and for Wiltshire, could not operate any immediate relief. The immediate pressure upon the agricultural interest arose, it must be admitted, from extreme depression of price, which was partly occasioned by superabundant production. The hon. baronet had ridiculed this argument which had been urged by his noble friend; but he thought he must have done so from misunderstanding its nature. Nobody had ever said that abundance generally was an evil; but, on the other hand, nobody who thought upon the subject at all could deny, that if the quantity of any article produced, exceeded the demand for it, so that the price in the market fell below the cost of its production, the producer must suffer from that circumstance. He had never contended that abundance under any circumstance was an evil. Such an argument would be a libel on the constitution of nature. He had on former occasions always endeavoured to show that none of the proposed alterations in the corn laws could produce immediate relief. He was not insensible to the defects of the existing laws. When it had fallen to his lot to introduce those laws to parliament, it would be recollected that he did not describe them as a benefit, but only as a choice of two evils. He would admit that restrictions upon the trade in corn were not in themselves desirable, and that a new system, of which such restrictions would form no part, might not afford relief to the agriculturists; but still he was decidedly of opinion that good would result from curing the evils of the existing laws. He would go further and say, that if he thought the House could obtain the support of the country in adopting a system of corn laws, founded on the principles so ably laid down by his right hon. friend, such a measure would receive his sanction. But ministers did not deserve to be reproached as they had been by the hon. baronet, as being persons whose continuance in office was the sole cause of all the distresses of the country, and whose removal from their places would be the sole remedy. They ought not to be thus reproached, because they were not prepared to force a measure by the mere force of law against the prejudices of the people. The question for the consideration of the House might be reduced to very narrow limits. It was simply this, whether the proposition of his noble friend was calculated to remedy the particular evil arising out of the present law, which evil the agricultural committee of last session had described as being of considerable magnitude. In his opinion it was. It should be recollected, that when his noble friend proposed the re-appointment of the agricultural committee this session, he stated, that his object was to have the defects of the present corn laws particularly considered; and upon that occasion there were not wanting gentlemen opposite (particularly the member for Waterford), who suggested that the committee should be limited by the instructions of the House to the consideration of that point exclusively. It appeared to him that no such limitation should be imposed upon the committee, and his opinion coincided with that of the House generally; but it was clearly understood, that the subject alluded to would receive particular consideration. The particular evil of the present laws, in his opinion, arose from the change which they permitted from unqualified prohibition to unlimited admission. If it was not thought necessary to abrogate the law altogether, surely it was advisable to render it as fit as possible for its purpose, by the remedy of existing defects! He did not see how the particular evil which he had just stated could be remedied, except by the imposition of duties. The scale of duties proposed by his noble friend, whilst on the one hand they did not tend to raise the price of corn in this country, more than was the case under the existing law, on the other secured to the agriculturist that protection which he at present received, and to which he was, under existing circumstances, entitled. He would ask those who attributed the pressure which prevailed in this country upon the agricultural interest to account for precisely the same pressure which was experienced in almost every corn-producing part of the world. There was at present scarcely a country in Europe, not excepting those which hardly produced corn sufficient for their own consumption, such as Spain and Portugal, which had not established, or was not about to establish, restrictive systems of corn laws. The same distress which was felt in this country prevailed in every part of Europe, and even in the United States of America; where he was confident the hon. baronet would not say it was the effect of severe taxation. He must take the liberty to say this, that if the hon. baronet could convince the House and if his opinions were right, he hoped he would convince them—that all the evils of which the country complained were to be ascribed to ministers, feeling an anxious regard for the country to which he belonged, he trusted the hon. baronet would induce the House to remove them from their situations. But until the hon. baronet could persuade the House to adopt his opinions, he could assure him, that not all his taunts would induce ministers to depart from the line of conduct which they thought it necessary to pursue. They would do what they considered best adapted to the interests of the country; and he did not doubt that if they did their duty the country would support them.

Sir J. Newport was of opinion, that it was impolitic to agitate the question of the corn laws, unless a certain remedy could be proposed for the evils complained of. It would be most expedient to let the existing laws take their course, until the affairs of the agricultural classes both here and abroad should assume a more settled appearance.

Mr. Ricardo, being of opinion that the sufferings of the agriculturists were in a great degree owing to the corn laws, considered the present a fit opportunity for saying a few words upon that subject. Even if he were fully to agree with gentlemen who ascribed the present distresses to the change in the value of the currency and the weight of taxation, still he thought those gentlemen must admit that the corn laws, considered abstractedly without any reference to those two questions, were calculated to produce great evils. One of the principal of these evils was, the unnaturally high price of corn in this country over all other countries. The hon. baronet had admitted, that superabundance would occasion a great fall in the value of corn as well as all other articles. And here he must observe, that there appeared to be a little inconsistency in the arguments of the hon. baronet. In one part of his speech the hon. baronet admitted that a superabundant production of corn would occasion mischief to the extent in which it was at present experienced. [Sir. F. Burdett dissented.] The hon. baronet now said he did not admit this; but he certainly understood him to do so, and to apply the argument to the change in the value of the currency; for he said that those who contended, that the increase of an article beyond a certain limit, would occasion a fall in price greater in proportion than the increase which had taken place, must admit that an alteration in the value of the currency will produce a change in the value of commodities, greater in proportion than the alteration in the value of money. Although he (Mr. R.) was of opinion, that a superabundant supply of an article produced a sinking in the value of the article greater than in proportion to the additional quantity, yet he did not apply this argument to money. He would put a case to the House, to show how a superabundant supply of an article would produce a sinking of its aggregate value much greater than in proportion to the surplus supply. He would suppose, that in a particular country a very rare commodity was introduced for the first time—superfine cloth for instance. If 10,000 yards of this cloth were imported under such circumstances, many persons would be desirous of purchasing it, and the price consequently would be enormously high. Supposing this quantity of cloth to be doubled, he was of opinion that the aggregate value of the 20,000 yards would be much more considerable than the aggregate value of the 10,000 yards, for the article would still be scarce, and therefore in great demand. If the quantity of cloth were to be again doubled, the effect would still be the same; for although each particular yard of the 40,000 would fall in price, the value of the whole would be greater than that of the 20,000. But, if he went on in this way increasing the quantity of the cloth, until it came within the reach of the purchase of every class in the country, from that time any addition to its quantity would diminish the aggregate value. This argument he applied to corn. Corn was an article which was necessarily limited in its consumption: and if you went on increasing it in quantity, its aggregate value would be diminished beyond that of a smaller quantity. He made an exception of this argument in favour of money. If there were only 100,000*l.* in this country, it would answer all the purposes of a more extended circulation; but if the quantity were increased, the value of commodities would alter only in proportion to the increase, because there was no necessary limitation of the quantity of money. The argument of the hon. baronet, to which he had before alluded, was, therefore inapplicable. With respect to the subject more particularly before the House; namely, the evils of the present corn laws, he was of opinion that the farmer would suffer an injury from having too abundant crops. But to look at the other side of the question. Suppose the farmer should have scarce seasons, and that his corn should rise; just at the moment when he would be about to reap the benefit of this circumstance, the ports would be opened, and corn would pour in in unlimited quantities. These evils had been pointed out in the most able manner in the agricultural report, and in the resolutions of his right hon. friend (Mr. Huskisson), to some of which he should be sorry if the House did not agree. In his opinion, not the resolutions of the noble marquis, nor even those of his right hon. friend, and still less those of hon. members on his own side of the House, were at all adequate to remove the evils complained of. How was the evil of an habitually higher price in this country than in foreign countries to be remedied? By making the growing price in this country on a level with that of other nations. If his propositions should be agreed to, for imposing a duty of 10*s.* upon imported corn, and granting a bounty of 7*s.* upon exported corn, he thought it impossible that the price of wheat in this country could ever be materially higher than that of foreign nations. If abundant harvests should occur here, the farmer would have his remedy in exportation. In fixing the duty of 10*s.* upon imported corn, he had been guided by what he thought the circumstances of the case required. He did not intend that the House should adopt the duty of 10*s.* all at once. In the present distressed state of the agriculturists in this country, and taking into consideration the abundant supply of grain on the other side of the water, he was willing to give the farmer protection up to 70*s.*, and then open the ports for importation, commencing with a duty of 20*s.* In his own opinion, this duty of 20*s.* would amount to a total exclusion of foreign corn, but he selected it, because, under the existing laws, all importation was prohibited, and therefore he was not making the situation of the consumer worse than at present, at the same time that he was securing a gradual approach to what he considered right principles. He would state the grounds upon which he calculated the duty of 10*s.* He found it stated in the evidence given before both Houses, that the whole of the charges which the farmer had to pay, which were principally tithes and poor-rates, amounted to about 10*s.* per quarter. The hon. member for Wiltshire said last night, that he desired no more than to have a duty placed upon the importation of corn, calculated on the taxes which fell on the landed interest. He did not understand the calculations of that hon. member, but he called upon him to refute his if he could. If the hon. member admitted their correctness, he should expect the support of his vote. He recommended the imposition of the duty upon imported corn, for the reasons he had before stated, namely, the protection of the farmer in the event of a bad harvest. He contended that he was vindicating the cause of the farmers more effectually than many gentlemen who called themselves their friends.—It was necessary for him to make a few observations upon that part of his plan which provided for the introduction of foreign corn, now in bond, into the home market, subject to a duty of 15*s.* whenever the price of wheat should reach 65*s.* The hon. member for Oxford had said, that this measure would be destructive of the agricultural interest, and that it would reduce the price of corn to 47*s.* But the farmer had the remedy in his own hands. When the price of wheat should arrive at 64*s.*, if he apprehended the influx of foreign grain, he would be in possession of the market, and might dispose of his corn to advantage. He had selected 65*s.* in order to secure the farmer from being placed in competition with the holders of foreign corn in bond and in foreign countries at the same time; he would first have to cope with the former, and if the price should afterwards rise to 70*s.* he would then compete with the latter. It might be right to observe, that a duty of 10*s.* would be fully adequate to protect the farmer even when the ports were opened. According to the evidence before the committee, there appeared to be little danger of the country being overwhelmed by importations. The noble marquis had stated, that the expense of bringing corn from abroad to this country amounted to 10*s.* per quarter. But Mr. Solly, in his evidence, calculated that the expense of growing of corn in the interior of Germany, together with all the charges consequent upon its carriage to this country, would amount to 2*l.* 16*s.* The duty of 10*s.* upon importation would increase this sum to 3*l.* 6*s.* Now, the member for Cumberland was of opinion, that 65*s.* was a fair protecting price; and if so, why did he and other members object to the duty of 10*s.*, which would secure them against importation until the price of wheat should be at least 65*s.*? He could not understand upon what principle the agriculturist could object to his propositions. He was willing to give them not only a remunerating price of 70*s.*, but a duty of 20*s.*, and yet they thought that was not adequate protection. He would take this opportunity of informing the House, that Mr. Solly, to whose evidence he had referred, understanding that the noble marquis had asserted, that the last harvest in Silicia had been so very abundant that it was not considered worth while to reap it, had instructed him (Mr.

R.) to state, that so far from having had an abundant harvest, the inhabitants were reduced to the necessity of buying seed-wheat. The noble marquis's propositions did not appear calculated to remove the existing evils, but rather to confirm them. They would tend to encourage the agriculturist in speculating upon high prices, and would thus produce the same round of evils. He also objected, though in a less degree, to the propositions of his right hon. friend. His right hon. friend proposed a duty of 15*s.* on imported corn without any drawback upon exportation, the consequence of which would be, to make the price of corn in this country habitually 15*s.* higher than in foreign countries. Nobody had more clearly shown the evil of such a circumstance than his right hon. friend, and therefore he was exposed to the charge of inconsistency for having proposed a measure calculated to produce it. The drawback which he (Mr. R.) proposed, would operate in favour of the farmer when he would stand most in need of assistance. He declined entering upon the question of the currency, but he could not avoid making one observation on that subject. Some gentlemen seemed to think that the contraction of two or three millions of the currency had never before the present time taken place. In the report of the committee of 1797, it was stated, that in 1782—at which time the Bank paper in circulation did not amount to more than 8,000,000*l.* or 9,000,000*l.* in addition to coin—an actual reduction of 3,000,000*l.* of the amount of the money in circulation took place.

The chairman then reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again to-morrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, May 8.

COMPLAINT AGAINST THE MORNING CHRONICLE.] Mr. Hume said, he rose to complain of a gross misrepresentation which had that morning appeared in a newspaper, relative to a motion which he had made yesterday for a return of the sums paid to the different newspapers by government for advertisements, &c. So far from finding fault with the animadversions of a public journal, he thought it its province to advert to all public subjects, but, at the same time, as the character of a public man was public property, the writer should take care that his animadversions were not founded on a gross misrepresentation. That misrepresentation was in a note, on a report of his speech in "The Morning Chronicle." He had a regard for that journal, from the correctness with which it collected information, and the impartiality with which it communicated that information to the public. The note was as follows:—"We take this opportunity of addressing a word or two to Mr. Hume. How does he know that 'The Times Newspaper publishes more than any other two papers in England?' However deeply he may be versed in the concerns of The Times Newspaper, he may not be equally so in that of each of the others, and at all events the public would not have thought less of his judgment, if he had not laid claim to any such minute knowledge. His argument certainly did not require that he should; and as The Times takes special care, from time to time, that the world shall know how prosperous they are, it was hardly necessary for him to come forward in parliament to back their affidavits.—For the sake of other papers of which the rank and character may be less firmly established than our own, and which could not with equal safety approach such a subject, we have to observe, that ministers have been guilty of an evident dereliction of duty, in not objecting to the unwarrantable returns respecting newspapers, moved for by Mr. Hume. No principle can be more clear than this, that the knowledge of the private concerns of individuals, which the law gives to government for purposes of revenue ought never to be made use of to the injury of those individuals in the way of their business. If the income tax had been in vigour, Mr. Hume might with as much propriety have moved for a return of the income of any individual with whom government had contracted, or might enter into a contract, on the ground of thereby obtaining matter of crimination against ministers.—We will deal frankly with Mr. Hume. We would advise him once for all to let newspapers alone, if he wishes to render his labours serviceable to the public. We have reported his statement as he delivered it, because we never allow ourselves to garble or intentionally to disfigure speeches delivered either in parliament or elsewhere. We could refer him, however, by way of contrast (to take one out of many instances), to a speech of his own on the 27th February, in which his compliment to a certain morning paper, which he named, is carefully garbled in a certain other morning paper, which we shall not name; a circumstance which those who have a feeling for more than sums and numbers will know how to appreciate."—He had no concern with the quarrels between newspapers. He had not, as was stated, moved for any papers with a view to private transactions, but only to ascertain in what manner the public money paid for advertisements by the public offices was disposed of. He had no anxiety to pry into the private affairs of any one, and no such motion with that object was made by him. The papers laid on the table had been moved for by a noble lord, (J. Russell), and not by him. He had no connection with that motion, and the application of his words was unwarrantable and misplaced. He did not wish to make a formal complaint to the House, nor would he do so of any newspaper as long as he had a seat in parliament; but, as far as regarded his public character, he was anxious that so gross and false a mis-statement should not go forth to the public.

AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS REPORT.] The order of the day was read for going into a committee of the whole House, to consider further of the Report of the Committee on the Agricultural Distress. On the question "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair,"

Mr. Wyvill rose. He said, that the distress of the country was so paramount at the present moment, that no consideration should deter him from doing what he conceived to be his duty. Two committees had been appointed; but the result of their labours had been any thing rather than satisfactory. It appeared to him, that the resolutions now before the House were likely to do any thing rather than afford relief; and, indeed, the noble marquis who had brought forward some of them, admitted that they were not calculated to give relief immediately. With such a view of the subject, he proposed to take the sense of the House upon the only resolution which to him seemed capable of meeting the difficulty. Two courses only presented themselves of relief. The first was, the repeal of Mr. Peel's bill; the second was, a reduction of of taxes. Now, to the repeal of Mr. Peel's bill he was averse. The country had proceeded so far with the difficulty, that he, for one, was prepared to go through with it. The applicable remedy, therefore, was, the reduction of taxes, and that remedy was called for from one end of the country to the other. It was allowed, that the produce of English corn was about, upon an average, 50,000,000 of quarters a year. Of this amount 5,000,000 quarters were taken as tithe; 8,000,000 were consumed as seed; 22,000,000 were taken by the agricultural interest; and 15,000,000, therefore, were left for the agriculturist to carry to market. Now, a reduction of taxes, to the amount of 20,000,000*l.* a year would operate towards the agriculturist as a relief of 10,000,000*l.* a year—forming a change of full 30 per cent in his favour. Such a measure might seem a sweeping one; but it was the only one from which permanent relief could be expected. There was not a measure now before the House which, if in action tomorrow, could remain in action six months. He would therefore move, by way of amendment, "That it is the opinion of this House, that the best and most effectual relief that can be given to the agricultural interest is a large remission of taxation."

Mr. Lockhart said, that a reduction of taxes would, in his opinion, be tantamount to a breach of national faith; for with such a reduction, it would be impossible to pay the interest of the national debt. No one of the 500 petitions from the agricultural classes went the length of this motion of the hon. member. He had heard the distress ascribed to a superabundant produce; but of this he was not satisfied. The notion appeared to owe its origin to the early sales of corn at low prices; but if he were to see in a pawnbroker's shop an unusual quantity of wearing apparel, he should not therefore believe that there was a superabundance of that article, though, assuredly, he should believe that the consumers were distressed. But, whatever was the cause of the distress, he conceived the proposition of the hon. member for Portarlington was altogether unsound. It would have the effect of throwing much of the poor land out of cultivation; a measure so destructive to those interested in it, that had he not known the amiable disposition of that hon. member, he should be disposed to question his motives. The persons engaged in the cultivation of these lands could not successfully look for employment in any other direction, as the manufactures were already overstocked. The number, too, of these persons would be very considerable; for there were large tracts of poor land all over the country; especially in Norfolk, Bucks, Cambridge, Huntingdon, Oxford, and Gloucester. There would be considerable danger to be apprehended from those persons thus brought to distress by acts of the legislature. But, at all events, it was not to a reduction of taxation that they looked for relief. It was to protecting duties; and on this part of the subject he was glad to find that the noble marquis thought a provision should be made against sudden and strong competition in the market. To proceed on this basis, the House should satisfy itself on two points. The first was, the price of corn, generally, at Dantzic and other northern places. He was here much surprised to find that the evidence of Mr. Solly stated the average price at from 43 to 48*s*. This he conceived could not be a fair average; as he was satisfied the general price on an average was not more than 24*s*. The noble marquis thought that, on this part of the subject, a trifling variance was of no great or particular consequence; but surely the noble marquis was not at this moment, to be informed, that a shilling difference in the bushel of wheat made a difference amounting to the whole rent. The mistake of a shilling only would therefore drive the English grower out of the field. The second point to ascertain was the amount of protecting duty. This also would depend on the average price at Dantzic and other northern places. He had already stated his belief that this average was 24*s*.; but he would take it even at 30*s*. Allowing, then, 5*s*. for profit, 5*s*. for freight, and 15*s*. for duty (instead of the 12*s*. proposed by the noble marquis), this would make 55*s*. only; and yet a resolution proposed by the noble marquis himself, admitted that the English grower could not sell at less than 70*s*. The English grower must therefore come down to the price of the foreigner or not sell at all. He only wanted protection for the English farmer, no matter whether it was caused by a duty of 5*s*. or by one of 50*s*. It was indifferent to him at what price he sold, provided he could be ensured from the competition of the foreigner. And here he could not but express his surprise that the agricultural committee had not noticed the petitions for protecting duties on other articles of the soil besides corn. All that the agricultural classes wished was, that they might be allowed to live, to pay their taxes, and to support government.

Lord Althorp said, he entirely agreed in the principle of the amendment, and referred, as a proof of his assertion, to the various votes which he had given during the present session. At the same time he wished the House to go into the proposed committee—not that he looked upon the inquiry in which it was engaged as calculated to afford immediate relief, but that he thought the present corn laws so bad, that any of the proposed resolutions would be much better.

Mr. Monck said, that the only mode of relieving the present agricultural distress, was by an immediate repeal of taxes to a very considerable amount. He had heard much respecting low prices; yet even under these low prices, bread was 100 per cent dearer in England than it was in France. In 1792, and for the nine years previous, the price of wheat was 44*s*. a quarter. During the American war the price was 42*s*. a quarter, though for nine years antecedent it had been 46*s*. a quarter. There were, however, sufficient causes to account for the difference which existed between the state of things in 1792 and at present. In 1792, the charge for the national debt was 10,000,000*l*.; now it was 30,000,000*l*. In 1792, the naval and military establishments of the country cost 7,000,000*l*.; now they cost 18,000,000*l*. In 1792, the sinking fund, which circumstances rendered necessary, amounted to 1,000,000*l*. or 1,200,000*l*.; now it amounted to 5,000,000*l*. The poor-rates in 1792 amounted only to 2,000,000*l*; now they approximated to 7,000,000*l*. Upon the whole, the expenditure of 1792 did not amount to 20,000,000*l*.; now it amounted to 70,000,000*l*.; or, in other words, since 1792, the taxes and poor-rates had been nearly quadrupled. He maintained that the taxes and poor-rates entirely extinguished the profits of agriculture. It was idle to take off a million here and a million there. Nothing would do any good except a great and efficient retrenchment. He should, therefore, support this amendment.

Sir R. Wilson said, he had not hitherto remained silent on this momentous question of agricultural distress from any want of sympathy in that distress, but from the hope that hon. gentlemen would see the fallacy of attempting to relieve that distress by partial measures. Finding, however, that the measures having a tendency to raise the quartern loaf to half-a-crown and three shillings were seriously advocated in that House, he felt himself called upon to declare his sentiments. If the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Somersetshire were acceded to, the whole country would be alarmed with the apprehension of dearth; that apprehension would occasion discontent, that discontent, would give birth to fresh innovations on the rights and liberties of the people of England; and he had seen enough of a coercive government, and had suffered too much as its' victim, not, if possible, to withhold from it all pretext for increased action. He could not pretend to say what produced the present agricultural distress. The hon. member for Portarlington was of opinion that it arose from an over-abundant produce. He could not, however, bring himself to believe that this was the case. It had been said, and truly, that the corn in France had fallen in price. But notwithstanding this—had the farmer become a pauper or had sought alms? No such thing. Not only the farmer, but the peasant, was well fed in that country. He had never conversed with a peasant in France, who did not appear perfectly content with his situation; they had all three or four good meals a day. True, they sold their corn cheap, but then they purchased their leather and their salt cheap also; they could purchase wax candles cheaper than we could obtain tallow candles. He could go home without being pursued by the tax-gatherer. Could the English peasant or farmer do the same? In fact as to taxation, the situations of England and France were widely different. In France there was a population of 30,000,000, who paid between them a taxation of 34,000,000*l.* being little more than one pound per head. In England we had a population of 17 millions, but we were subject to a taxation amounting to 64,000,000*l.*, exclusive of tythes and poor-rates, making about 3*l.* 10*s.* per head. He wished that faith should be kept with the public creditor, but he was convinced that by a revision of the civil list, and of the general expenditure of the country, ten millions of taxes might be taken off.

Mr. Hudson Gurney said, that he could not vote for the motion of the hon. gentleman. In the present situation of the finances of the country, it was obviously impossible that the taxation could be diminished in the degree he had proposed. And even if it were possible, it would go to increase the present instant embarrassment, whatever relief it might prove hereafter. Every one at that time in the House must remember when the right hon. gentleman at the head of the board of trade brought in the present Corn bill, that the country gentlemen on all sides of the House loudly declared that in asking the monopoly of the corn market for themselves, they had not the slightest idea of raising prices; but that their lands if thus protected, would be so cultivated that prices would greatly fall, and that low prices were what they wished. The government looked further than the squirealty,—what they wanted being, to give the monopoly of the English corn market to Ireland. It was curious to see how the views of both parties had been fulfilled. The prices had fallen, to the utter ruin of the tenantry, and the infinite embarrassment of the landlord; while the Irish had sent all their corn to England for money, and had left whole counties in their own country, as it now appeared, to starve!—But, the real cause of the distress was, the altered value of the currency. The speech of the hon. member for Callington (Mr. Attwood) had been unanswered, and was unanswerable. We are now told, that the best wheat sells for 55*s.* a quarter—that it did sell for 106 shillings. But, let any body look back to what the shillings then were, and they would see that the bushel of wheat now exchanges for nearly as much pure silver as it did then.—Mr. G. said, that, though not at the time a member of the House, he happened to be in the gallery when the present master of the mint brought down his propositions for the new coinage of silver. When the hon. gentleman he now saw below him, the member for Tavistock, then member for Grimsby (Mr. J. P. Grant) was the only man in the House who foresaw the consequences of that first operation; who told them they were ignorant of what they were doing; and who distinctly then forewarned them of all the difficulties and all the distresses which had since ensued.—As to what ought now to be done, his majesty's ministers seemed completely at a loss,—the House in perfect ignorance. For himself, he did not pretend to have the slightest idea. But he owned that from their proceedings he was driven to fear, rather than led to hope. Stir which way they might, they were more likely to do mischief than good. But, the only three things in his opinion, they could resort to, would be, to put a great seignorage on the coin—to substitute a free trade to a commerce shackled and manacled every way—to take off all taxes very burthensome or very vexatious in their collection, and to replace them by a fair and adequate property tax.

Mr. Western agreed, that the most effectual relief for the distresses of agriculture would be found in a reduction of taxes, and his hon. friend's motion should therefore have his decided approbation. But he was equally anxious to press upon their consideration, a repeal of that act (Mr. Peel's bill) which had increased that distress beyond any thing contemplated at the time by the promoters of the measure. Until they had fully grappled with that bill, it would be in vain to seek any remedy. To discuss any scale of prices or measure of duty, without looking steadily at that bill, was to place the subordinate before the primary consideration. To talk of price until they had ascertained the measure of value they had to give, was quite delusive. The price they had first to settle, was the price of money [Hear, hear], and that would regulate all the other measures. Did the House think the industry of the country could bear this oppressive accumulation arising out of the act of 1819? The noble marquis had said, that the price of Dantsic wheat was 45*s*. per quarter; and he had mentioned that sum to found upon it his measure of protecting duties; but the noble marquis forgot that the 45*s*. which he had named ought to have been estimated according to the depreciated currency of this country: he had not named the real or cost price, but an assumed value to be measured upon a depreciated currency. It by no means followed, if that allowance were made, that 45*s*. must be the price to the Dantsic grower. He might, and no doubt would, grow at 30*s*. and have a profit in the bargain. He could not too often repeat, that the higher the money price of corn the lower would be the labour price in real effect. By raising the money price of corn, they would practically lighten the weight of taxation, and reduce the real price upon the labourer. He disclaimed any desire to raise the price of any of the articles of life upon the labouring classes: but their condition would be materially improved, if the whole subject were reconsidered in the manner he had mentioned. The immense weight of charge upon the country could not be borne, according to the standard of value unfortunately fixed in 1819. Without a reconsideration of that measure, any attempt to afford relief was impossible. The bill of 1819 was the greatest calamity the public had endured in modern times. He for one would not refuse a permission to import foreign corn, if the state of the country required its introduction; and he would take the average of the last 20 years, for the purpose of regulating the nature of that importation. Care should be taken that the admission of foreign corn was confined to the necessity of the case, and that it was not permitted to overwhelm the British agriculturist at the moment when the country had no necessity for the aid of the foreign grower. It would be most important to govern that necessity, and not to place England as a dependent upon other powers for any considerable share of the supply of the necessaries of subsistence.

Mr. Secretary Peel said, that the hon. member had objected much to the bill in 1819. Now, as it was the intention of the hon. member to bring that measure separately under the consideration of the House, he should feel it unnecessary to say any thing further upon it at that moment. The question involved so many important considerations that it ought not to be mixed up with the agricultural question. It was obvious that any alteration in the existing standard must go to alter all the contracts that had been entered into since 1819; and the consequent mischief must be evident to every one. If it was correct that under such an accumulation of burthens and privations, the taxation which bore upon the agricultural interest, had increased in the ratio of 40*l*. per cent, he was impressed, more than ever, with an idea of the immense resources of the country and more than ever anticipated her gradual but certain recovery from temporary depression.

Mr. John Williams addressed the House for the first time. He said, that if he thought that in now presenting himself to the notice of the chair, he was at all interfering with, or delaying the consideration of, the relief to be extended for those distresses which the House was called upon to remedy, he should think himself without excuse. But, it was only because he believed that his duty obliged him to assign his reasons for supporting the motion of his hon. friend, and that by such a course he was not opposing any measure that could afford present relief, that he offered himself to the notice of the House. What was the language of the petitions, under the accumulated burthen of which their table groaned? It was not that the petitioner asked for some distant and speculative relief—for some modification of this or that system—for some specific alteration of the corn laws, which might affect the rising generation, when the present race of corn-growers was swept away; but their language had undeviatingly been, that they required to be instantly relieved, or must die. What was it to the sufferers of the present generation, whether the plan of the right hon. gentleman, or some other, at a more distant period, should or should not be adopted. Since the noble lord's experiment had been withdrawn, an attempt had been made by an hon. gentleman near him, and by an hon. baronet, to praise it, and if possible, to give it an adequate panegyric. For that experiment, none other had been substituted, possessing any thing like an immediately remedial aspect. What then, was the present complexion of the affairs before the House? In proportion as the wisdom of the wise was found to be deficient, there was abundant reason for their recurring to the plain, homebred, direct, and forcible language of the petitioners themselves. What had that language been? Of all the petitions on this subject which the House had heard, there was not one that had submitted more than one or two remedies; and these were a reformation in the Commons House of parliament, and a reduction of taxation. As to the first of these suggestions, after the decision which the House had so recently come to, he would be the last man to revive the discussion; but this he would say, that he heartily regretted that he had not had an opportunity of adding one name to the minority upon that occasion. But as to taxation, would any body say, that its reduction would not have some effect upon the distress? He begged to be understood as speaking, not of any definite amount of reduction, but of the necessity of reducing. If gentlemen should say, that its amount must necessarily be but small, he should answer, that even in that case it would be better than none. If he should be told, that the repeal of the tax upon leather, upon salt, upon candles, would do but little in the way of reduction, his reply would be, that still it would do something—that it would be advancing a step towards the only effectual remedy for the evil. But the proposals which were before the House could have no operation except to mislead the public opinion and to withdraw from the people that which they had hitherto possessed—a manly fortitude. Was it that parliament could devise no effective remedy? If that House had really no remedy to apply, it would be much better manfully to avow the fact, and to state, that as this was the case of distresses such as had never before arisen in the country, so the wisdom of parliament was incompetent to provide a remedy for them. Was it not, however, clear, that to remit taxes must be to afford relief? Did any man mean to say, that much, very much, might not yet be done in the work of reduction? Was that a lesson which ministers had still to learn? Would any one assert that this was a doctrine which was self-taught, or innate in those ministers, or in any others? Not only was it not innate in them, but he would go further, and say, that government began to practise it, just at the precise moment when gentlemen who had the misfortune or the happiness to have constituents began to desert the government; and when the latter found it to be no longer advisable to disregard the remonstrances of those constituents. Ministers began to practice the doctrine of effecting a saving in the expenditure of the country, at the precise time when parliament began to be sparing in supply. Mention had been made of the expenses of our colonies; and here, again, a fair field was open for reduction. Such colonies as did not repay to us the expenses we were put to on their account, or for the support of which there did not exist some paramount political necessity, ought to be abandoned. There was another species of retrenchment which was abundantly open to the House. It was one which he did not speak of as in its nature pleasurable; but this was a moment of necessity, when such considerations were not to weigh with the House. He alluded to a reduction in the allowances or salaries of all those persons, from the highest to the lowest, who were paid from the taxes raised upon the country. Lamentations had been uttered, that that House was receding, day after day, from the favour, approbation, and good will of the people of England. He knew not what other means might be suggested for reviving those feelings in the people;

but he conceived that their good-will would never be regained, until motions like that of his hon. friend should be favourably entertained; until the House insured their regard and confidence, by manifesting an anxious desire to alleviate their distress; or (which he considered to be the only other alternative) until parliament should revive its too long antiquated practice, the power of control over the supplies. Feeling, therefore, that no other direct remedy was now proposed; feeling also, that the motion of his hon. friend, if carried, would certainly go to re-establish the confidence of the people in that House, he had great pleasure in supporting that motion.

Mr. Philips said, that because the motion went to recommend a reduction of taxes, he would give it his support. The ground upon which he had felt, at the close of his hon. friend's speech, that he could not vote for his motion was, that he had supposed him (Mr. W.) to have insisted upon such a reduction of taxation as could not be effected without defrauding the public creditor. As his hon. friend appeared to disclaim these intentions, he would support his motion. An hon. friend had recommended a return to a depreciated paper currency. Now, the country having most wisely adopted a metallic currency, it would be worse than inexpedient to go back to one of paper. The present agricultural distress arose from the charges which now fell on the farmer which he had not formerly to sustain. These made the prices which would formerly remunerate him insufficient. His tithes had increased—wages had increased—poor-rates had increased—and his taxation had enormously increased. Tithes and wages had in some measure settled themselves; and poor-rates had been reduced in something like a proportion to the diminished price of provisions. To him, therefore, it appeared, that the only way which the agricultural interest could be relieved by parliament, was, by the remission of taxes. The circumstances of the country were such, that the public expenditure must be reduced. That House ought not to rest satisfied with voting against the continuance of two lords of the admiralty, or with doing away one of the post-masters-general. They ought to carry retrenchment and economy into every department.

Sir I. Coffin said, that a gallant member seemed to consider that Frenchmen were much better fed than the people of this country. Now, he had been in all parts of France, and had seen nothing but what led him to come to an opposite conclusion. It was not going too far to say, that an English farmer eat as much at one meal as a Frenchman consumed in four. The nobility, gentry, clergy, and yeomanry of England, were better off than those of any country in the world.

Mr. K. Douglas said, that diminution of taxation, though good in itself, would, if carried to too great an extent, prove very injurious. He disapproved of a motion which sought the attainment of a particular object by a side wind.

Mr. Curwen would vote for the motion, because it called for a remission of taxes. He feared the period was not very remote, when the only means that would remain for saving the agricultural interest would be, to call on the monied interest to bear a part of the burthen. He should, therefore, infinitely regret that any remedy should have been omitted to be applied for the purpose of averting such a calamity.

Mr. Denis Brown rejoiced in the motion having been made, as it would afford the House an opportunity of proving in what light it beheld a proposition which would go to prevent the dividends from being paid, and lead to a revolution.

Mr. Beaumont said, the only way to prevent a revolution would be, to relieve the country from the distress under which it laboured; and how were those difficulties to be removed but by the repeal of oppressive taxes?

Mr. Brougham would support the motion, not because it had a tendency to prevent the House from going into a committee, but because the motion put in issue a principle of great importance.

The Marquis of Londonderry wished the House to bear in mind the general principle for which the hon. mover was disposed to contend, namely, a remission of taxes to the amount of 20,000,000*l*. It would be well that those who thought of giving the motion their support, should first consider whether they were disposed to favour the confiscation of property to that amount. The committee ought to know what was meant by those who voted for the motion.

Mr. Tierney said, he was quite as much averse to revolution as the hon. gentleman. The motion did no more than establish a principle; and he could have no objection to it, unless it had the effect of putting an end to the discussion of the resolutions. Whatever their merits, it was admitted, that they would give no immediate relief; whereas the amendment was calculated to produce that effect. If he were asked, whether it ought to have been brought forward now, he should answer in the negative. If sufficient notice had been given, a fuller attendance might have been obtained. He should not vote for it, because he thought that 20 millions of taxes might be taken off; nor did he support it because he thought it would endanger public credit; but because, in the words of the resolution, immediately to reduce taxation would be "the best and most effectual relief to the agricultural interest."

Mr. Bright thought, that a great reduction of taxes was necessary, might be made, and would afford very considerable relief.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, it was generally understood that those who voted for a motion acquiesced in the arguments by which it was supported—[Cries of "No, no!"]. Those who did not do so would do well to avow their motives; and he was glad that so many had done so, to avoid being thought favourable to a proposition which was revolutionary in its tendency.

Mr. Powlett supported the motion, but wished to qualify his vote as to the amount of taxes which it was practicable to reduce.

Mr. Benett, of Wilts, did not concur with the hon. mover in any thing but the vote he should give. As the greatest relief might be afforded by lessening the weight of taxation, he was, almost against his will, compelled to support the amendment.

Mr. T. Wilson was disposed to vote for the remission of taxation to the utmost extent to which it could with safety be carried; but the present motion was brought forward under circumstances so deeply affecting the honour and good faith of the country, that he felt it to be his duty not only to vote against it, but to call upon every reflecting man to pause before he gave a vote for a proposition, which might be productive of infinite mischief.

PAIRED OFF.

Gurney, R. H.

The House then resolved itself into the committee; and the adjourned debate being resumed,

Mr. Benett, of Wilts, addressed the committee. He said, that the act which had restored cash payments had virtually added 35 per cent to the taxes and to the private debts of individuals. He thought it would yet be necessary for them to retrace their steps, or the country could never recover from its present depression. It was said, that the present corn bill had given the agriculturists a monopoly; but he could never discover that it had benefitted the landed interest. It, indeed, prevented the importation of grain for a time, till the price rose to 80*s*., but when the ports opened, it subjected the country to an inundation of foreign grain, from which it could never recover. Whenever the price of corn should again rise to 80*s*., besides throwing open the ports, the present bill would cause foreign corn to the amount of a million of quarters to be thrown on the country. He therefore contended, that a protecting duty on foreign corn was necessary; and he could not conceive on what grounds this could be opposed by those who were friendly to a free trade in grain, and who wished its price to be low. What they had to do then was, to ascertain the price at which the protecting duty could be equitably imposed. The price of wheat in the foreign market very much depended upon the fact whether the ports of Great Britain were or were not open; and on this account, as well as others, it was extremely difficult to ascertain the real price on the continent. The first point was the cost of production abroad. He had taken considerable pains to learn the price at which sales had been made in the Baltic, and his information differed materially from that of the hon. member for Portarlington. Mr. Solly, in his evidence, indeed, had said, that it would cost 2*l*. 16*s*. per quarter if brought from the interior of Germany; but he might just as well have said from the interior of India. Why was it necessary to bring it from the interior of Germany? [Mr. Ricardo said, "Poland."] Whether it were Germany or Poland was not of much consequence. He had been favoured with a detailed statement of the prices at Memel in January last, by which it appeared, that the average was 33*s*. 10*d*. He therefore made his calculation thus—Price of the wheat 1*l*. 14*s*.; freight and insurance 4*s*.; landing and warehousing 2*s*.; profit at 15 per cent 3*s*.; duty 1*l*. 4*s*.; in all 67*s*. This was the protecting price he proposed to fix. The foreign importer would be able to bring his corn to market at 67*s*.; and if British wheat were sold at that price, it would give merely the rents of 1792. One circumstance had been omitted in all the calculations, viz. the over-measure. The committee had had one honest man before it, who told them what the over-measure amounted to, and hence it appeared that it gave 5 per cent additional to the profit of the importer, making it in the whole 20 per cent, whereas he (Mr. B.) had only calculated it at 15 per cent. It might be asked, why the land-owner was to receive the rents of 1792? In the first place, because, like the merchant or manufacturer, he was entitled to a fair profit on his capital which was invested in land. In the next place, because it was a favourite year of reference with many gentlemen on the score of retrenchment; and thirdly, because the currency was then, as now, gold. It was admitted on all hands, that the farmer was entitled to protection to the amount of taxes he paid beyond what were borne by the foreign grower. Now, the taxes, tithes, poor-rates, &c. on a quarter of wheat, amounted to 1*l*. 10*s*. 8*d*. the quarter; but he (Mr. B.) only claimed protection for the farmer to the extent of 24*s*., allowing 6*s*. 8*d*. as the cost of importation. It was his decided opinion, that the community might be better fed by the British farmer, than by the British merchant. On a series of years the British farmer could also do it more cheaply than the merchant, who relied on foreign supply. Cultivation, therefore, ought not to be discouraged. The object of the legislature of every state ought to be, to make the people as happy and comfortable as possible? To make the inhabitants of these islands merely a manufacturing people — to set them to work machinery — to withdraw the peasantry from their present healthful occupations —to reduce and deprave the yeomanry, the shopkeepers, and the gentry of the country now residing on their estates, might add to the temporary riches, but could add nothing to the permanent happiness of the people. The example of Holland, according to Adam Smith, showed that in such a manner the real interests of a state could never be promoted. Hitherto the nation had mainly depended upon itself for food, and it ought to do so still; for what, he would ask, would have been the situation of Great Britain during the late contest, had it been otherwise? She must have been compelled to accept any terms the conqueror of Europe thought fit to impose. The noble marquis opposite had contended, that it was impossible to force a duty of 24*s*. a quarter on wheat imported. Had the House heard any objection to the imposition of such a duty? Had any petitions against that duty been presented from any part of the country? The whole country was anxious that the landed interest should have such a protection as was necessary; and a duty of 24*s*. per quarter was not more than enough. Surely it was not right to say that any measure which was intended for the good of the country was meant by the House of Commons to be forced on the people. An hon. member had cautioned the House not to lean too much to the landed interest. Now, had they ever seen any particular leaning to that interest? The landed interest had lost its weight in that House, and it never would regain it until it sent individuals to parliament who, divested of all party feelings, would conscientiously take care of the interests of those by whom their own estates were occupied. The landholders had acted upon a narrow principle. They had never offered any particular objection to measures introduced exclusively for the protection of trade and manufactures. They had a short time ago agreed to a measure relative to the silk trade, which gave to the British manufacturer a perfect monopoly of that trade; and it should be observed, that silk was naturally a foreign, not a British fabric. Again, they had agreed to a bounty on the exportation of linens, and a prohibition on their importation. The hon. member for Portarlington—(and no man admired the justness of his political theories more than he did)—had observed in one of his publications, that all bodies should be allowed protecting duties, or none. Now, without meaning any thing invidious, he should be glad to know on what pretence were protecting duties refused to the land-owner, while they were lavished on the manufacturer? He asked for nothing but justice. He only desired, that the same protecting duties should be extended to the land-owners which were granted to others. He should be as glad as any political economist of the present day, to see a free trade established; but, under the existing circumstances of the country, he believed it would be impossible to establish it. If the fundholder could pay himself—if all the taxes could be defrayed—and the great burthens of the country supported by means of a free trade, then, indeed, every protection, might with propriety be refused to the landholder. But, so long as the fundholder was obliged to look to the landholder for the security of his debt, he could see no reason why the latter should be excluded from a fair protection. He would request the fundholder to consider, what benefit he had derived, and was deriving, from the measure commonly called Mr. Peel's bill. That measure had certainly conferred on them a benefit of from 30 to 40 per cent. That measure had occasioned a very great change of property. It had taken the land from the landholder, and transferred it to the fundholder. Many gentlemen were aware of this circumstance, but no one knew it better than he did. The stockholder or money-jobber would, he supposed, make a very good landholder in time. That class of persons were now taking estates out of the hands of families in which they had been preserved from generation to generation. This system might go on for some time. The Treasury would have its receipts: as the old landlord went out, a new one would come in; the former could not pay taxes, the latter could. But, would the country allow such injustice to be practised against so large a body as the landholders of England? Such a system could not continue. The landholders had borne all the evils which had been poured on them with great patience—so patiently, indeed, that they had been compared with their own sheep. But, patient as they were, they would not suffer themselves to "fall to cureless ruin," without making some effort to retrieve themselves. It was cruel, that men, who, during a long war, had behaved themselves with so much public spirit—who had showed that they loved the constitution of their country, and were ready to sacrifice their lives in its defence—it was cruel, that such men should be reduced to their present calamitous situation. The hon. member concluded by stating, that he would not propose his resolutions until the House had decided on those of the hon. member for Somersetshire and of the noble marquis opposite.

Mr. Cripps said, that amongst the number of plans which had been submitted to their consideration, it was impossible to find one that could be wholly approved of. They were, therefore, called on to decide which of these six evils—for he believed there were six sets of resolutions—was the least. Much had been said about the good effects which would be produced by a remission of taxation. Now, a reduction of 8*s.* a quarter had taken place on malt and barley, and malt and barley had fallen in price ever since. A hope was entertained that this remission would have produced an increased consumption and an increased price; but it had totally failed. With respect to the measures now before the House, there was not one that could do permanent good to the agricultural interest, except that proposed by the hon. member for Somersetshire. But still he could not support it; because, if a measure were carried in conformity with his plan, the table of the House would be loaded with petitions from those who must be materially affected by it. He agreed that the agricultural interest alone was not depressed, but that every other body in the state felt the pressure of the present period. Some gentlemen had complained of the operation of the corn law. If that law had given the British farmer a monopoly, surely it was not prejudicial to agriculture. It appeared that no foreign imports had affected the price of the corn market. He therefore inferred, that the corn bill had, up to this time, secured a monopoly to the British farmer. The only danger, then, to be dreaded was, that should corn arrive at 80*s.* per quarter, there would be an inundation of foreign grain. That ought to be prevented, and therefore he should vote for the resolutions of the noble marquis, although he wished the importation price to have been rather higher. The resolutions of the hon. member for Portarlington, he considered as the next best; but these, if the price of grain should advance, and if there should be a large crop elsewhere and a scanty one here, would leave the farmer without protection. The House could do no other than negative the resolutions of the hon. baronet. He was sorry they could not be carried; but this was impossible without bringing all the other interests of the country before them as petitioners.

Mr. Brogden, the chairman, suggested, that it would tend to simplify the proceedings of the committee, if the several propositions were submitted to them seriatim, beginning with the highest scale of duties, instead of taking the sense of the committee on the several amendments.

Mr. Bankes said, that the hon. baronet (sir T. Lethbridge) thought the present period peculiarly favourable for legislating on the corn laws; because the price of corn being very low, there was no danger of any person opposing the agricultural interest. But, he requested those who entertained this opinion to read the resolution of the committee of last year, and say, what there was in the present system of the country which should induce the House to form a different opinion from that which they then entertained? The House had received a specific recommendation from that committee not to legislate at all upon the subject. The only circumstance that could induce him to legislate, would be, if there was any prospect of the price of wheat reaching 80*s.*, so as to allow an importation of foreign corn; because, if that occurred, such an inundation of grain would be poured into the country as the present land-owners never could recover. An hon. baronet (sir F. Burdett) seemed to think, that the importation of foreign corn ought to be allowed. But, with the exception of his solitary opinion, all other persons thought that the importation of foreign corn was an evil that ought to be guarded against at almost any risk. He was willing to leave the farmer under the protection of the act of 1811; and, should, what was scarcely within the verge of possibility, the price rise above 80*s.*, then he would legislate so far as to prohibit the importation of foreign grain for a given period. Suppose the measure were to extend to the 25th of March next, the House would then be sitting, and could take such farther steps as might be necessary. He believed there were now 700,000 quarters of foreign wheat in the country. The quantity placed in warehouses last year, almost doubled the quantity imported in ordinary years. There was, no doubt, a superabundant crop of corn in this country in the year before last; but he doubted whether last year there was even an average crop. The British market was in an unnatural state, and he believed all the foreign markets were in the same situation. He would then ask, was that the time to legislate with respect to the price to which the importation of corn should be restricted? They ought to wait until the markets were in a natural state, and then they could consider at what price corn might be imported, and under what duties, if duties were to be imposed at all. Suppose the ports were opened by an accidental rise of price to 80*s.* In that case, he confessed he knew not what duty he could venture to propose, by which the agricultural interest could be preserved. To maintain the duties of the hon. baronet would be impossible. When the quantity of produce was of such amount that the demand had no control over it, permanent relief could only come from the operation of the seasons, or from those changes to which our uncertain climate was so subject. Periods of several successive years together, or what were called cycles, during which the seasons were uniformly unfavourable, sometimes occurred. The years 1709 and 1710 were portions of one of these cycles, in which corn rose to considerably above double its ordinary price, and was as high at one moment as 3*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.* per quarter. From 1740 to 1745 was also an interval during which, as well as in 1756 and 1757, the price of corn reached a great height. The present act had been fully discussed for two sessions, when the only difference was as to the extent of protection; and yet it now appeared to have done infinite mischief, instead of benefit to agriculture. This should warn them against legislating prematurely, or without necessity, on a question like the present. On the subject of the corn trade, principles were now carried to an extreme, as if every restriction ought to be removed, and we should become citizens of the world. The hon.

baronet (sir F. Burdett) wished for a perfectly free trade in corn, and even argued that it would give relief to agricultural distress. But this principle, if acted upon, must necessarily lead to a free trade in all articles of manufacture, and in all raw materials. Now this might be right, but it was not the system under which the country had acquired its wealth and power. That system was one of restriction, upon all articles of home produce, and upon none more than corn. They might be much wiser than their ancestors; but he was not disposed to consider them such fools as modern philosophy would make them out to have been. They had been wise enough to make a little country a very great one, and to acquire for it fame and power far beyond the apparent proportion of its means and resources. A free trade in corn must necessarily make our imports larger, and if we had greater imports we must become more dependant upon foreign countries. There would be some hon. gentlemen old enough to remember that at the beginning of the present century, great alarm existed on account of scarce crops, the increase of prices, and an apprehended inadequacy of the home produce to meet the consumption. It was now curious to see the sudden, absurd, and, as he thought, unreasonable change which had taken place in the general opinion. At that time it was considered a matter of great triumph that a hundred enclosures had taken place in one year, and all our attention was turned to bring the produce to an average supply. He did not wish this feeling to have changed. He should consider it to be a public calamity if one acre of the land so enclosed should be now thrown out of cultivation. If they refused to protect agriculture, the question was, whether they would turn the country from an agricultural one to a manufacturing one. At the present time there was an evident tendency to this, and he thought the country was more manufacturing than was good for it already. He was disposed to give all just encouragement to agriculture, in order that capital should not be withdrawn from the land. Some hon. members said, that if capital would not pay in agriculture, it might be put somewhere else. He would ask them where it was to be employed? Our manufactures were, he hoped, as they had been stated to be, in a state of activity and prosperity. But he deemed it impracticable to increase them, in any considerable degree, without general detriment. It was fearful to contemplate the inroads that had been made upon the capital employed in land within the last five years; and that made it necessary that they should protect what remained. By encouraging foreign agriculturists instead of our own, they would be reducing those who had formed the strength of the country to irretrievable ruin. This must be the result of the liberal doctrines of the day, if they were adopted and acted upon by the House. The alteration in the currency had, to a certain extent, operated to keep up the distress; but its effect had been greatly exaggerated. With regard to that, as well as taxation, being the chief causes of distress, he had never heard any reasons advanced why they ought to be treated in any other than the lightest manner. Since the close of the war 18 millions of taxes had been reduced and that without affording relief to agriculture. The greatest further remission which he had heard proposed was that of five millions; and what benefit could be expected from that, after the experience they had seen. The hon. member concluded by reminding the House of the fable of the bundle of sticks, and conjuring them to hold the interests of the country bound up together. If they did so, they would be safe. But if they became disunited, and suffered the political economists to pull one out of the bundle, they would all be broken up. Let them look to agriculture as the chief stick, and protect it as far as lay in their power. But above all, let them continue to follow in the course by which their ancestors had made a small country become a great one, and he had no doubt but they would eventually triumph over temporary difficulty, and remove every obstacle in the way of permanent prosperity.

Mr. Huskisson said, he would state very shortly the course which he had taken during this session, and his motives in tendering the resolutions which he had offered. It was known, that he had abstained altogether from attending the agricultural committee this year. He felt great satisfaction in hearing his noble friend say, that, after the treatment he had experienced from several members of the committee of last year, he was fully justified in abstaining from its duties this year. Of the report of this year he would say nothing; but if there was in it any of that mystification so falsely imputed to the report of last year, it was very short, and what the French would term, a mystification of themselves. Of the former report he would say, that in its principles its view of the law of 1815, its general view of what was fit to be done with respect to the corn trade, he perfectly agreed, and for these he held himself responsible. To some of its recommendations he did not agree; and of them he said nothing. It was further a great satisfaction to him, that his noble friend felt his mind still alive to the principles of that report, and admitted them to be those by which their proceedings ought to be regulated. But his noble friend was for a modification. He would not go into the difference of opinion between them. There was no difference anywhere as to the effects of the corn law on the community. They were admitted by the sages who watched the agricultural interests in a neighbouring tavern, and by the political economist who studied them in his closet. Whatever ridicule might be attempted to be thrown on political economy, it could not be discredited. It was the result of general principles warranted by observation, and constituted the guide in the regulation of political measures. After all the obloquy to which he had been exposed in consequence of last year's report, he had offered his resolutions in order to absolve himself from all responsibility for the consequences of the present corn laws, for the destruction of capital in agriculture, already carried to a fearful extent, and which he imputed mainly, not to importation, but to a monopoly. Desirous of protecting himself from the responsibility of the evils which would follow, he had recorded his opinions, and having done so, he should leave them to be dealt with by the committee as they thought proper, without entering into any discussion upon the different practical measures under their consideration.

Lord Althorp could not agree with those who thought that the present was not a proper time to legislate on the corn laws; for if, as had been recommended, they were to prevent the importation of foreign corn till the 25th March, the consequence must be that the price would rise next year, and that the subject would then come under discussion with greater inconvenience. He had looked at the evils of our agricultural interests; and the main source of those evils, he believed to be the great fluctuation of prices. A remunerating price would be the great object, and the true remedy. What he complained of in the present law was, that it created the fluctuation of price by artificial means. The great corrective would be the introduction of a system that would give to the agriculturists a steady price. From 60*s*. to 70*s*. a quarter would, in his opinion, give that steady price; and at such a rate the consumer would not be placed in a worse relation than he was placed by the present corn law. The evidence of Mr. Solly went to show that a demand of foreign corn here must necessarily increase its price. He might say, that when wheat was 60*s*. here, it would be 50*s*. at Dantzic. But then it was said that a lower quality would be imported. That was an idle assumption; when duties were imposed, the importer knew his interest too well, not to import the best quality. Mr. Solly had stated that 45*s*. a quarter, was the lowest remunerating price at which foreign corn could be imported. Taking that price, he should have no objection to a protecting duty of 20*s*. But after all, the only remedy to the farmer was in a diminished taxation. He agreed with the hon. member for Callington (Mr. Attwood), who in his most able speech of last night, had so justly stated, that it was impossible, when the grower of agricultural produce received but the half of the price which he was wont to receive, that he could pay a scale of taxation imposed, when the prices of that produce were as much more. Whatever might have been said to the contrary, it was now well understood that the depression was equally felt in most of the important branches of our manufacturing interests. Witness the recent disturbances in Staffordshire and Monmouthshire. These disturbances proved, that the wages of the labourer were low, and the profits of the manufacturer short. Let the House then consider what the effect of any duties higher than a remunerating price to the grower of corn must have on manufacturing concerns thus situated. Under such circumstances, these manufactories must cease. He was much surprised at the manner in which this grave subject had been introduced by the noble marquis. The noble marquis had introduced his first resolution with a levity that was not very suitable to the subject; and had abandoned it with an indifference that was not a little extraordinary. In the present state of agricultural depression, however men might doubt as to the means of relief, all must acknowledge that it ought to have commanded the most anxious consideration of his majesty's government. With regard to the drawbacks on exportation, he considered that an advantageous proposition: but he thought a much larger amount should be granted. The expense of transporting corn abroad was at least equal to the expense of importing it from foreign countries. Such a bounty would, in the first instance, take money out of the pockets of the people; but it would operate as an efficient check to that main evil to grower and consumer, the fluctuation of prices.

Mr. Gooch said, he had unfortunately given offence by stating that the report of the agricultural committee was a mystification. He really considered that report drawn up with talent; but it was not a report which could afford much instruction. He lamented that any party spirit should pervade the House on this subject, yet the abandonment of one resolution by the noble lord was certainly ground for the attack made by an hon. baronet. He wished the first resolution moved by his noble friend had been agreed to, as it would have relieved the country from the glut in the markets. As to any sweeping measure for the relief of agriculture, he did not believe there was any possible chance of giving relief in that way. All they could do was, to stem the torrent of mischief, which was inundating the country. All they could do was to prevent a fluctuation in the prices of corn which kept the farmer always in a panic. He agreed in the third resolution, which declared that the ports ought not to be open till wheat came to 75*s*. The protection of all he wished was, that the farmers should be placed in that relation to the other classes, which would be for the honour of the country. He admitted that a reduction of taxes would be a relief; but we were still to keep faith with the public creditor, and the removal of half the taxes would not remove the agricultural distress.

Sir T. Lethbridge repeated, that a protecting duty of less than 24*s*. would not be sufficient for the farmer. The resolution which he had moved would guard against that fluctuation of prices which was so injurious, by the insecurity to which it exposed agricultural capital. It was most unfair to talk of returning to the prices of 1792, when we looked at the taxes of 1822.

Mr. N. Calvert did not think that any immediate relief to the agricultural interest could result from the present measure. It was necessary, however, to alter the existing law in order to prevent the great fluctuation of prices that would proceed from opening the ports. The protecting duties might effect that object. He had no great favour for any of the plans; but he thought that of the hon. member for Cumberland preferable to any other.

Mr. Irving said, he would support the resolution, as he was not disposed to leave the noble lord in the lurch. But he left it to the noble lord to prove his consistency, by distinguishing between the principle of the resolution which he had called on him (Mr. I.) to acknowledge, and that which he had himself submitted. The only difference between them was, that the resolution of the noble lord was inadequate, and ought never to be resorted to at all, while the other would have relieved the existing pressure of distress. If his resolution had been absurd, he was not chargeable with its absurdity, but the committee. He did not think it was absurd, and would submit it again. Though it might be in opposition to the principles of political economy, yet it was justified by the circumstances of the times. He did not approve of any of the plans proposed, but he thought that of the noble marquis the least objectionable, and would give it his support.

Sir N. Colthurst observed, that there were other kinds of agricultural produce, which were entitled to protection, besides corn. He would mention butter, and meant to propose a resolution to that effect.

Sir W. W. Wynn expressed himself in favour of protecting duties, because without them he conceived, if the ports should open at 80*s*., there would be such an influx of foreign grain as would injure the agriculture of the country for many years.

Mr. Griffiths wished to know whether, according to the popular doctrine of superabundance of corn, there was likewise a superabundance of all other articles of agricultural produce; seeing that live stock had fallen in price proportionably to grain. If there was not likewise superabundance of these latter—a proposition which he did not think would be maintained—the cause assigned for the distress of the landed interest could not be substantiated. The change in the value of the currency, and the increased pressure of taxation, from the payment of taxes by a medium of increased value, appeared to him to be the real causes of the embarrassments experienced by the agriculturists. The commercial, trading, and manufacturing population did not suffer so much; because they found a compensation for the change in those low prices of the necessaries of life, which ruined the farmer. The poor-rates, a burthen that pressed peculiarly on land, amounted still to 6,000,000*l.*; and this was a load which the other classes of the community did not equally share, but should be called upon to do.

Mr. Brougham said, that the question before the committee was, whether any and what changes ought to be made in the existing corn law? Now, among all the various opinions delivered to the House, he had heard but one in favour of the law as it stood. All who had spoken thought that nothing could be more injurious in its consequences than the act in force. The two objections to it were, that it prohibited importation till a certain price was attained and then permitted unlimitted supply, and that it likewise embraced the system of averages. The question was, did any of the propositions before them get quit of these objections, and what ought to be substituted in the place of regulations so condemned? The noble lord's plan was liable to both objections; for it fixed an importation price, and required the striking of averages. The right hon. gentleman's plan was open only to one. He fixed no importation price, allowing the trade to be free on paying duties; but he established averages. His hon. friend, the member for Portarlington had proposed a plan which was liable to neither of those objections. He proposed, that as soon as the price of corn should reach 70*s.*, the trade in that article should be permanently free, and that a fixed duty of 10*s.* should be permanently imposed upon importations, with a bounty or drawback of 7*s.* upon exportations. The duty proposed by his honourable friend commenced at twenty shillings and went on diminishing one shilling every year until it was reduced to 10*s.* To the principle of this plan he had no objection; but he was inclined to think that his hon. friend had taken the scale of his duties, or rather his permanent duty, at somewhat too low a rate. At the same time he considered the duties proposed by the members for Wilts and Somerset were too high. It was curious to see how extremes met. His hon. friend and himself, who rigorously maintained the expediency of a free trade, were now going to legislate on the same principle with the member for Somerset, who was not disposed to look with much compassion on the principle of a free trade, and who had expressed himself with great and unmerited acrimony against political economists. [A laugh.] He thought the member for Somersetshire ought to have abstained from censuring economists, because on the present occasion he had proved himself to be one, and of the same school with those he blamed. The principle difference between them was with respect to amount of duty, but certainly was a very important one. The member for Somersetshire desired a protecting price of 80*s.* He would here just allude to the operation of the change which had taken place in the value of currency. The price of 80*s.* which was now demanded would, by the change in the value of the currency, be equal to 100*s.* and more a few years back. Now, if any one in 1814 and 1815 had asked for a protecting price of 80*s.*, even the member for Somersetshire would have said that such a price was more than the agriculturists had a right to expect. He would state the reason why he thought the permanent duty of 10*s.* too small. The hon. member for Portarlington had calculated that duty on the ground that the farmer was peculiarly burthened to that amount by the pressure of tithes and poor-rates. But the hon. member stopped short when he limited the peculiar burthens of the farmer to these two points. Not to mention the large sums levied on the raw produce of the farmer, he was more severely affected by all the indirect taxes than any other class of the community. He had, he thought, proved this in detail at the commencement of the session, and he would now do no more than direct the recollection of the House to his arguments upon that occasion. The agriculturists, more than any other class, were affected by the taxes imposed on those commodities which were consumed by the labouring classes, because more labour was used in producing the same amount of produce in value by the farmer, than by the manufacturer, or any other individual. For instance, it would require more labour to produce corn to the value of 1,000*l.* than manufactures to the same amount. The expense of the labour upon a farm never amounted to less than one-third of the value of the produce, to which were to be added the charges of tithes and poor-rates. He therefore thought it would be acting unjustly to the farmer to impose a duty calculated only on the amount of tithes and poor-rates. If the late hour of the night did not forbid it, he would willingly enter upon the subject which the member for Corfe-castle had opened for discussion, by denying that taxation was the cause of the prevailing distress. If the whole of the distress of the country did not result from excessive taxation, a very large part of it could be ascribed to no other cause: and the remedy for the distress was a reduction of the burthens which pressed upon the country. It was remarkable, that all the plans had for their object to prevent the recurrence of an evil after it should be removed, but for the removal of it no provision was made. In his opinion, the first thing that ought to be considered was, the means of escaping from the evil. It was immaterial whether taxation was admitted to be the only cause of the evil: if it was allowed to occasion a part of it, a reduction of taxation was the only remedy within our reach. He thought this ought to be resorted to in order to avoid the necessity of again interfering with the currency. That should be the ultimum remedium. If the return to cash payments had been accompanied by measures which, in his opinion, were necessary, he should have considered it his most sacred duty to support that act of the legislature which restored a metallic currency. But it was never to be sufficiently deplored, that when that measure was resolved upon, parliament did not sufficiently consider the state of the country, and the effect which it would produce upon a most important class of the people. The member for Essex had given notice of a motion for altering the act which provided for resumption of cash payments; and upon that occasion he would state his opinions with respect to the object of the motion; but he had no hesitation in declaring now, that in his opinion any attempt to tamper with the currency, after it had been placed on its present footing, would show that we were reduced to something like an extremity. He implored the House to avoid this evil, by having recourse to the only means by which it could be avoided—a reduction of taxation. Let them afford every relief which it was practicable to afford to agriculture, by taking off those numerous and heavy duties by which it was now borne down. If all should prove unavailing, let them come to that which he would certainly fain avoid if possible. But, before they resorted to so injurious an expedient, let them no longer listen to those who, in defiance of all reason, because they had once said that a sinking fund ought to be maintained, determined to maintain it for ever, and who persevered in refusing relief to the country in order to preserve their own character for consistency, or rather for obstinacy. His own view of the subject was simply this—to reduce the taxes to as large an amount as would be equivalent to the clear surplus of the revenue over the expenditure; first introducing into that surplus all that could be added by new and unsparing retrenchment. That such a reduction of taxes, if judiciously made, would afford a speedy and important relief to the suffering classes of the community, he had no doubt. He should vote for the principle of the proposition made by the member for Portarlington; but with the scale of duties recommended by the member for Wiltshire. But, he repeated, that these propositions related to distant operations. Something more was called for by the public voice. It was a call justified by necessity; and parliament would shamefully abandon their duty, if they neglected to attend to it.

The Marquis of Londonderry agreed with the hon. and learned gentleman that the measures which had been proposed to the House, were calculated rather to protect the country against future danger, than to afford it immediate relief. He could not, however, agree that the reduction of taxes would benefit the farmer; because, although such a measure would be advantageous to him, in his character of consumer, it would be detrimental to him, in his character of grower of corn, by depressing the price of his produce. He regretted the observations that had fallen from the hon. and learned gentleman on the subject of the currency. The hon. and learned gentleman admitted all the evils that would result from any change in the decision which parliament had come to on that question; but still he kept the possibility of such change hanging over the country. It had been proposed that the subject which occupied the attention of the committee, should not be discussed until prices were higher; but he was of opinion, that at such a time the question could not receive that calm deliberation which was now bestowed upon it. The country was looking forward with confidence to the decision of the House; and if they should pursue a cautious course between the two great interests, he was certain the country would be grateful. The noble marquis then defended the fitness of the scale of duties which he had proposed, and censured that of the member for Somerset as being too high. The most convenient mode of proceeding would be, by taking the sense of the committee on the higher scales of duty first. The highest scale was that proposed by the member for Somerset. The best way, therefore, would be for the hon. baronet to move his resolutions first, by proposing that they be inserted instead of the original resolutions. If the hon. baronet's resolutions should be negatived, then the hon. member for Wiltshire could move his in the same manner. Then, if they were negatived, he (lord L.) would move his own resolutions, when it would be competent for any member to move what modifications he thought fit upon them.

The Committee then divided on sir T. Lethbridge's Resolutions [See p. 404]. The numbers were: For the Resolutions 24: Against them 243. Majority 219.

After this division, Mr. Benett's resolutions [See p. 351] were negatived without a division. Mr. Huskisson's Resolutions, joined to the two last Resolutions of Mr. Ricardo, who had withdrawn his previous resolutions in favour of the series drawn up by Mr. Huskisson, were then submitted to the committee by the chairman. On lord Althorp's moving an amendment upon this string of resolutions, the cry of "Adjourn" became general; the chairman was in consequence ordered to report progress, and to ask leave to sit again to-morrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, May 9.

AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS REPORT.] The order of the day was read for going into a committee to consider further of the Report on the Agricultural Distress. On the motion, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,"

Mr. Denison said, that none of the proposed resolutions had a tendency to remove the existing evil, which arose out of unbounded taxation, and the rapid restriction of the circulating medium. Taxation was pressing agriculture down to utter ruin. He was persuaded that government might keep faith with the public creditor, and yet repeal two millions and a half of taxes. He was sorry to see a prevalent disposition in all classes, the land-owners, the fund-owners, and the ship-owners, to shift the burthen from their own shoulders upon the shoulders of others. If ministers would give relief by a remission of taxation, all classes would more willingly bear their remaining burthens.

The House having gone into the committee,

Lord Althorp rose, to offer a few reasons for the amendment which he had proposed late last night. His hon. friend behind him (Mr. Ricardo) had proposed a series of resolutions which fixed an import duty upon wheat of 20*s*. per quarter as soon as the ports were opened, and provided for the decrease of that duty by 1*s*. a quarter every year, until it reached 10*s*., and which gave a drawback or bounty of 7*s*. per quarter on exportation. Now, the amendment which he (lord A.) had proposed, was, to impose a fixed duty of 20*s*. per quarter on importation, not liable to any future decrease or diminution, and to allow a bounty of 18*s*. instead of 7*s*. per quarter on exportation. The result of his amendment would be, that the highest price of corn would be 65*s*., and the lowest 43*s*. Among the resolutions of his hon. friend, was one which admitted warehoused corn into the market at a lower rate of duty than fresh foreign corn. Of that resolution he cordially approved; for it would be advantageous that the farmer should not be exposed at once to an influx of warehoused and of foreign corn, inasmuch as the gradual introduction of the warehoused corn might prevent fresh foreign corn coming at all into the market. The noble lord then moved his amendment.

Mr. Ricardo was surprised at his noble friend's proposing such an amendment. He could not see upon what principle his noble friend could justify raising the bounty on exportation to 18*s.* a quarter. For his own part, he did not think that any bounty would often be called into operation. Whenever it should, 7*s.* would be quite enough. His noble friend, the learned member for Winchelsea, and the hon. member for Corfe-castle, both agreed in one objection against his resolutions—that he had not made sufficient allowances for the effect of indirect taxation on the agricultural interest, which, according to their statement, was more affected by it than any other interest. Their statement to a certain extent, might be true; still he thought they had exaggerated. The principle upon which he had made his calculations was, that the price of every commodity was constituted by the wages of labour, and the produce of stock. Now, the noble lord's argument was, that in manufactured commodities the price was constituted of only a small portion of wages, and a large portion of the produce of the stock; whilst, in agricultural commodities, the case was exactly the reverse. If the noble lord could substantiate such a proposition, he would agree that he was entitled to the allowance he demanded. All that he doubted was, whether the fact were so. He doubted whether the proportion of labour was greater in agriculture than in manufactures. The right way of coming to a sound determination upon that point was, by considering in what the dead capital of both consisted. If he could show that the dead capital in agriculture bore the same proportion to its whole capital, that the dead capital in manufactures did to its whole capital, then he thought that his noble friend's proposition would no longer be valid. His learned friend, the member for Winchelsea, had said, that almost all the produce of the land was made up of labour. His learned friend, however, seemed to have forgotten that there was a great deal of capital in buildings, in horses, in seed in the ground, besides in labour. It was true that the manufacturer had a great proportion of his capital in his machinery; but, even though that were taken into consideration, he must still say, that the proportion of his noble friend was not made out so clearly as it ought to be; and that he was therefore only entitled to a small allowance. Now, in allowing a duty of 10*s.*, he thought that he had made an ample allowance; and he had made that allowance, too, on the principle, that all the poor-rates as well as all the tithes fell exclusively upon the agricultural interest. He now stated, however, that the agricultural interest was not entitled to the full allowance of all the poor-rates, inasmuch as a part of them was paid by the manufacturers, although much the greater part, he would allow, was paid by the agricultural classes. He was persuaded that if he had kept to that principle, the allowance to the agricultural interest would not have been more than 7*s.* Now, he had allowed them a duty of 10*s.*, and therefore, in the 3*s.* that there was over, he had made ample compensation for any errors that he might unintentionally have committed. He would now say one word to the hon. member for Corfe-castle (Mr. Bankes), regarding the lecture which he had read him (Mr. R.) upon political economy. The hon. member had talked much of the wisdom of our ancestors. He willingly allowed that there was much wisdom in our ancestors: but at the same time he must ever contend, that the present generation had all their wisdom and a little more into the bargain. [Hear, hear.] If the argument of the hon. member were to be considered as valid, there was an end at once to all hopes of future improvement. The present generation had invented steam-engines and gas-lights, and had made several other useful and beneficial discoveries, and he trusted that they would never be stopped in their progress to knowledge by being told of the wisdom of their ancestors, or be convinced that they were in the most flourishing condition possible because the system of their ancestors was called most wise and excellent. Undoubtedly this country was a great country, and had of late years increased its capital to a great extent. But in arguing upon that point, the hon. member for Corfe-castle might as well have employed this argument as the one which he had used; he might as well have said, "We have increased in wealth, whilst we have been contracting a great national debt; therefore, the national debt is a great blessing, and it would be a bad thing to get rid of it." [Hear, and a laugh.] That argument was quite as valid as the argument which the hon. member had actually used.—The hon. member then proceeded to state, that one argument urged against a free importation of corn, which appeared to him not to deserve the slightest attention, was this—that England ought not only to be a self-supplying, but also an exporting country. Now he wished to press one point upon their consideration, and that was—that it was the great interest of a country which grew a commodity for the use of another, to keep the market open for the sale of it. Now, if we were to raise a large supply for the purpose of sending our raw produce to a foreign country, in what a situation should we be placed if the market were to be shut against it? What a glut would then be forced into the home market! He would contend, that the ruin which such an event would produce, would be so great that no minister, nor sovereign, would be able to remedy it. The hon. member for Corfe-castle had also lamented that we were becoming too much of a manufacturing country. The hon. gentleman might, perhaps, think that a manufacturing country could not be so happy as an agricultural country. But he might as well complain of a man's growing old as of such a change in our national condition. Nations grew old as well as individuals; and in proportion as they grew old, populous, and wealthy, must they become manufacturers. If things were allowed to take their own course, we should undoubtedly become a great manufacturing country, but we should remain a great agricultural country also. Indeed, it was impossible that England should be other than an agricultural country: she might become so populous as to be obliged to import part of her food; but instead of lamenting over that circumstance, he should think it a proof of prosperity and a subject of congratulation. There would always be a limit to our greatness, while we were growing our own supply of food: but we should always be increasing in wealth and power, whilst we obtained part of it from foreign countries, and devoted our own manufactures to the payment of it. The hon. member for Corfe-castle had asked, whether our farmers were to be transformed into manufacturers, and our ploughmen into mechanics? From that question, any stranger who had walked into the House might have supposed that a proposition had been actually made to throw open our ports, and to change all at once our entire course of policy. But had any proposition of that nature been even hinted at? The hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Lockhart) had done him the honour of stating, that he believed that he (Mr. R) would not willingly inflict misery upon his country; but had added that he believed his resolutions would have such a tendency. But when he proposed a monopoly for the agriculturist up to 70*s.* (and the hon. member for Wiltshire admitted that 67*s.* was a remunerative growing price), and a duty of 20*s.* on the first opening of the ports, and a gradual reduction of it to a fixed and permanent duty of 10*s.*, could it be fairly said that he was proposing a scheme to turn the capital of the country from agriculture to manufactures? It had been well observed by an hon. member, that it was totally impossible that the direction of our capital could be changed in that manner. The security against it was to be found in the necessity of our growing our own corn—a necessity which would always prevent us from becoming too much of a manufacturing country. The fact was, that his resolutions, if adopted, would gradually employ a small portion more of the capital of the country in manufactures, of which the result would be beneficial to all classes of the community, as it was only by the sale of our manufactures that we were enabled to purchase corn.—He had never heard any answer attempted to his argument respecting the miserable situation into which the farmer would be plunged under a system of protecting duties. The high prices of corn exposed the farmer to great and peculiar risks. Now, none of the representatives of the agricultural interest in that House had ever ventured to assert that the farmer was not liable to the risks which he had pointed out as likely to arise from the variation of prices: none of them had attempted to show that his view of the danger was absurd and chimerical; and, as they had not done so, he was greatly confirmed in that view which he had originally taken. The hon. member for Wiltshire had stated, that we could obtain a large supply of foreign corn at 25*s.* per quarter. Now, he held in his hand a letter from Mr. Solly, in which that gentleman declared, that in all the evidence which he had given before the committee, he had not spoken of the then accidental price, but of the remunerating price, on the continent; and his learned friend (Mr. Brougham) had justly observed, that it was the remunerating price on the continent that regulated the price here. Now, he believed that his learned friend had understated that remunerating price. His learned friend had stated it at 45*s.*; he believed it to be 10*s.* more; for his learned friend had made no allowance for the profits of those who brought it here, which, in the opinion of Mr. Solly, were at least 6*s.* a quarter. The chief reason, however, for his mentioning the letter of Mr. Solly was, that Mr. Solly had said that Memel (from which one of the witnesses before the committee had derived his information) was not a port from which any great quantity of corn was shipped — not above 20,000 quarters a year, and that of inferior quality. Now, he wished to ask the House, if not more than 20,000 quarters were shipped from Memel, and those too of an inferior quality, whether such a fact would justify them in passing such a legislative measure as his hon. friend had proposed? The assertion, therefore, that foreign corn could be obtained at 25*s.* per quarter, was unworthy of attention for a single moment.—The only farther observation which he had to make was, with regard to what had fallen from the noble marquis. The noble marquis had said, that the measures which he had recommended to the House had been carried in the committee, almost without a dissentient voice. Now, he (Mr. R.) had stated his opinions in the committee, and for the sake of his own character and consistency, he would take the liberty of restating them to the House. He had gone into that committee with the opinion that the agricultural classes were in a state of great and overwhelming distress—that any relief which could be held out to them, ought to be held out—and that he would give them such relief; but on condition, that he should, in his turn, receive a pledge that some better measures of legislation should be instantly resorted to. He had been disposed to give the agriculturists every thing they required. They had a prohibition at present; and they could not have more. Indeed, he had been ready to adopt any proposition that the committee might originate, so long as the committee expressed a willingness to propose some more salutary measures of legislation to the consideration of parliament. The committee had held out to him a hope that they would do what he advised; they told him that they would insert something in their report which would satisfy him upon that point; and, in consequence of that declaration, he had given a conditional assent to the measures they had proposed. When he saw the report, and found that it contained no such clause as he had anticipated, the conditional assent that he had given to their propositions was immediately dissolved; and he refused to concur in the report of the committee, because it contained nothing of the nature which he had hoped it would contain. The hon. member for Hertford had said, that the evidence of those persons who imported corn was to be taken with some allowance, because their views of interest, however honest the individuals might be in intention, were likely to bias them. He did not mean to quarrel with that observation; for in most cases he allowed it to be well founded. He wished, however, to be permitted to apply it to those who had to decide in that House upon this most important subject. Let him remind them, that they had a great interest in it; let him caution them not to be led away—not to be improperly biassed—by any views of their own personal advantage. Let him implore them to recollect that they were legislating for the happiness of millions, and that there was no evil so intolerable as the high price of human food. [Hear!] He was astonished to hear the hon. member for Essex declare, that it was matter of indifference to him whether prices were high or not; and that he wanted to have corn for little labour and for low prices. He went along with the hon. member in that sentiment; but then he was astonished to find, that the hon. member, when they came to a measure that was calculated to give them low real prices, flew off in an opposite direction, and declared that we ought to grow our own corn, and that it was only upon particular occasions that we should suffer it to be imported. Such a declaration, if acted upon would render it impossible to obtain low prices in a country increasing in population like our own: indeed, the only way of getting low real prices, with which he was acquainted, was, to divert part of the capital of the country in such a way as to increase its manufactures.

Mr. Benett, of Wiltshire, said, he had never stated that foreign corn could be purchased at 25*s*. per quarter, though if it were true that bread could be bought in France at a penny per pound, corn must be at a less price there than 25*s*. per quarter. He was well aware that 24*s*. at present was more than 24*s*. before the passing of Mr. Peel's bill. The foreign exchanges had, however, followed the operation of that bill, and the price of foreign corn had consequently been affected by it. All were agreed that faith ought to be kept with the public creditor; but ought it not also to be observed towards the farmer? He must say, that if the warehouses were to be thrown open at 70*s*. instead of 80*s*., the consequence would be the influx of foreign corn one year sooner into the markets. They had heard a great deal of the impolicy of bringing bad land into cultivation; but they had not been told that such land, when it received from art the assistance which nature had denied it, grew as well as land originally good. He was no enemy to the principle of a free trade, but the arrangements should not be of a nature to give other classes an advantage to the injury of the farmer.

Mr. Curwen reminded the House, that in the memorable year 1799, when a scarcity was felt, an importation to the extent of a six weeks supply was immediately called for. That supply was provided at great expence, and not without some difficulty, from America and the Cape of Good Hope, and some rice was imported even from India. In times of danger he admitted the necessity of importing foreign corn; it ought to be then liberally received, but not permitted to remain here and accumulate to the injury of the home grower. When he objected to the duty fixed by the hon. baronet, it was not because he thought it beyond the scale of protection really due to the home grower, but because he thought it would be impossible to maintain it against the probable feeling of the country. He denied the accuracy of the calculations upon which the rates of protecting duty mentioned were framed. The noble marquis's, though intended to reconcile the wishes of all parties, were founded upon erroneous data. The price of production in foreign countries was not fairly given. Mr. Solly had informed the committee, that corn at Odessa could be had, and at a remunerating price for the farmer, so low as 16*s*. a quarter, and might be imported at 32*s*. Now, he (Mr. C.) from the best information he could procure, thought that calculation incorrect, and that corn at Odessa could be had at 12*s*., instead of 16*s*.: it therefore could be imported at 24*s*. and not 32*s*. Whenever there was a failure in the crops, there could be always secured a foreign supply to meet the evil. The noble marquis was wrong when he stated that Dantzic corn might be imported at 42*s*.: the fact was, the importation might take place at 32*s*. or 33*s*. If the noble marquis re-considered the prices, he would see that the foreign grower could avail himself of his duty and come into the market at 57*s*. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Ricardo), was of opinion that 65*s*. would be a fair protecting price to the farmer. So it would be, if he could always be sure of obtaining it; but that was impossible. What was it that made the farmer complain? The overwhelming taxes and depreciated currency which attended a long war. He knew the farmer could not expect the country would maintain for him an unequal price; but they ought at least to put him upon the same fair footing for the protection of his property, as the other classes of the community. It was unnecessary to inquire what had been the effect of the three years importation. We had imported in that period to the amount of pretty nearly 3,000,000 quarters of grain—he should say about 1,600,000 quarters of wheat. That supply we might have required for two years, and for part, probably, of the third. The ports shut in Feb. 1819. Now, he entreated the attention of the House to this statement—if we had consumed, in the first year, 800,000 quarters, that was the very utmost; in the second year, we had certainly consumed considerably less; and it was his belief that we had 500,000 or 600,000 quarters of the supply left on hand at the commencement of 1819. Would not every gentleman say, that the operation of such an enormous surplus, remaining unconsumed at a time when we had no occasion for a single bushel of imported corn, had been to weigh very heavily upon the home market ever since? Two years ago, he had strongly pressed upon the president of the board of trade, the injury which such a circumstance might ultimately occasion to the country. His admonitions, however, were disregarded. Gentlemen, therefore, would do well not to run away with an idea that the whole of the existing distresses were occasioned by over-production. If the noble marquis would not accede to his (Mr. C.'s) proposition, let him at least substitute some other in its stead, which should carry the protection as high as the noble lord himself had admitted it was proper to be fixed at. The hon. member concluded by reading his proposed resolutions for regulating the corn trade; viz. 1. "That the average price of wheat exceeding 80*s.*; and the ports being declared open for the importation of foreign wheat; a quantity, not exceeding 400,000 quarters, shall be admitted, on a duty of 10*s.* per quarter. 2. That the average price of wheat continuing above 80*s.* at the expiration of six weeks from the first opening the ports, a farther importation of 400,000 quarters, to be permitted, at 5*s.* per quarter."

Mr. W. Burrell said, that, all things considered, he was disposed to prefer the proposal of the noble lord; and, if it were accompanied with another suggestion mentioned in the report, he should consider it liable to very little exception. It was, that a duty of from 12*s.* to 15*s.* per quarter should be imposed on foreign wheat imported for home consumption, when the price should exceed 70*s.* In any bill which the House might agree to, he should wish that the averages should for the future be taken on Irish corn sold in the British market, as well as on our own grain. He had been informed by good judges, that it was almost impossible to tell Irish wheat from English; and it was very certain that the person who, under the present regulations, struck the average, knew nothing about any such difference, but proceeded upon the information of others. There was reason to believe, that at present a good deal of unfair speculation was engaged in on account of the difficulty of detecting this distinction.

Lord Eastnor believed that the proposition under discussion could not effect the relief of the people, and was calculated only to excite false hopes. He felt inclined to support the proposition of the noble marquis, but thought it did not go far enough.

Lord Cranborne thought, that a duty of 12*s.* with a rise of 5*s.* was not a sufficient protection to the farmer; and had therefore moved in the committee that 3*s.* should be added. Having failed in his endeavour, and being disposed to get the best bargain he could for the agriculturist, he should vote for the resolutions of the noble lord.

The Marquis of Londonderry said, that from what he understood to have been the views of the hon. member for Cumberland in the committee, he was astonished at the views which he now seemed to take. The hon. member had said, that the markets were depressed in consequence of the quantity remaining of foreign corn since 1819. When the ports were open, and where there were no restraints, he admitted the markets were always liable to be glutted with foreign corn. The noble lord here minutely detailed the terms of his propositions. It was to be observed, that a few years ago, instead of foreign importations being viewed with alarm, the prevalent fear was that there would not be enough corn to import from Europe, and America was looked to with satisfaction as a resource. A return to that state of things might be contemplated. He denied also that 8*s.* could cover the expense of importation and the merchant's profit. He, too, must be a very fortunate importer who could be sure of an immediate market. If he failed in getting a market 5*s.* might be put on every quarter, for every year that it continued warehoused. The hon. member for Cumberland, fell into a great error in supposing, that because wheat could now be procured at Dantzic at 32*s.* in a small quantity, that it could be procured to all eternity, at the same price, and to any amount. Under the resolutions he proposed the ports were to be only open three months at a time; in the first instance, when corn reached 80*s.* and afterwards when it reached 70*s.* The question then was, whether in three months, when wheat was burthened with a duty of 17*s.* per quarter, such a quantity could come in as would do any permanent injury to the agricultural interest. This resolution gave a security that corn should not be poured in beyond the wants of the country. Under the present law there was no such security. It was as convenient to the corn merchant, when the ports were open, under the present law, to bring his corn here as to keep it in Holland. Indeed, there was a premium for him to rush and take possession of the soil of the country; but, under the resolutions he proposed the speculators would hardly rush in rashly when they would be subjected in the outset to a positive expense of 27s. It seemed to him, that the judgments of the landed interest had been misled. He could partake of their zeal and respect it, but he could not enter into the operation of their minds when they expressed such excessive alarm. If his suggestion were open to attack, he had rather expected that it would have been blamed for leaning too much towards agriculture. Ministers felt no disposition to withdraw from the landed interest the protection of the existing law; they only submitted that a different mode of protection would be more beneficial. The turn of the scale was decidedly in favour of the agriculturist.

Mr. D. Browne approved of the import price as well as of the duty proposed by the hon. member for Cumberland. He was an advocate for the prohibition of the importation of foreign grain, on the ground that if the farmer was secured in the possession of the home market, the united kingdom could produce corn sufficient for the consumption of its inhabitants.

Mr. Robertson entered into some historical details relative to the state of France previous to the seven years war, and to the change that took place during that war, by which France became a country importing, instead of exporting, grain. While she was a flourishing commercial state she ceased to pay the same attention to her agriculture. He compared with this the state of Great Britain, which had exported grain until she took from France her colonies in both the hemispheres. She then became an importing country. After the breaking out of the American war, when France and Spain united against Great Britain, when she was no longer mistress of the channel, and her commerce was crippled and reduced, her agriculture revived, and, from 1780 to 1784, she again became a country exporting grain. On the re-establishment of peace, her trade recovered; her revenue, of only 10 millions, augmented one fifth in the space of two years; she once more imported grain; and so she continued until the end of the last war. The hon. gentleman concluded with calling upon government to protect and advance commerce, as the best mode of securing the welfare of all classes, and of giving the farmer a remunerating price for his production.

Mr. Lockhart said, he did not desire such an amount of taxes to be taken off, as would endanger the safety of the public creditor; but he must say, that unless such a degree of protection was afforded, as would remunerate the cultivator of the soil, the ruin of the agricultural interest was inevitable. If the House did not repeal taxes, so as to enable the agriculturist to continue their present expenditure, they would be obliged to deprive themselves of many of their accustomed luxuries; and, perhaps, in a philosophical view, their happiness would not be much diminished by such a necessity. It had been said by some writer, that private vices or luxuries were public benefits; if so, they were benefits which would soon cease to exist. It had been frequently asserted, that the land was mortgaged to the public creditor. Now, he had looked into all the acts of parliament, and he could not find it stated in any one of them, that the land was pledged in any way to the public creditor, except in so far as it was affected by the land-tax, and the window-tax, which might be repealed to-morrow. If, therefore, the prosperity of the land-owners were so far invaded, that an attempt should be made to seize their lands, he should be disposed to say, in the language of our Henry, "Come and take them;" for unless they could produce a positive act of parliament for their warrant, he should no more feel himself bound to submit to such an unjust visitation, than to yield to the invasion of a hostile foe. He hoped the noble lord and his colleagues would take such measures as might avert these sad extremities. They had the only efficient remedy in their hands, namely, such a remission of taxes, as would afford effectual relief, without endangering the public credit.

Sir C. Burrell was not disposed to give protection to agriculture beyond what was just to the other interests of the country. But he had alway seen that in proportion as agriculture flourished, the other interests were also prosperous. To support agriculture would be to support the country; he should therefore vote for the resolution of the noble lord.

Sir H. Vivian said, he was not one of those who attributed the distressed state of agriculture to taxation. The hon member for York had, on the preceding evening, proposed a reduction of taxes to the amount of 20,000,000*l*. Now, such a reduction could not be made without manifest injustice to the public creditor. But, supposing it possible to remit taxes to that extent, would not the subtracting such a sum from the revenue, and consequently from the circulation of the country, add to the prevailing distress, instead of diminishing it? The hon. member for Corfe-castle had drawn a very feeling picture of the wretched state in which the agricultural labourer would be placed, if he were compelled to exchange the pure air which he usually breathed, for the fetid atmosphere of a manufactory. But, might he not look at the other side, and ask, how was it possible for the manufacturer, who had been all his life accustomed to breath the close air of a factory, to perform work which required all its exertions out of doors? The interest of both those classes were bound up together, and whatever tended to injure the one could not benefit the other. The last corn bill gave a sufficient protection to the agriculturist. He thought they ought to depart as little as possible from that measure; and therefore he should vote for the proposition of the noble marquis.

Sir J. Shelley thought the proposition of the noble marquis would do some good, and that it was at all events better than the existing state of the corn laws.

Mr. Whitmore conceived the great cause of the present distress to be over-production. Not that he imagined, when a country stood in a natural situation, that an abundant crop could be considered an evil. In ordinary cases, where there was a large growth of corn in one part of the world, there was a defective crop in another, and the prices in consequence equallized themselves. But this was not at present the case. The circumstances of the war gave a considerable stimulus to agricultural speculations; corn was grown, at an immense expense, on poor soils; it produced very high prices; and the price of every article connected with farming was raised in proportion. The amount of capital employed, when prices were high, was, therefore, much greater than when prices were low. The capital employed in cultivating 100 acres of land in 1790, 1803, and 1813, was widely different. The amount of capital employed in the last period, as compared with the first, was no less than double. Large quantities of corn were grown during the war at a great expense. The effect of the bill of 1815 was, to keep up the stimulus, which had caused extensive agricultural speculations; and a series of abundant crops ensuing, created the glut which existed at this moment. When the price of corn was high, or sufficient to remunerate the farmer, he laid out considerable sums on his lands, and was content to pay a heavy rent. But when corn fell in value to any great extent, the capital which he was expected to lay out, and the rent he was obliged to pay, were out of all proportion to what he received. The law of 1815, led to the most injurious consequences. It induced the farmer, in the first instance, to incur an immense expense, for which, it was pretty clear, he would not be finally remunerated. When the farmer was thus situated, he would deal hardly with the land. He would extract as much as he could from it, at the least possible expense; he would impoverish it, and in that state it would revert to the landowner. Agricultural labour was also affected by the system on which the bill of 1815 was founded. Labour, in the long run, must bear some proportion to the price of food. When food was high, it produced a fair remuneration for the labourer; but when food was very low, and the farmer in distress, he did all he could to economise, and his first step was to reduce the price of labour below what it ought to be. It was clear, therefore, that the labourer did not benefit by the low price of corn. With respect to the amount of duty in the noble lord's resolution, he thought it too high. The resolution of the hn. member for Portarlington was liable to the same objection. But he preferred the latter on account of its tendency to give steadiness to prices.

Mr. Western said, the more he considered the question, the more he was convinced that this was not the proper time to legislate upon it. No member had clearly comprehended the whole bearing of the actual circumstances of the country, or the consequences of enacting a permanent law in our present unsettled state. The most vague ideas prevailed on the subject of our difficulties. He would take the premises of those who supported the resolutions, and would show that they did not warrant the conclusion to which they had come. If, as they asserted, every country of Europe teemed with a superabundant produce, and if the markets were in an unnatural state of depression, was this the time to proceed to the formation of permanent protecting duties? A scale of prices adapted to present circumstances might be too high for permanent protection; and a permanent scale might be insufficient in the existing state of the markets of Europe. Were not the prices of corn on the continent, for the last twenty-five years, estimated in our paper currency, and, therefore, liable to all its fluctuations? Were not the Dantzic prices regulated by the state of the British markets, and therefore affected by the depreciation of our currency? Would it not, then, be unwise to look at those prices as the foundation of any prospective regulation? He was prepared to contend now, as he had often done, that the present state of the currency was incompatible with the safety of the country. He would follow the advice of the hon. member for Corfe-castle, and refuse to legislate permanently, until he could form a clearer judgment of what measure ought to be adopted.

Mr. Alderman Heygate thought the proposed measures of the noble marquis would do more mischief to the agriculturists than that under which they now laboured. Something, however, should be done, and it was only in consideration of the necessity of the case that he could be brought to vote in favour of any protecting duty. The propositions before the House were so numerous and so complicated, that it was difficult to understand them. He was most inclined to the plan of the hon. member for Cumberland; but he would vote for no plan which did not contain a clause to remit the duty in the event of the price of corn rising so high as to indicate the approach of scarcity.

Mr. Ricardo denied that the price of corn on the continent was liable to the fluctuations of our currency.

The committee then divided on lord Althorp's Amendment, to fix a permanent duty of 18*s.* on wheat, and other grain in proportion: For the Amendment 24. Against it 201.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, May 10.

DISTRESS IN IRELAND.] The Earl of Darnley said, that their lordships and the public now knew, and ministers ought long before to have known, that in certain districts of the south of Ireland there had been a great failure in the crop of potatoes, which had produced most extensive distress. Though it afforded much gratification to him to find that liberal subscriptions for relieving the distress had been entered into, still it appeared to him matter of imputation on ministers, that not only they seemed now to be taking no measure to remove the distress, but, informed as they must have been of its rise and progress, they had done nothing to prevent it from reaching its present aggravated form. He wished, therefore, to ask the noble earl what measures government had adopted? The distress of a part of Ireland had risen to a most calamitous height, without the least apparent attention being paid to it by government. It had been observed, that the application of the public money to the purchase of corn in this country was contrary to the principles of political economy; but he thought that the million which was to have had that destination would be with more propriety employed in relieving the distress of Ireland. He held in his hand a letter from a gentleman in the county of Clare, on whose correctness their lordships might rely. The writer said, "The distress here is beyond all possible description. There is nothing but starvation in every corner of the country, and it appears impossible to remedy it. Unfortunately, government, to whom repeated and strong applications have been made, has as yet done nothing; and if relief do at last come, it will now arrive too late." Such was the statement to which he wished to call their lordships' serious attention. If the picture was not overcharged as he was persuaded it was not, what could their lordships think of the conduct of ministers? In one part of the united empire they were told that superabundance was the only cause of complaint, while in another the people were actually starving. If the answer of the noble earl opposite did not prove satisfactory, he should propose an address to his majesty, for the purpose of obtaining information on this important subject. The bounty of individuals would doubtless do much good; but if the distress was so extensive as it was described, nothing but the interference of government could produce relief.

The Earl of Liverpool trusted, that the explanation which he had to give would prove satisfactory to the House. He was far from being one of those who wished to shelter themselves under general theories, but their lordships must be aware, that no subject could be more delicate than that of the interference of government with the subsistence of the country. He would only wish them for a moment to consider, what might be the consequence of such a principle—how much it might operate in counteracting the exertions of private benevolence, and to what mischievous results such a meddling with the natural means of supplying the market might lead. Impressed with this principle, he did not hesitate to say, that when government received information of the local distress in Ireland, he was anxious that whatever aid it should appear advisable to afford, might be conveyed without the transaction becoming a subject of public notice in parliament. This was not the first time that such a case had occurred in Ireland, and that government had found it necessary to interfere. It was to be expected, therefore, that in what was now done former precedents would be followed. There was no reason to suppose that the subject had been overlooked. He had on a former occasion stated that it had engaged the serious attention of government, and he had now no hesitation in saying, not only that measures would be taken to relieve the distress, but had already been taken, on principles as unobjectionable as possible. These measures were adopted with the view, not only of meeting the present distress, but of preventing its recurrence, by supplying seed. With regard to the address, he should have no objection to agree to it when the proceedings to which it referred were terminated; but, in the present state of the business, the production of the correspondence would be attended with much inconvenience.

The Marquis of Lansdown, though agreeing with the noble earl as to the inexpediency of interfering with the supply of provisions to the markets, was still of opinion, that the case of the suffering poor, in the part of Ireland alluded to, formed an exception to any general rule, and that it was incumbent upon their lordships to take care that every thing was done that could be done for the relief of the unhappy sufferers. That the distress was most afflicting, all the accounts from the south-west of Ireland agreed in stating, and the information he had received, pourtrayed a state of distress, in the county of Clare in particular, which imperatively called for the immediate application of some remedy. It was not merely, however, in that county, but in the mountainous district adjoining, that the distress was to a great extent prevalent; and he had some time since, on receiving information of the state of that part of the country, sent instructions to purchase oatmeal, and to sell it an inferior price in the distressed districts. The warmest acknowledgments were due to those individuals who had so liberally came forward in aid of the suffering population of Ireland; but he trusted that their highly meritorious liberality would not slacken the exertions of the Irish proprietors, and that the latter would not subscribe money instead of affording that relief which would be so much more effectual, and which they had the best means of affording—a supply of articles of food. He was averse to any interference with the supply of provisions, but it should be recollected that this was not the case of a general scarcity, but merely the failure or scarcity of one article of food, and that of the lowest gradation in the scale. This, therefore, formed an exception to general rules; and there was this fact in addition, that by confining the supply as much as possible to the next article in gradation, the purpose in view would be answered, without interfering with the markets for any other article of produce.

The Earl of Blesinton supported the address. He stated the number of the starving population in the county of Clare to be 48,507. The distress was of no recent origin. It had been going on for a considerable time, and so strongly was it felt, that when he applied in 1819 to the archbishop of Tuam for his subscription to defray the expense of a statue to be erected to the memory of his late majesty, his grace answered, that he rather wished the money to be applied to the relief of the starving people of Ireland. Distress was not exclusively felt in the south and west of Ireland. In the county of Donegall there was no want of food, but of money to buy it. Money and capital were the things wanted. If the people were fed, without being provided with employment, mischief would ensue. If it were wished to do good to Ireland, a large sum must be given, at least five millions; two of which should be distributed immediately, and the remaining three applied as local circumstances should require.

Lord Ellenborough said, it would be satisfactory if the noble earl would state how long it was since the government began to afford relief to the suffering population of Ireland, and to what extent that relief had been afforded.

The Earl of Liverpool said, he was unable to state to what extent the relief had been afforded; but it was some weeks since that money had been sent for the purpose of purchasing provisions for those who were destitute; and measures had also been taken to provide seed, in order to prevent, as far as possible, a recurrence of the distress.

The Earl of Limerick observed, that any ministry who could have neglected the consideration of the distressed state of Ireland, would have been deserving of public execration. But the contrary was the fact in this instance. The noble earl had stated, that measures had been resorted to, and were now in progress for the relief of the distress, and relying with confidence upon that declaration, he should oppose the address.

Earl Grey could not discover any ground for that confidence which the noble earl was so disposed to place in ministers. They had authentic accounts, the truth of which could not be disputed, that the population of Ireland, from whence large supplies of grain were drawn to England, were, a great part of them at least, in state of distress bordering upon famine, and yet there was no trace of any aid furnished by government for the mitigation of this dreadful calamity. What a picture of a government! Hundreds and thousands of the population of Ireland dying in the streets, and highways for want of food, in the midst of plenty, and we were merely told by the king's ministers, that measures were in contemplation to afford relief! Was this a ground for refusing support to the address? On the contrary, that House ought to be informed of what had been done (if any thing had been done) for the alleviation of this dreadful distress; and if it should turn out that nothing effectual had been done, they should wrest from the hands of incapable men that power which they knew not how to use for the advantage of the country.

Lord Ellenborough trusted that his noble friend would carry his motion to a division.

He was anxious that the question should be sifted to the bottom. The existence of great distress in Ireland was all that was known, and there was no proof that any good had yet been done by government, or by the assistance of individuals.

The Duke of Wellington said, it had been distinctly stated by his noble friend, that money had been sent to supply food, in order to obviate the present distress, and that seed had been provided for the purpose of preventing the recurrence of that distress.

Lord Holland said, that the information alluded to by the noble duke was unsatisfactory, inasmuch as no dates were mentioned by which alone the House could be enabled to judge whether the proper means had been adopted in proper time for the relief of the distress.

The Earl of Liverpool said, he could not at the moment recollect the dates; but it was some weeks since that the relief was afforded in money to purchase food; and, subsequently, seed had been supplied, in order to prevent a recurrence of the distress.

The Earl of Lauderdale contended, that the admissions of the noble earl were sufficient to induce him to vote for the address; as it was evident that the relief was not afforded in time, especially with regard to seed, which ministers ought to have known was long since required, and that the time they had chosen for supplying it was too late to be of any real use.

The House divided; For the Address 17. Against it 35.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, May 10.

Roman Catholic Peers Bill.] On the motion of Mr. Canning, the order of the day was read for the second reading of the Catholic Peers bill.

Mr. T. A. Smith said, he felt it his duty to address a few observations to the House on this particular measure, but on the general question he would not say one word. With all the respect which he had for the wonderful talents and splendid eloquence of the right hon. member who had introduced the bill, he could not help looking on this measure as a most extraordinary one. He thought the measure most unfair, most unjust, towards the great body of the Catholics: he thought it most aristocratic in its principle; for what could be more aristocratic than to grant a boon to the peers, and to leave the commoners in their existing situation? On a former evening he had paid the most sedulous attention to the hon. mover's speech. He had listened to it with impatience, not unmixed with alarm, after what had fallen from the hon. member for Somersetshire, lest he should be captivated by the voice of the Syren. But the charm of that address, whatever it might have been, had been completely removed by the speech of the right hon. secretary. If he knew any thing of the subject, the measure of the right hon. member was not pleasing even to the most zealous advocates of Catholic emancipation. He had hoped to see it rejected by a large majority; but he supposed that the right hon. attorney-general for Ireland, finding that he could not prevent the motion from being brought forward, had thought it better to express his approbation of it, than to meet it by moving the previous question, as he had been expected by many to do. If the right hon. attorney-general was sincere in the approbation he expressed, why had he not brought forward the general measure at once? For certainly the general measure, backed by securities, would have come better to the House than the measure now brought forward. He must express his hope, that many members who had supported this measure at first, would, upon consideration, agree in the propriety of its postponement, until they came to a vote on the general question. The question, as it now stood, was not whether the story of Titus Oates was false or not, whether Charles 2nd was a Catholic, or whether the Catholics were unjustly deprived of their privileges or not; but it was, whether, because they were lords, they ought to be restored to their privileges instanter? But if ever a time should arise when such securities were offered as would be deemed sufficient in the opinion of his right hon. friend (Mr. Peel), and would induce him to relax his opposition, then, and not till then, would he accede to the concession.

Mr. Wetherell said, that upon all former occasions he had been an opponent of the measure, termed Catholic emancipation; and whatever objections, founded upon what he conceived to be the just and wise policy, and the real principles of the constitution, had upon former occasions appeared to him to be fairly available against the measure, in the different shapes in which it had been formerly brought forward, had in his judgment assumed a double weight as against the extraordinary bill then under consideration.

It belonged to great genius to take a flight peculiar to itself, and to quit the beaten course of ordinary men; and in that respect no person had higher pretensions than the right hon. gentleman. But what struck him as so singular in this instance was, that the right hon. gentleman not only differed in the step he now proposed to take, from the common mass of opinions on the subject, but he was equally at variance with the known and declared opinions and the practical conduct of all the great men who had preceded him, in endeavouring to accomplish the same object. The right hon. gentleman's name might be well classed with those of his illustrious predecessors in the field; Mr. Pitt, Mr. Burke, Mr. Fox, Mr. Windham, Mr. Ponsonby, and Mr. Grattan. Equal rank with them as Catholic emancipators, the right hon. gentleman would ask for, and it was assuredly his—superiority he would probably not aspire to—and yet, however strange, so it was, that the right hon. gentleman forgetting the sentiments and professions of these, his former companions in arms, took a course diametrically opposite to theirs, and virtually and in effect, condemned their policy and threw a reproach on them for want of liberality and wisdom.

If the right hon. gentleman's measure was right, their's was wrong; for their's and his were repugnant and incompatible. Soon after the Irish Union, Mr. Pitt first broached the general idea of what is called Catholic emancipation. The entire intermixture of the countries, as he conceived, counterbalanced the local preponderance of the Catholic population of Ireland, which, in the separate state of that country, as he thought, could not safely be entrusted with an accession of power and strength. But that great man, whenever he spoke of the measure he had in prospect, contemplating, as he probably did, the equalization of Catholics and Protestants, in all their relations towards the state, and in all their civil functions and employments, always spoke of concessions to be made and of securities to be required. The precise nature of these securities he did not indeed specify, for no measure had then been matured on the subject, nor was any practically brought forward in his time, and therefore the species, the quality, the detail and structure of these securities, which he conceived to be essential, cannot be exactly known. But it is indisputable and beyond doubt, that Mr. Pitt, the first author of the idea of abolishing the distinction between the two religions, for the purpose of general and equal civil capacity, never dreamt of absolute and unqualified, but of qualified and conditional emancipation. His doctrine was, not that Catholic interests and feelings were unproductive of any danger; on the contrary, his doctrine was, that the apprehended danger did exist, but that it might be balanced by securities sufficient to control and overcome it. Mr. Pitt's plan was that of some general measure with securities. What was the right hon. gentleman's plan, a partial measure without any securities whatever. The comprehensive theory of that great statesman, was thus completely abandoned and repudiated by the present bill, which was its direct reverse.

But this was not all, after Mr. Pitt's death, in proportion as the subject advanced towards some practical step, the Catholic community were themselves consulted, and a kind of negotiation was entered upon, and securities to a certain extent were offered by themselves. There were many difficulties in their final settlement; but still securities were offered. The project proceeded and the cause of emancipation from time to time gained considerable strength, till at length Mr. Grattan's bill was brought in, the provisions of which he should hereafter have occasion more particularly to notice. Their general contents were already within the recollection of the House. What were the opinions of Mr. Grattan on this subject may be learnt equally from his speeches and his bill. Mr. Grattan's plan, following that of Mr. Pitt, was, to adopt a general measure which was to comprehend all subjects of difference with the Catholic body; the affairs of their church, the appointing their bishops, and other ecclesiastics, their mode of correspondence with the see of Rome; their claim to admission to both Houses of Parliament, and to fill civil offices. These concessions having been made, pledges and securities were to be given as far as could be, to prevent an abuse of this equal power, and to enforce and maintain their perfect alliance and consolidation with the state. Amongst the most warm and most zealous friends of emancipation, this kind of feeling was expressed; give every thing which ought to be given, and demand every thing which can be reasonably required; do this, and unanimity and confidence will instantly assume the place of jealousy and distrust. Mr. Grattan's precise expression when he produced his bill was, "Here are our securities, where are your concessions." Now what a strange contrast with this full and comprehensive plan of Mr. Grattan, this exchange of terms mutually proposed and complied with, which was to harmonize and unite both parties in common and equal confidence; what a grievous departure from all this was this insulated step, this fragment of a system, this piece-meal legislation which they were called upon to adopt! The peer is to be invested with the most honourable, the largest, and most valuable power in the state; and is bound by no oath, test, or security whatever, to recognize the civil superiority of the state, or the supremacy of the king upon those various subjects so highly important to the independency and the very being of the empire, and so absolutely essential to the power and just prerogative of the Crown as the civil head of the government, which have always constituted, and still constitute the danger of external influence and authority, on the part of the see of Rome, under the pretence of mere and pure religion. Why is this unrestricted unlimited confidence to be placed in the peer alone? Why, because we have been told, and truly, that from the time of queen Elizabeth, to the 30th Charles the second, there was no test to exclude peers from taking their seats. Queen Elizabeth says in her statute that she was otherwise "assured of the faith and loyalty of the temporal lords of her parliament and therefore does not require them to take the oaths of supremacy imposed upon the members of this House." From Charles the second's time to this moment, the test has equally affected both Houses; and now, by a partiality and predilection for the aristocratical order, not very congenial to the feelings of this House, not quite consistent perhaps with our immediate duty to secure the popular and plebeian rights of our own equals and constituents, we are called upon by the right hon. gentleman's bill to keep the doors of this House still closed against a Catholic commoner, by allowing the statute of queen Elizabeth to remain in force as against them, while, with more politeness than justice, we are about to restore the excluded lords; our friends the commoners may well complain of our desertion in leaving them in the lobby.

It might have been as well to leave the House of Lords to originate this bill themselves, though I agree with the right hon. gentleman, that he has precedent in his favour, for the exclusion bill of Charles the 2nd, actually originated in this House; and instances may be produced in which the House of Lords have originated bills upon subjects apparently more appropriate to ourselves. It is not worth disputing, however, whether propriety would most require the initiative of the measure to be elsewhere or here. But other and infinitely more important considerations grew out of this solitary and isolated step, which will hereafter involve the justice and consistency of this House as they affect the Catholic body at large. If the peer is to be made the precursor of the commoner into parliament, unrestricted by those oaths and securities which by Mr. Grattan's bill in 1813, and by the bill of the last session were imposed on lay Catholics as well as upon the church. If the peer is to take no oath of supremacy according to the right hon. gentleman's bill, I beg to ask on what ground can the Catholic member be restricted by such an oath? Are we to allow our own House to be subjected to tests which it is thought safe and advisable to remove from the other House?

Why then the right hon. gentleman either does or does not mean that the Catholic commoner and the Catholic peer shall be placed on the same footing.—If that be his intention, why should not both, contemporaneously and passibus æquis be allowed to sit in parliament?—But, if the right hon. gentleman does not mean to treat the two cases as the same, why does he not?—for constitutionally they are identically the same, and if he will not—this House must treat them as the same, unless it chooses to abandon its character equally for consistency and justice. But it may be answered to this, that next session a bill may be introduced to repeal the statutes of Elizabeth, and what difference is there in a few months. Why this series of separate bills, and separate measures, this legislation sparsim is the very thing to be complained of.—It is destructive of the essential character and admitted policy of the general measure as an entire system.—Next session comes a bill to make the Catholic commoner admissible here.—Can you demand oaths and securities from him?—No—The session after this the pretensions of the Catholic church will be advanced.—They will say, why entertain fear or jealousy of us?—why suspect our allegiance and submission to the civil supremacy of the state?—Why quarrel with us about the limits of what is spiritual discipline belonging to the pope as a mere religionist and civil power which belongs to the king?—You have trusted the peer and the member of parliament on this subject—you have actually committed into their hands, a large share of the civil power of the state itself, leave to us the mere private discipline of our church:—What answer will you give, to the Catholic church.—Lastly comes a bill to grant admission to all civil offices.—Why ask security from a removable servant of the Crown, when none is to be taken from a member of either House?—Can any gentleman fail to see that this course of proceeding at once destroys the very basis of that system of confidence to be founded on just protection and precaution which was to be made the vital principle of the measure.—For upwards of 20 years, from the time of the Irish Union, we have heard of nothing but concession and security—these terms have been coupled together, whenever Catholic emancipation was mentioned—they have always been associated and treated as inseparable in every publication out of doors, in every speech made in this House, and in the silent votes of those who did not speak.—But what is still more, they were embodied and combined together in Mr. Grattan's bill in 1813, and in the bill of the right hon. the attorney general for Ireland of the last session. They have had the sanction of members of this House on several discussions—and this House, having, in the last session, legislatively declared by passing the bill that securities were necessary,—the right hon. gentleman by his present bill, which is the acme and perfection of unrivalled singularity, is calling upon the House virtually to declare that they are not necessary, and to involve themselves in the inconsistency of contradicting their own vote of the last session. He trusted that he might be allowed to address this point to the considerate reflection of the House—and to ask, how it was possible for this measure to inspire harmony and conciliation, and to give satisfaction or confidence to the Protestant mind and feelings of the country, when a contradiction so palpable could be so justly imputable to parliament itself. He would, however, endeavour to follow the right hon. gentleman and to examine as well as he could, what were his own reasons for deserting the general measure, and taking up his partial and particular measure.—As far as he could judge of those reasons, dropping the splendor and eloquence of the right hon. gentleman's speech, it seemed to him, that his first proposition was, that the exclusion bill of Charles the second grew entirely out of the pretended Popish Plot—that it was the offspring of the delirium and alarm which then agitated the public feelings.—That its origin was unjust, and that its continuance was equally so.—Now he would agree with him in saying, that a great part of Titus Oates's narrative was a huge lie. Dryden's description of it is perhaps the best.

> "Some truth there was, but dashed and brewed with lies."

It appeared foreign to common sense that the Papists should enter into a scheme to assassinate the king who was supposed to be at heart a Papist, though he dared not to shew any marks of external conformity to the church of Rome.

But granting a great part of the plot to be a fiction. It is notorious, that during the reign of Charles 2nd, a correspondence was carried on with the see of Rome and its emissaries, for the purpose of supplanting the Protestant religion. His right honourable friend (Mr. Peel) had already alluded to it. He would, however, refer the House to a very important historical document on that subject, which would prove that Louis the 14th was well acquainted with, and a party in these transactions. He alluded to the dispatches which passed between the French court and Barillon, who was then minister here, which Mr. Fox first brought to light, and published in his historical work, having obtained them at Paris from the archives of the secretary of state's office. It appears, that as soon as the breath was out of the king's body, Barillon writes over to Versailles, and it is pretty clear from his letter that the king died in communion with the church of Rome, and 10 days afterwards the king directs him to ascertain what "was the strength of the Catholic Party in England."

It cannot be doubted, that during the reign of Charles the second, the Papists were encouraged with the hope, and entertained the project, of overturning the Protestant establishment at some future opportunity, and though the right hon. gentleman has said, that the exclusion of the duke of York was the principal object of the bill, I cannot agree with him in thinking that the exclusion of Catholic peers was unjust or uncalled for by the circumstances of the times, though the imputations then raised against Papists may have been aggravated, by mere fear and alarm, beyond the truth.

But be this as it may, and supposing that at the precise period when the restriction commenced, no case of fair and reasonable necessity for its origin existed —What would the right hon. gentleman say to the whole transactions, to the entire character of the reign of James the Second?—Would he say, that there existed no fair and reasonable necessity for its continuance during his reign?—Would he say, that the statute ought to have ceased and to have been repealed in his reign?—No—this would be much too absurd.—Well, then, supposing, for the sake of the argument, the origin of the exclusion to have been premature; the reign of James the 2nd would, beyond all doubt, have justified the origin of the exclusion then, as undoubtedly it justified the continuance of it.—He must own therefore that he could not feel the force of the argument, which the right hon. gentleman would deduce from his historical survey, for granting his view of the times to be correct—granting that the exclusion law was an unjust sacrifice to the popular delirium—granting the non-existence of any just cause for passing the statute;—still, if other causes afterwards authorised its continuance, as confessedly they did, the real questions were, at what former period the statute ought to have been repealed, and whether it ought to be repealed now.

This led him on, in the order of time, to the Revolution, it was to that important and momentous period—it was to what was then laid down and established as essential points in the British constitution, it was to the principles then fixed for the preservation of the Protestant monarchy, and liberties of this country, that he had ever looked and should ever look for the regulation of his own opinion on this subject.—And here his difference was extreme with both the right hon. gentlemen. But the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Canning) passing by the constitutional law of the Revolution, had endeavoured to insulate the case of the peer, and to treat it as a case standing upon grounds of exception to the general rule of the constitution, or upon grounds sufficient to distinguish it from the case of the commoner, and from the merits of the general measure — now what were these grounds?—Why the right hon. gentleman had said, that the peer qua peer had a right to legislate—that his seat in the House of lords is an absolute right, inherent in his rank and order—a right a priori flowing out of his peerage—this right he says, and truly, was taken away from the peer by the statute Charles the 2nd which operated as a depriving law, though he was allowed to sit under the statute of the 5th Elizabeth, which imposed a test operating as an exclusion of a Catholic commoner from this House. He had next said, that the case of the commoner is that of simple eligibility, or mere capacity of representation, a possible contingent privilege, not an absolute or positive right annexed to the person. Why undoubtedly for legal purposes this distinction exists, for the purpose of mere abstract or metaphysical definition this distinction may be drawn.—But for the purpose of the more large and ample definition of civil and political right—this difference between privilege and right, between the capacity to be chosen as a representative, and the original personal title of a peer, is most flimsey, and unsubstantial, and contrary to the genius and spirit of the constitution. In both cases the restriction is equally unjust, and improper, unless political expediency renders it necessary.—The commons as legislators can only act by representation.—The peerage acts personally and individually. The principle of deprivation or exclusion, by requiring a religious test, operates upon the representative character of a member, precisely in the same manner, and as injuriously, as upon the original personal character of a peer.—There is no practical difference between the functions which either party is prohibited from exercising. Politically speaking, the cases are one and the same. But upon this part of the subject, he had higher authority than his own, he had that of his right hon. friend the attorney-general for Ireland. The right hon. gentleman (Mr. Canning) had differed from every Catholic liberator in bringing forward a part of the measure instead of the whole—and what was not less remarkable, he differed also in his arguments from every other person.—The House well recollected the able display of reasoning of the attorney-general of Ireland, when he supported his general measure in the last session; upon that occasion a passage was produced by him from lord Bacon, which was much cheered and applauded, in which that great man speaks of "competency or ability, to enjoy all the benefits of the constitution, as the birth-right of all the king's subjects" and the right hon. the attorney-general for Ireland, reasoned powerfully for the universal and equal political and civil right of every Catholic to enjoy office, honour and power under the state—upon lord Bacon's principle, and upon arguments precisely the reverse of those, by which the right hon. gentleman would now deduce the subtle and untangible difference between the eligibility of the commoner and the inherent right of the peer.

But, he had no objection to examine this notion of right in the positive sense, in which the right hon. gentleman now urged it. In that view his proposition seemed to be, that the exercise of a personal right, could not be made to depend on a religious test—for his own part, he had always understood, that, according to the first principles of civil society, right itself gave way to expediency. And that it was essential to the very existence of every government, of whatever form or composition, that the right to share in the powers of the state, must depend upon considerations of political expediency affecting each state.—Under this constitution a case could hardly be put, of any right which was not made to depend on expediency alone. But he would not travel beyond the particular case of rights subjected to religious qualifications. You have taken away, said the right hon. gentleman, the personal right of a peer, by the depriving statute of 30th Charles 2nd; restore it back to him again, place him in the same situation as he stood in at the Reformation.—But did not the very same argument upon the doctrine of right, embrace the Crown, as well as the peer? Had not the sovereign a personal right as sovereign, a priori, to maintain or oppose the Catholic, or the Protestant faith, whichever he might think the better?—yes. But by your coronation oath, you have taken away that personal right. Had not the sovereign a personal right to choose his consort? But you have taken it away by the bill of rights. Had not the sovereign a personal right to liberty of conscience in matters of religion?—yes. But the bill of rights has said no; he must and shall be a Protestant, and it exacts from him the same qualification as the statute 30th Charles 2nd exacts from the peer. The deprivation, then, of the personal right of the Crown is not an anomaly peculiar to his case. It stands upon that general principle which requires Protestantism from the Crown, from the member of parliament, and from every individual holding a civil place or office. If a peer were not subject to the same test, the anomaly upon the notion of right would just be the other way. The attempt of the right hon. gentleman was, to represent the case of the peer, as a solitary case, whereas it was actually the case of the king, and the case of the commoner, and was governed by the same pervading and universal principle which ran through every branch of the state and affected in a similar manner and degree every individual who lived under it.

He would now pass on to another topic in the speech of the right hon. gentleman, upon the soundness or fallacy of which depended, in his opinion, the most important consideration of the question.—The right hon. gentleman, throughout his speech, insinuated, that at the Revolution it was not understood that the legislature should be exclusively Protestant. And his right hon. friend, the attorney general for Ireland, had, in his speech, in terms the most direct, asserted, that the exclusion of Catholics was not a fundamental principle of the Revolution. This statement he had heard with utter surprise and astonishment, and he would undertake to demonstrate the direct contrary, and this from several sources. He would first refer the House to an important historical document, which he believed had not been noticed in the former discussions on this subject. Gentlemen recollected, that before the Revolution, James 2nd had endeavoured to sound the political feelings of the prince and princess of Orange. He would have made them parties if he could, in his conspiracy against the liberties and constitution of this country; fortunately he did not succeed, or we should have had no deliverer in the person of king William. The correspondence on this subject was conducted by Mr. Stewart on the part of James 2nd, and by Pensionary Fagel on the part of the prince and princess of Orange. He would read to the House, Pensionary Fagel's letter, "And if his majesty James 2nd desires their concurrence in repealing the penal laws, their highnesses are ready to give it; provided those laws remain still in their full force, by which Roman Catholics are shut out of both Houses of Parliament, and out of all public employments, ecclesiastical, civil and military; as likewise those other laws, which confirm the Protestant religion; and which secure it against all the attempts of the Roman Catholics. But their highnesses cannot agree to the repeal of the test, and those other Penal laws last mentioned, that tend to the security of the Protestant religion; since the Roman Catholics receive no other prejudice from these, than the being excluded from parliament, and all public employments, and that, by them, the Protestant religion was sheltered from all the designs of the Roman Catholics against it, or against the public safety. That neither the test, nor those other laws can be said to carry any severity in them against the Roman Catholics, on account of their consciences, being only provisions qualifying men to be members of parliament, or to bear offices, by which they must declare before God and men, that they were for the Protestant religion, so that, indeed, all this amounted to no more, than to a securing of the Protestants from any prejudices it may receive from the Roman Catholics."

What will gentlemen say to this letter? They must dispute the plain meaning of the English language to get rid of its effect. Here is the demonstration of history—which will gentlemen prefer, the truth of history, or the beauty and splendour of the right hon. gentleman's declamation? Politically speaking, the letter was a treaty between king William and the British people—it was in the nature of a compact, combining these rules and maxims of government by which he proposed to bind himself.—His opinions had become known. It was ascertained, that he refused to join king James in his conspiracy to overturn the Protestant establishment, and it was this fixed point in his character which induced this country afterwards to place themselves under his protection. This correspondence took place some time prior to the actual crisis of the Revolution. Upon the abdication of James, king William was invited to take the vacant throne. He came here upon the grounds of political good faith—nay more upon the faith of a direct political treaty between himself and the British people—the fundamental principle of which was, to make Protestantism exclusively the basis and character of the constitution and the government, to consolidate it essentially with every one of its departments, and to make the profession and the practice of it a preliminary, and an absolute and indispensable qualification for the exercise of the political powers and duties of the state in every one of its branches. In the Crown, in the peerage —in this House and every civil place and office of every description.

When he heard this principle disputed, when he heard it denied as a Revolution principle, that the members of the two branches of the legislature which belonged to the people, must be exclusively Protestant, he could hardly trust his hearing. But assert it who may, and he was sorry when the assertion came from so high a quarter, the assertion was in the teeth of direct historical testimony, and not less in the teeth of the legislative declaration of the Bill of Rights. There may be, indeed, some principles of the constitution with respect to which, it must be left to construction to decide, whether they are Revolution principles. Some doctrines can be collected only inferentially, and argumentatively from what then passed.—But this point did not depend upon inference or construction, or loose understanding; nor did it want the aid of external history to determine, though he would still say that Pensionary Fagel's letter was an important historical document which ought to be kept in view as illustrating the legislative mind of the framers of the Bill of Rights. In that letter toleration principles are laid down, and a relaxation of the Penal Code, as far as it was not inconsistent with those principles. But the line of distinction is drawn and reasoned upon between the exercise of religion and the exercise of political power. The former it was proposed to place upon a liberal footing; but the restriction from sitting in either House of Parliament it is declared shall still be continued in force against the Catholics. In consonance with the principles thus avowed by the prince of Orange, the House recollects, that the act, called the Toleration act, was one of the earliest of king William's reign, and he made good his promise to establish the freedom of religious opinions and worship. In consonance with the principle so plainly and explicitly avowed by him, that Catholics should not sit in parliament, you will find a declaration in the Bill of Rights embodying in itself, declaring and practically maintaining that principle in a very remarkable manner.

The House will recollect, that the first parliament of king William, called the Revolution parliament, was, in truth, not a parliament constitutionally assembled under the great seal. But it was a convention summoned by letters from the prince of Orange. He wished gentlemen would condescend to look into the Bill of Rights. He knew not whether they would like the trouble to do so, for he had been censured for the drudgery of reading too much on this subject. There might be such a thing as an alternative of that fault which he supposed was matter of praise. In this same Bill of Rights, now scarcely recollected, the doctrines of which are now repudiated, disputed, and denied, was to be found this remarkable passage—that the prince's letters of summons were written "to the lords spiritual and temporal, being Protestants." And yet we have been most boldly told, but most unadvisedly, that the exclusion of Catholics was not a Revolution principle. This very statement, could only be introduced to mark the entire Protestant character of the legislature. And its meaning is as plain as if a declaratory enactment had been introduced, providing that the restrictive statute of Charles 2nd should continue in force. It operates virtually, as a re-assertion of the principle of that statute.

Pursuing the same line of inquiry, he would next refer to another most material source of illustration,—he meant that branch of the coronation oath, or rather that new and substantive oath, for the first time introduced at the Revolution, by which the Crown is bound to maintain the true profession of the Protestant reformed religion, established by law, and the rights and privileges of the clergy and the church. This personal duty and restriction upon the power and the conscience of the Crown, had never been imposed upon any sovereign after the Reformation. The coronation oath did not bind queen Elizabeth to maintain the Reformation; and the old customary coronation oath continued through the reigns of the four princes of the house of Stuart. It merely bound the Crown to preserve the rights and liberties of the people. But the coronation oath of king William imposed a new duty and a new personal character on the sovereign. It binds the Crown in its legislative, as well as in its executive character, to maintain the Protestant establishment with all its rights. The Crown, in its legislative character, and as one of three legislative estates of the realm, must be personally protestant, and it would be a breach of that oath to concur in acts of legislation subversive or injurious to Protestant interests. And precisely upon the same principle, the other two integral parts of the entire legislature were, at the Revolution, not for the first time subjected to the same restrictive qualification as the sovereign, but the antecedent restrictions were continued; and consistency required that it should be so, not for the purpose of theoretical uniformity, not for the purpose of the ideal beauties of symmetry and regularity in the features of the constitution, but for the necessary practical purposes of legislation in carrying on the affairs of a Protestant government with safety and permanency. What a gross violation of principle. What a monstrous departure would it be from all good sense and practical wisdom, that one constituent part of the legislature should be Protestant, bound by a rigid obligation on its conscience to maintain Protestantism, while the other branches might be Catholic. Was it possible that a state of things, so utterly incongruous and discrepant with itself, could be intended as a system for the government of this country. He was unwilling to trouble the House further with what passed at the time of the Revolution, because he thought it superfluous to do so. He must observe, however, that the drift of the right hon. gentleman's (Mr. Canning) speech rather went to infer, that this point had passed unobserved, or sub silentio, at the Revolution, and that the statute of Charles 2nd, now sought to be repealed, had not been distinctly brought under notice at that period. Now, it was not very likely that Somers was unacquainted with the history of the proceedings connected with Titus Oates's plot, and unversed in the general nature and transactions of the reign of king Charles

2nd. And so little time was it that the restrictions, virtually created by the statute of Charles against Catholic peers, and which prevented them sitting in parliament, were unnoticed; so little time was it that the letter and the spirit of that restriction were not intended to be kept alive and perpetuated by the constitutional system settled at the Revolution; so little was this the case, that it is remarkable that the Bill of Rights refers to the statute of Charles 2nd, and imposes upon the king, at the age of 12 years, the obligation of repeating that very identical declaration against transubstantiation, the repeating or refusal to repeat which, was introduced by the statute of Charles, as the qualification or disqualification of peers for taking or not taking their seats in the House of Lords.

The right hon. gentleman (Mr. Canning) had accurately enough divided his historical periods, and had commented at large on the transactions of the reign of Charles 2nd. He had excited the sympathy of the House by reminding them of the judicial murder of lord Stafford. The right hon. gentleman's main argument seemed to be the fiction of the Popish Plot; but the right hon. gentleman had not said one word as to the transactions of the reign of James 2nd, though these, he presumed, were not fictions but realities; nor had he even once referred to the Bill of Rights; nor had he said one syllable as to what was meant to be the real and permanent character of the constitution, as settled at the Revolution. It served well the purpose of the right hon. gentleman to omit all this. But his right hon. colleague had not so contented himself; for he had broadly asserted (how correctly he must leave the House to decide) that the power of legislation was not, at the Revolution, exclusively embodied with Protestantism. He would crave the indulgence of the House to say a little more, and it would be but little, on this branch of the subject. He could assure them that he wished to avoid going into the consideration of the general measure, and would only notice those points which had not been adverted to in former discussions, or which had a pointed and distinct bearing on the immediate and particular question now before the House.—Keeping within this range, he would next remind them, that about eighteen years after the Revolution, the very same principle by which the Protestant character and constitution of the English parliament was secured, was embodied into and made a fundamental principle in the union with Scotland. At a very short interval before the treaty of union was concluded, an act was passed in the then separate parliament of Scotland, by which the 16 representative peers, and the 45 members of this House must be Protestants, and must be elected by Protestants. And this act is made a fundamental article in the treaty of union.

Here again is the Revolution system evidenced and acted upon in the composition of the united parliament. It was entirely unnecessary to refer, for a similar purpose, to the union with Ireland. Now to be told in the teeth of all this that Protestantism was not intended at the Revolution to be made a personal condition and an indelible indispensable qualification to the taking a seat in either House, was a statement to which the authority of no man could give one moment's currency.

Wishing to confine himself entirely within the circle of the present question, he would proceed to notice some other topics in the right hon. gentleman's speech. He had said, that the statute of Charles 2nd, was intended as a temporary measure, in order to prevent a Popish successor; but that danger had long since passed and the restriction ought not, therefore, to be prolonged beyond the duration of that necessity which gave it birth; instead of this, it was now made an indiscriminate instrument of vexation. He would not go over that part of the argument again. It might be true, that object was more immediately the exciting motive, the causa causans, for the introduction of the law; but to him it was perfectly manifest that the continuance of it was intended at the Revolution to be made permanent precisely for the same reasons and upon the same principles as the provisions of the Bill of Rights, and the constitutional system of Protestant government was then intended to be made permanent.

Were the provisions of the Bill of Rights to cease when the Popish descendants of James the Second were extinct?—certainly not. Every future king of England in the new Protestant succession was for ever afterwards to be bound by those strict and rigid precautions which were deemed absolutely necessary to prevent the most distant approach of danger to the reformed religion and Protestant liberties of the people. Insomuch, that if any future king should hold communion with the Church of Rome, or profess the Popish religion, or marry a Papist, the crown instantly falls from his head—he is no longer king, and his subjects are ipso facto dissolved from their allegiance. It was not left to parliament by the Bill of Rights, to hear and try these breaches of its provisions, and declare the throne vacant by any intervention or act of legislation on its part. But the fatal consequence is made immediate, absolute, and unavoidable. It was very true, that as long as a Popish pretender to the throne was in existence, the danger to the state from Catholic councils or Catholic power in the country was the greater. But to say, when that greater danger ceased, that all danger ceased, was reasoning which one could not well understand. And assuredly the Bill of Rights was founded on quite opposite reasoning, and introduced a system of permanent precaution to meet even possibilities. But the right hon. gentleman by his present bill, proposes to re-integrate the peer in his lost rights, and replace him in the same state, in which he stood in the reign of queen Elizabeth—unfettering him alone from all oaths, tests, restrictions, and securities, because danger had long ceased from a Popish pretender to the throne. As to the see of Rome, what harm could it do? whatever influence it had was gone, it had become effete and inert. And as to the legislative votes of seven or eight Catholic lords, they were melted and diluted in the mass of the peerage and were almost imperceptible. Danger externally or internally had become a vexatious pretence—such was the present strain of the right hon. gentleman's language. The right hon. gentleman had, on a former night, when he (Mr. W.) had ventured to address the House (and at no very auspicious season of the debate), told him, rather pleasantly, that he had reserved his more cogent arguments for the second reading of the bill. Now, if he could show that any arguments about to be used by himself, were in truth, the arguments of the right hon. gentleman against his own bill, he should then very confidently say they were cogent—not because they were personally his (Mr. W.'s), of which presumption he should not be suspected, but because they were the arguments of the right hon. gentleman himself, who could never be less than very cogent. Such arguments he thought he could produce from the opinions, the speeches, the votes, the compositions, and the legislation of the right hon. gentleman himself, upon former occasions connected with the subject before them. Danger, says the right hon. gentleman, now is an idle generality, no man can reduce it into shape and tell us what it is. And in conformity with this sentiment the right hon. gentleman's bill confers on the Catholic peer absolute and unqualified restoration to the legislative power of the peerage. But what did the right hon. gentleman think on this subject, how did he act upon it; how did he deal with the Catholic peers when Mr. Grattan brought in his bill in 1813?—Did the right hon. gentleman then assert the non-existence of danger?—did he then assert the claim of the Catholic peers upon those grounds of abstract original right upon which he now endeavours to distinguish them from a Catholic member of this House?—Did he then propose to confer upon them simple unqualified restoration to their power as it stood before the 30 Charles 2nd?—Why certainly not. The grounds then taken by the right hon. gentleman were precisely the contrary of all this, as much as one thing can be the contrary of another. And this difference does not rest upon speeches or arguments, for they may be forgotten or misunderstood; but the right hon. gentleman's opinions are recorded in Mr. Grattan's bill, in which he took so large a part. He would remind the House of the short contents of that bill. It was printed at length in the late publication of Mr. Grattan's speeches. The right hon. gentleman, and he hoped the House would well recollect the nature of it—in fact, it was almost as much the bill of the right hon. gentleman as of Mr. Grattan—That bill was not short as the present bill—not naked of oaths, qualifications, and securities, now so much decried as unnecessary by the right hon. gentleman; on the contrary, it contained a promissory oath occupying two pages of the book he held in his hand—an oath so voluminous, so minute, and so detailed, that it was a journey to get to the end of it, and the House would be fatigued and hardly have patience if he attempted to read it—he would not do so—but he would select the most pressing and strongest parts of it

He would, however, first remind gentlemen, that this oath was to be taken as a qualification by the Catholic peer as well as by the commoner before they could sit and vote in either House. In the first place the oath contained a disclaimer of the civil and temporal authority of the see of Rome in this country being a substitution for the former oath of supremacy.

Now what did the right hon. gentleman's present bill provide on this subject? Why, nothing—it dispensed with the necessity of taking the existing oath of supremacy to the king; but it substitutes no new oath whatever in the place of it.

Mr. Grattan's oath then proceeds to make the Catholic peer as well as the commoner swear, that he would defend the settlement and arrangement of property within the realm as established by law. It contains a disclaimer of any intention to subvert the Protestant church, and then the Peer is made by a strong promissory obligation to swear, that he would not use his privilege, power or influence to disturb the present church establishment, and that he would never abet others by any contrivance to make such an attempt.

Whether this oath acknowledged the pen of the right hon. gentleman as its author, or of Mr. Grattan, or of both, he did not know. But certain it was, that several other clauses forming a very important part of Mr. Grattan's bill, were personally brought up by the right hon. gentleman, and in the publication he now held in his hand, are dignified by his name. They comprise a very detailed system for the establishment of commissions for the purpose of inquiring into the loyalty of the persons nominated to be bishops, and for the purpose of control and supervision over the correspondence with the see of Rome.

Why did the right hon. gentleman think an oath of supremacy necessary in 1813, if it be not so now?—Why did he bind the Catholic peer then by that elaborate oath of which not one syllable has found its way into the present bill?—What was the difference between the case of the peer in 1813?—If there did exist grounds for apprehension in 1813 (and he had the right hon. gentleman's sanction and authority for saying that they did then exist) what had happened since to remove them?

But he must next remind the right hon. gentleman and the House, of the bill of the last session. The oath contained in that bill did certainly omit the promissory obligations of Mr. Grattan's oath. But it contained an oath of supremacy disclaiming the jurisdiction of the see of Rome in all matters which conflicted with the duties of undivided allegiance to the king, or with the duties of civil obedience to him or his courts.—But even this oath has been discarded by the right hon. gentleman as unnecessary, though a year only has elapsed since the right hon. gentleman by the part he took upon that occasion must have entertained a contrary opinion—and so did the House at large. When he witnessed so strange a course of proceeding, his own notions retrograded much upon the expediency of Catholic emancipation. What reliance could any man have?—What confidence could he assume, that the Protestant religion, and the rights and liberties of the people, so inseparably connected with it, were placed beyond the reach of attack and injury?—What satisfaction could the public or the Protestant population of the empire have, when they observed what was passing?—What rational man would say, that a system of precaution, protection and security upon this great subject, had been matured by the reflection and wisdom of parliament, when year after year, a bill was produced, each inconsistent with every other, the latter always in contradiction with the former, and all of them so irreconcilable with any fixed rule, standard or opinion, as to show, that there was not only nothing agreed upon between the opponents and supporters of the measure, but that there was no fixed principle agreed upon, even by the supporters of the measure among themselves. Upon former occasions great names were appealed to; but it was in vain for the present purpose. Mr. Pitt's name had been formerly mentioned—how could he have supported such a bill as this? Mr. Fox's authority had been referred to as in favour of the general measure. This distinguished man died before any practical measure had been agitated. But it was remarkable, that when the first relaxation of the penal code against Catholics was introduced by sir John Mitford, in order to secure their titles, and to enable them to enjoy real property, that great man expressly excepted the concession of enabling them to sit in parliament. He found no traces of his ever having changed that opinion. He was an authority not for, but against the right hon. gentleman.

If Mr. Grattan had been living—believing, as he did, that his sentiments were genuine and sincere on this subject, and recollecting as he did his manly avowal upon the subject of securities, he did not believe that he would have concurred in this bill. He was highly sensible of the indulgence of the House, and had little more to add. But the House would recollect that they were placed in a new situation by the nature of this bill, and by the novelty of the right hon. gentleman's arguments, and his wish was simply to advert to the new bearing and aspect of the question.

Upon a former occasion he had been a little sarcastically complimented by his hon. friend, the member for Knaresborough, as being the only man in the kingdom, who had read through that large folio volume, laid upon the table of the House, as the report of the committee appointed to inquire into the state of the Catholic church throughout Europe, chiefly for the purpose of ascertaining their relations, and subjection to the civil government, &c. of each state. Certainly, that folio had rather a repulsive exterior, which, to many persons, was a perfect veto against opening the leaves of it. He had no morbid appetite for drudgery and superfluous labour; but, he must confess the crime of having made himself master of the report; and he was glad that he had done so, because the House would probably give him credit for stating the result of it.

His opinion had always been, that in order to find out what submission to the king, as the civil head of the constitution of our country, we might reasonably exact from the Catholic body, it was a fair criterion to inquire what control was exercised, and what preventions were interposed by the different states of Europe to exclude the interference of the see of Rome, and to maintain their own internal government. With this view, he had felt it to be his duty, to trace the subject through those papers, valuable in his individual opinion, which had been transmitted from the different foreign courts, which it seems were, in the eye of other persons, so useless, that they ought not to have been compiled, and which had been printed, in vain, not to be read. And having done so, he would in his seat assert, that there was no state upon the continent, from large Austria, to little Venice, which had not armed itself with that control over the Catholic religion, in all its external and internal relations as they might affect the civil power of each state, which it was now thought wise in this country to cast away and abandon. And he would ask of the Catholic emancipators a question, to which they perhaps might be able to give an answer, but to which he protested he could give none. Why Great Britain was to be the only territory in Europe, in which the Catholic religion and its professors were not to be bound by the same principles of submission to the civil supremacy of the state, which were exacted and enforced in every other corner of Europe? What was there so peculiar in the British constitution, that its safety was beyond the reach of attack, and that we should throw away those precautions, for maintaining that perfect independency of the external influence of the see of Rome, operating through the internal agency of its religion, which every other government thought absolutely essential to its preservation? Why, he knew, indeed, that apprehensions from this quarter had been treated with ridicule and levity. Were we, it is said, to be terrified now with the barbarous bigotry which prevailed three centuries ago? Were we to be frightened now with the Catholic league, and the Spanish armada? He felt no greater alarm now, from those ancient terrors, than other gentlemen did. But he had heard the see of Rome at the present day, represented to be equally inert in its dispositions, and impotent in its measures. Now, if those gentlemen, who were so averse to reading the papers on the table, would allow him to offer them the result of what he was happy to have read, in order to save them trouble he would convince them of the contrary. In the year 1786, a period of no very dark antiquity, the pope actually established ecclesiastical tribunals in several of the electorates of Germany; this encroachment produced a congress of all the ecclesiastical electors, which was held at the Baths of Embs, and the emperor, as the head of the Germanic body, sent a strong remonstrance to Rome, declaring that he would defend the rights of the Germanic body against what he properly called an unwarrantable usurpation. But the latest instance of this inertness or apathy, which are now said so much to distinguish the character of the church of Rome, is the best and most remarkable. In Spain, it seems, that the bishops and archbishops take an oath, for the same purpose as our own oath of supremacy, by which they swear fidelity to the king, and deference to his prerogatives. Now, no longer since than the 20th of November 1814, the nuncio of the present pope made application to the Spanish government to omit the clause respecting the obedience and deference to the royal prerogatives. But the court of Madrid returned for answer, "that no innovation should be made in the oath." Now, will the Catholic emancipators, or the right hon. gentleman in his reply, have the goodness to inform us why at Madrid, the favourite climate of papal feelings and principles, that very oath to secure the civil supremacy of the Crown in its objects and purposes, the same as our own, should be deemed requisite to maintain the independency of that country, which has become so useless or so unjust, under the Protestant monarchy, and Protestant constitution of Great Britain, as to require unqualified abolition.

He should detain them but a moment longer; had those gentlemen who so boldly asserted the effete state of papal intervention as it might operate on foreign governments; who would give us to understand, that there is scarcely vitality or existence in such an idea—have they forgot the coronation of the emperor Napoleon, by that authority which we are told, politically speaking, is a nonentity—have they forgot, that by the same authority, Napoleon was divorced, in order that he might ally himself by marriage with the House of Austria, and perpetuate his usurpation in a family of his own; an event, of the consequences of which, notwithstanding what had since happened he would say, God grant they may continue indifferent and innoxious, to the future destinies of France and of Europe. But he was too sensible of the indulgence he had experienced to occupy the time of the House any longer; and, therefore, he should conclude, by saying, that the grounds of his decided opposition to the partial and singular measure of the right hon. gentleman were, its utter repugnancy and contradiction, to those views of the general question, which had been taken of it by either side, and even by those majorities which had formerly been successful.—He concluded with moving, "That the second reading be put off till that day six months."

Mr. Wilmot said, that though he had voted before for concessions to the Catholics, he had never stated his opinion upon the question; but he should now take the opportunity of doing so, because he had the misfortune to differ with a large and respectable body of his constituents. The learned gentleman had asked, why this measure was separated from the general measure? He was not bound to answer that question. All that he was bound to do was to examine into the general merits of the measure. He would therefore ask the learned gentleman whether there was any thing in the Roman Catholic religion that disqualified the Catholic peer from doing his duty as a legislator to his fellow countrymen? He was certain the learned gentleman would admit that there was nothing of that nature in the tenets of the Catholics. "But," said the learned gentleman "would you give concessions without demanding securities?" To that question he would reply by saying, that he could not ask for securities where he saw no danger. Now, he saw no present danger from the admission of Catholic peers into parliament; and even supposing that there was a distant contingency of future danger from such a measure, he would say, as the House of Commons had long been a debtor to those noble lords for the immunities which it had withheld from them, it might afford to be their creditor for a short time for the securities required. Had it been the fortune of our ancestors to have lived in the present day, he was sure that, though they might have originated these disabilities, they themselves would have given the motion of his right hon friend their support.—Much had been said as to the obligations of a king at his coronation; but he denied that there was any thing contained in the coronation oath which could at all prevent his majesty from consenting to revoke any restraints at present bearing on his Roman Catholic subjects. He denied the contrary assertion, because such a consent would not endanger the safety of the established church. He was equally prepared to deny that an alteration of this kind, in favour of the Roman Catholic peers, could by possibility be as dangerous to the country as it was formerly supposed to be; conceiving, as he did that our constitution was sufficiently plastic to adapt itself to any such change. At the same time, he was willing to allow, that Charles 2nd was actuated by most corrupt and un-English principles, and was a Catholic in heart as well as in fact.

Danger was justly apprehended from Catholic influence under such a king, and under his brother. But let the House observe, after the expulsion of the Stuart family, how gradually less those apprehensions had become, and, how many severe statutes had been repealed, until, in the reign of our late beneficent sovereign, the civil condition of the Catholics had been considerably ameliorated. By such partial relaxations, government themselves had forced the Catholics to ask for concessions; they had permitted them just to taste the cup of civil liberty, and then had dashed it from their lips. For his part, he anticipated no inconvenience from granting the concession at present asked for. They had been told, however, by an hon. and learned gentleman that in another House these seven peers might produce certain evil consequences; as if, in the first place, their influence upon the sentiments of the great body of our nobility was to be such as to direct their votes and conduct; or, in the second place, as if all these seven peers must necessarily be of the same opinion on political matters. But the hon. and learned gentleman had said, that the passing of this bill would be heart's-ease to the Catholic peers, and heart-breaking to the Catholic body. Good God! was that House called upon in this way to supply arguments to the Catholic population? Were they to suppose that the Catholic population would repine because the Catholic peers were restored to their seats in the House of Lords? Would they not reject the suspicion with disdain? Was it necessary here to discuss that endless question of securities and of the influence of the Papal See, which, in deliberating upon the general question, had always been found the great, the almost insuperable difficulty, although it had been very properly made the first question to be ascertained. The present measure rested upon grounds entirely distinct and separate. He would support it, because he was convinced it was a proper measure, because he believed it would conciliate the people of Ireland, a people for whose loyalty he felt respect, and for whose sufferings he felt compassion; and lastly, because it would restore to a noble and illustrious order of men the rights which their ancestors possessed, and which they had never forfeited by crime or dishonour. He recollected well, during a discussion on this question, which took place in the other House of parliament about eight years ago, having seen a noble lord with his son, a lad about twelve years of age, standing at the bar of the House. The nobleman to whom he alluded, turned round to a friend of his, and said, "The result of this night's discussion will determine me whether I shall encourage or repress the spirit of emulation in this boy's mind" [Hear, hear!]. He knew not what course that Nobleman took with respect to the education of his child; but this he knew, that it was unworthy in that House to preserve laws which went to degrade all that was noble, and to stifle in honourable minds the desire and the hope of serving their country. Neither in a political nor religious point of view was there any real objection to the measure; He would therefore invoke them, in the spirit of the constitution, to give freedom to those who never forfeited their rights; and, in the spirit of religion, to "do unto others as they would wish others should do unto them."

Mr. Foster said, that until the penal laws were totally repealed, the peace and tranquillity of Ireland would never be restored. But, in repealing those laws, parliament should take care to carry the mind of the country with them. He denied that the mind of the Protestants was with the present measure. He would support the general measure; but he thought at present that the country was taken by surprise, and that the question of securities was evaded. He would therefore vote against the bill.

Dr. Phillimore observed, that upon former occasions, the supporters of measures tending to remove the disabilities of the Roman Catholics had been met with such remarks as these—"Deal not with us in general propositions; give us some specific measure." It could not, on the present occasion be objected, that a specific measure was not brought forward. He was ready to admit that the general question was one that had been ever nearest his heart; but the present measure, standing as it did on peculiar and very favourable grounds, had his most hearty support. The experience of every page in our history since the period at which disabilities were first imposed upon Roman Catholics served to prove the claims which the peers of that persuasion had, to an act of justice like that which the legislature were now called upon to pass. The learned gentleman then proceeded to show, that when the Spanish Armada had sailed upon its destination and approached our coasts, queen Elizabeth confided the chief command of that navy which had proved the salvation of the country, to a Catholic peer, lord Howard of Effingham. In the reign of Charles I., it was a memorable fact, that the Catholic peers voted in favour of the Protestant bishops. During the civil wars which ensued, it had been calculated that of the three hundred noblemen who bravely perished in the cause of royalty, no fewer than 190 were Roman Catholics. The exclusion of these peers from their seats in the House of Lords was the result of evidence of a description the most perjured, and of alleged plots which had no real existence; and that the strongest authority for the harsh measure of expulsion was the testimony of wretches such as Oates and Bedloe. The iniquitous system which they had contrived was consummated by what historians had justly denominated the judicial murder of lord Stafford. The learned member here read an affecting account of the trial of that noble peer given by Mr. Evelyn, who had witnessed the whole of the proceedings. Mr. Evelyn indignantly complained that the life of a virtuous and aged nobleman should have been taken away upon the evidence of a witness, "whose testimony, with impartial men, would not be considered sufficient to hang a dog." When it was said that the Catholic peers would act with hostility towards the Church of England, what proof of this had they from experience? When the bill was agitated in the House of Peers in the reign of Charles I. to exclude the bishops, how did the Catholic peers vote? How did the ancestor of the duke of Norfolk vote on that occasion? What greater possible danger could be apprehended from Catholic peers than from peers denying the divinity of our Saviour, or the doctrine of the atonement, or professing Presbyterianism, a doctrine much more hostile to the Church of England, in many respects, than Catholicism, and under which the church had actually been trampled under foot? As a measure of retributive justice and Christian charity, they were called upon to pass the bill.

Mr. W. Courtenay thought the hon. and learned member for Oxford had not addressed his arguments to the true question before the House. That question was not whether these disabilities were or were not rightly imposed in the first instance, but whether it was proper to continue them? They had been passed at the time of the discovery of a plot, and when the nation was under the influence of general alarm. It was provided that Catholics should not have access to the king's person. At present there was no fear of their getting near the person of the king, but it was feared lest they should get to sit in parliament. But he would ask, which was of the most consequence, the access of Catholics of rank, influence, and talents, to the sovereign, whom they might sway by their counsels; or their sitting among the mass of Protestants in the House of Peers? If any danger existed formerly, none existed now. He rejoiced to see a system of toleration prevail among all classes: The annual indemnity bill was passed to enable Dissenters of all denominations to sit and vote in parliament. The army and navy had been opened to the Catholics. Their peers might fill the most exalted ranks, and enjoy all the advantages of promotion. In short, they were intrusted by law with every species of power that might be dangorous, yet refused admittance within the walls of parliament where they would be subject to control. Surely this was a most glaring anomaly! Looking at the present state of Ireland, it was most important that this bill should be passed, that those who had hitherto been most unjustly excluded from the benefits of the constitution might feel a common interest, and unite in a common cause. The friends of harmony and tranquillity must be the friends of this bill. He felt a strong persuasion that the great general measure was silently making its progress towards ultimate success; and he conjured gentlemen who had not yet voted or who having voted still doubted, to consider whether the present was not the precise moment when such a gracious concession ought, for the general welfare, to be made.

Mr. W. Peel did not believe that the supporters of the bill were aware of the consequences that would ensue if it were passed into a law. The question was not merely whether six or eight Catholic peers of high character should be admitted into the other House; but, if this partial measure was successful, Catholic commoners ere long would be introduced into this House, and there would be no reason why other sects should be excluded. What, then, became of the security of the Protestant church? It had been said, that the majority of the inhabitants of Ireland were in favour of the measure; perhaps so; but if it were possible to poll the whole population of the three kingdoms, the numbers would be greatly against any further concession. He could not tell how any man who hoped for tranquillity could support such a proposition. If the present were the time to admit Catholic peers, why was it not the time to admit Catholic commoners? And if so, why had not the right hon. the attorney-general for Ireland brought forward the general question? Had he been a Catholic peer, he declared to God he would have objected to the introduction of the separate question, and would not have accepted of a boon that was not given to all those who were of the same persuasion. He should be glad to learn why this question was now agitated. Its most sanguine friends could not hope that it would pass into a law; and it was only imposing upon the peers the invidious task of throwing it out.

Mr. Wynn, after complimenting the hon. member for Newcastle (Mr. Wilmot) on the liberal view he had taken of the subject, expressed his concurrence in the opinion, that the passing of this bill could have the effect of tranquillizing Ireland. In every view it was most important, but in this view it was incalculably so. Without it, all future measures of conciliation would want half their grace, and every measure of coercion would acquire additional severity. He saw no reason for not carrying a partial bill of relief, if the general measure could not at present be advantageously brought forward. After referring shortly to the proceedings in 1813, and regretting the vote he had then given, the right hon. gentleman went on to contend, that no danger could result from the admission of Catholic peers into the other House. If, as the hon. member who last spoke apprehended, this bill should be followed by others to admit commoners, then was the proper time to object. At the present moment, other sects were not excluded. The learned member for Oxford also dreaded much from the votes and influence of six or eight individuals; and had contended, that if Catholics were admitted into the legislature, the king ought to be released from the obligation not to marry a Catholic. There was, however, a most decided difference between the cases: the Catholic peer would be controlled by the Protestant majority, but the king was complete in himself, and could exercise his prerogative without control, excepting from public opinion. The learned member for Oxford, however, did not seem to think that public opinion would be any check, and that the king could, if he wished it, create a vast number of Catholic peers. It would be just as easy for the king to march the 1st regiment of guards into the House of Lords and make them all peers. The thing was impossible in the present state and frame of society. It had been asked, where are the securities? And it had been fairly answered, where are the dangers? He had supported the bill of 1821 with securities, not because he thought them necessary, but because he thought that they would contribute to the success of the measure; nay, he would consent to their insertion in this bill, if they would be at all useful. When he recollected that it was now 290 years since the Reformation, and that during half that time the Roman Catholic peers had sat in parliament without the slightest imputation, even when they were much more numerous than at present, he could not entertain a moment's fear as to the effect of their influence. If any man could point out a single inconvenience that really arose to the constitution in consequence of their formerly having seats, he would admit that an argument of some weight might be founded upon it. Not very long since, within the memory of some present, the Roman Catholics were looked upon as a distinct class. That distinction had now been removed; and he was satisfied that the time was not very far distant, when they would be admitted into both branches of the legislature, without exciting the least apprehension. If there were a discrepancy in admitting peers and not admitting commons, it was a discrepancy that had existed for a century. In conclusion, he was ready to vote for any bill, the effect of which would be to remove any of the disabilities, however unimportant, under which the Roman Catholics laboured.

Mr. Martin, of Galway, said, the hon. and learned member for Oxford had come forward on the present occasion as one of the Horatii. [A laugh.] He begged pardon of the House if he had not pronounced the word correctly. He trusted the bill would be carried. It was not connected with the general question, and had not been brought forward by his

hon. friend (Mr. Plunkett) because it was considered that the present time was unfavourable to the discussion of the Catholic claims. All the restrictions imposed on the Catholics had been condemned by Blackstone. That learned commentator said, that if ever the time should arrive when the authority of the Pope ceased to be formidable, and there was no pretender to the Crown, it would be proper to repeal the laws against Catholics. Now the authority of the Pope had ceased to be formidable.

Mr. Secretary Peel said, that after having stated his sentiments to the House so fully on a former evening, it was not his intention at present to occupy much of their attention. He rose, rather for the purpose of removing some misconceptions and misapprehensions. He did not object to the measure, because it was a partial measure, nor did he solicit the vote of any gentleman who might concur with him in his objections to the particular measure, under the impression that when the general question came to be discussed, his (Mr. P's) opposition to it would be relaxed. It was impossible, after the House had so recently passed a bill removing the disabilities affecting the Roman Catholics, that he could anticipate so decided an opposition to the general measure, as might have been expected in former times; but he would not relax his opposition to the measure, because he foresaw the probability of its ultimate success. He apprehended that it was in the true spirit of the constitution that members of that House should maintain their opinions to the last, notwithstanding overwhelming majorities against them. If it were probable that the general measure would be carried, the argument for the particular measure was, pro tanto, weakened, and in proportion to the probability of the ultimate success of the general measure, he did most earnestly deprecate the success of the present bill. He should merely state the outline of the argument on which he relied, without referring to collateral topics. If the House should take a different view of this question, he should have another interest to look to, and another duty to perform; for it would then become his duty to endeavour to create as little evil, and derive as much good as possible from the measure. He did not object to the present measure because it was partial; for there were some partial measures to which he should not object, such, for instance, as that of placing the English and Irish Roman Catholics on the same footing, or that of granting the distinction of a silk gown, and other privileges, short of the judicial functions, to Roman Catholic barristers. There was a great distinction between a specific and a partial measure; and his objection to the present measure was, that it was partial in its operation while it was general in its principle. It had been argued, that there could be no danger in restoring a few noblemen of distinguished rank and excellent character, to the privileges which their ancestors enjoyed; but, could any man of common sense fail to see the sophistry of this argument? The question was not, whether half a dozen individuals should be restored to the privileges of their ancestors, but whether the disabilities affecting one branch of the legislature should be removed, while they continued to be imposed on the other—whether the Crown should have the power of creating an unlimited number of Roman Catholic peers, while the people had not the power of returning to the House of Commons a limited number of Roman Catholic representatives. It had been contended, that the disabilities affecting the peers ought to be removed first, because they were latest imposed upon them; but if there was any validity in that argument, it would go to prove that all restrictions should be first removed from the throne.—With regard to securities, that part of the subject had not been discussed in the last debate, and in his opinion it would have been better to pass it over in silence, than to allude to it in so ominous a manner as in the present discussion. They were now told that these securities were never necessary, that they had been adopted merely for the purpose of quieting some ridiculous and exaggerated fears of Protestant bigots, and that the best security was to be derived from the unqualified admission of our Roman Catholic fellow-subjects to the enjoyment of equal rights and privileges. If such was the language adopted now, and the present bill were to pass without any securities, what would be the arguments employed with regard to securities when the general question came to be discussed in the next session? The advocates of this question so frequently shifted their ground, that it was not easy to anticipate their arguments, or unravel all the sophistries to which they might have recourse—

"Quo teneam vultus mutantem Protea nodo?" There could be no doubt, however, that if the present bill passed, it would be urged as an argument next session against every species of security.—There was one point to which he was particularly desirous of calling the attention of his right hon. friend. The present bill professed only to remove the disabilities affecting the Roman Catholic peers; but it went much farther, for it would have the effect of relieving the House of Peers from the necessity of taking the oath of supremacy. This was a most serious difficulty in the way of the measure. As far as authority went, he had that of the late Mr. Grattan, Mr. Ponsonby, and almost all the most enlightened advocates of the general question, against repealing the oath of supremacy. So enamoured, indeed, were they of this oath, that another oath of supremacy, to be taken by Catholic peers, had been annexed to the bill which passed that House in the last session. That oath was solemnly recognized by the Bill of Rights, the charter upon which king William accepted the throne at the Revolution, and which differed from all other acts of parliament, in being declared to be permanently enacted as the law of the realm for ever. There was the same guarantee, therefore, for the continuation of the oath of supremacy, as for the exclusion of Roman Catholics from the throne, and the maintenance of the rights and liberties of the subject. He could not but consider it a fatal objection to this measure, that it exempted the House of Peers from the necessity of taking this oath, which had been framed in the reign of Elizabeth, and which was solemnly recognized by the Bill of Rights. He would admit, that at the period when the Catholic peers were excluded the House of Peers was under a temporary alarm from Titus Oates's plot; he would admit that they acted under duress, and that they were not in possession of their right faculties; he would admit that the trial of lord Stafford was unjust, and that his execution was a judicial murder; yet he still contended, that there might be other concurring circumstances which formed a sufficient ground for the enactment of the bill affecting the peers.—But it was said, that, even admitting that there were circumstances which justified the exclusion of Catholic peers from parliament, those circumstances had ceased, and the disabilities ought to cease with them. If the validity of this argument were admitted, the House must be prepared to abandon many of the best securities for the maintenance of the constitution. Neither the constitution, nor the securities by which it was maintained, were framed à priori: they were founded on the experience of the past. They were not called upon to inquire into the causes which led to the Reformation, or to examine minutely the frame of mind in which Henry 8th wrote a treatise one year "adversus Martinum Lutherum," and, in the next year, on account of his divorce from queen Catherine, became a violent opponent of the Catholic faith. The septennial bill was enacted in consequence of specific circumstances; but were they to return to triennial parliaments, because those circumstances had ceased? Under all the circumstances, he felt himself bound to resist the present motion; and he implored the advocates of the just rights and privileges of the constitution, to consider whether it was decent or wise in the House of Commons to originate this measure? All that could be lost by the rejection of the present proposal was, the postponement of the general question until the early part of next session, when it would be taken up upon a broad and high ground. They could then contend for the eligibility, not merely of peers to sit in the House of Lords, but of every person to all situations in the country. If peers were to be admitted, there was no justice in the exclusion of commoners. He could, therefore, see no good reason for pressing the present partial measure, as a delay of a few months would bring the question before them in its most ample and general form. There would be no disadvantages resulting from the rejection of this measure, and the House could not, in his opinion, sanction it consistently with their duty.

The Marquis of Londonderry agreed with many of his hon. friends in thinking that the present moment was not the most favourable for the introduction of the general measure. He would admit that the great tendency in the disposition of the country was, to view this subject with less of alarm, and with more favourable sentiments than on former occasions; but still he did not think it would be politic to press that disposition too much. But though this was his opinion as to the general measure, still he could understand the policy of the present measure, and, under all the circumstances, he was disposed to support it. In the bill before the House, the grounds of discussion were very much narrowed; a variety of topics, connected with the general proposition, were necessarily omitted, as having no bearing on this part. In the general discussion, he had always rested the criterion by which the question, not of admission, but of eligibility to office of Roman Catholics, should be tried on this—Whether there was that reasonable fear of danger to the state which would render this eligibility impolitic? The present motion did not require so wide a discussion; and in the interval between this and the period of the great question, he thought it most proper; for there were many who would support the admission of Catholic Peers, who would not be disposed to go the length of admitting the eligibility of the Roman Catholic commoners. With respect to the question of securities, he did not see why the Catholics should not associate themselves to the state as well as other classes of his majesty's subjects; but he would modify those securities in such a manner, as that, while they afforded that guarantee which he was satisfied the Catholics were disposed to give, would prevent the measure from having the appearance of severity. "But then," said his right hon. friend (Mr. Peel) "you have given up the oath of supremacy by this bill." He apprehended, that if his right hon. friend would be satisfied with an oath of supremacy, the bill might be easily so modified as to insure his support. The Roman Catholic did not object to the oath, and the only difference which existed at all on the subject was, as to the sense in which the word "spiritual" was to be understood. On the ground of the acquisition of power by the Catholics, there was no real cause of fear. The utmost that could be expected from the general emancipation would be, the return to that House of perhaps eight or nine Catholic members, and the power which they had in this country was pretty well known. He viewed the leaving open this question as a matter not so much of danger as of embarrassment to the country; and with that view he should wish to see it set at rest. As to the particular question before the House, though his right hon. friend had argued it as a matter of just and of legal right, yet, however disposed he might be to concur in that view of the question, still, after a lapse of so long a time, he should not be disposed to support it if he saw the least appearance of danger. That danger, however, had not been made apparent to his mind, and therefore he would concur in the bill.

Mr. Canning began by observing, that if in the reply which he had made on the former night to his right hon. friend (Mr. Peel), he had dropped a word, or let slip an expression, which could be supposed to convey to his right hon. friend's mind, that he thought he had met the question unfairly, his right hon. friend had entirely mistaken his meaning; for he would declare, that whatever difference of opinion subsisted between them, it was impossible in his conception, either with reference to the question in its wider range, or to the narrow basis on which he had placed it, to have encountered a fairer adversary. If he had said, that his right hon. friend had not touched the justice or expediency of the case, he meant the justice and expediency of that part of it which he had introduced, and not the general question. He was glad that his noble friend's speech had intervened between that of his right hon. friend and his own; for, in his latter remarks, he had very ably developed the views and the policy to which the discussion of this question should be referred. To bring the merits of this partial motion more clearly to their attention, he would beg of honourable gentlemen to recollect what had been the progress of the discussions on the measure before parliament. To go no farther back, he would begin with the discussion which the House of Commons entertained in 1812. On that occasion, he had had the honour of submitting a resolution, the first successful one on that point which had engaged the attention of parliament. In that resolution the House pledged itself to consider the subject early in the ensuing session, with the view of bringing the question to a secure, conciliatory, and permanent adjustment. What was the fate of that measure? It was well known that it was one which did not meet the concurrence of the other House. In the next year, and in redemption of its pledge, the subject was introduced, and submitted for consideration in its most comprehensive sense. The bill had passed two of its stages, but it failed in the committee, owing to the introduction of a clause which continued to shut the Roman Catholics out of parliament. In consequence of that clause, the measure was withdrawn, and in that measure he fully concurred at the time. But, looking back to the stage of the measure then, and to its progress since, he felt convinced that the decision of himself and the other friends of the measure on that occasion, was one not so much of reason as of temper; and though he took his full share of the blame of assenting, he had regretted it ever since. At that time the friends of the bill were offered all sorts of partial concessions, except the opening of parliament, by the hon. members who took a lead in opposing the measure. The friends of the bill improvidently refused, and they now found, with regret, that though nine years had elapsed, the question had not much advanced. Last year, however, a bill was introduced, supported by the stupendous talents of his right hon. friend, the attorney-general for Ireland, and was carried through the Commons—a measure comprehensive in the highest degree, and accompanied with conditions of such a nature as were thought to preclude all possible danger in the minds of those who feared any. What was the fate of that measure? It was rejected in the other House, and the friends of the measure were now called upon to adopt one which was more likely to be successful. But, what were the arguments of their opponents? They called upon them to adhere to the same course in which they had hitherto so repeatedly failed. That was natural enough on the part of those who were hostile to the ultimate success of the measure; but it was strange that it should have weight with any of its supporters.—The right hon. gentleman here adverted to the partial, though highly important concessions which had been made since 1813—the opening of the army and navy to the Roman Catholics—a measure, too, originating in the House of Lords; and it should not be forgotten, that the danger of opening the army and navy to Catholics was formerly urged as one of the strongest arguments against concession. Yet such was the effect of partial discussion, that this was carried, which would have been rejected if thrown into the general measure—He then contended, that the disabilities thus removed, almost without discussion, were far more important than those which he sought. The measure before the House was not complicated. Its bearings could be seen at a glance. It went not to innovate, but to restore rights which had existed before—to remove from the injured posterity the disabilities which were entailed on them by the injustice done towards their ancestors. This was not touching on the privileges of the peers, or if it did, it did so with tenderness and delicacy. It made the Commons do for them, what it was supposed they would not do for themselves—for it was not to be imagined that they would begin by admitting the Catholics of their own order, while they refused any such concession to Catholic commoners. The right hon. gentleman next dwelt upon the anomaly of supposing that the House of Lords, which had originated a bill rendering a Catholic peer eligible to rise to the highest rank in the army and navy, to command a large portion of the armed force of the country, to have access to the closet of his sovereign, would, notwithstanding he might possess such power, exclude him from a seat in that assembly, one of the objects of which was, to check, to control, and to keep down the pride and ambition of great and powerful subjects. It had been shown that the present measure was not innovation, but restoration—that it was granting back privileges which had been taken away unjustly, and that even the alleged causes had long since ceased to exist. But it was said, that though the same causes which produced those disabilities did not now exist, other causes might, which would be equally conclusive. He would admit this reasoning; but let the other causes be shown. At the Revolution, the act of the 30th of Charles 2nd, was continued, from causes of danger from abroad, and the discontent of a large party at home; but that cast no slur on the Revolution. Now, let his right hon. friend point out the existence of any one of the same dangers. "I do not," continued the right hon. gentleman, "call upon my right hon. friend to show the existence of a Popish successor; I do not require of him to produce a king taking the sacrament according to the Catholic mode one day, and the Protestant the next; I do not insist on his pointing out an exiled monarch in a foreign land, aided by foreign powers, planning the invasion of the country; but I think I have a right to call upon him to show me some little danger to justify his opposition to this measure. I do not insist upon his searching history, but his own imagination, which is less likely to fail him, for some little scantling of danger; and if he will show me that as arising from my plan, I give him my word I will sit down and withdraw this bill." [Hear, hear.]—On the subject of securities, the right hon. gentleman said he would have no objection to them, but he would not traffic between security and concession. As he had already said, he would not make them matters of barter and sale. He was of opinion that there ought not to exist any correspondence with any foreign power, against the letter of an existing law. But it was not to be expected from him, that he should provide those securities, since the House of Lords had thrown them completely over, when they passed the Army and Navy bill. His right hon. friend might complain, that other securities were not annexed to this bill. He (Mr. C.) would say, that the contents of this bill did not require these securities. It had been asked, whether Great Britain was to be the country in which such securities were not to be required? He had no right to answer this question, but he would say that, in his opinion, it ought not. It was necessary that a proper control should be exercised; but he was not to be blamed because he had not provided for it in the measure under discussion. He would, however, in his turn, ask, whether the events which had taken place in Europe since 1812 had not placed this country in a different situation from that in which it stood before? Were we now to be more completely insulated in our policy than at any former period? Ought it not to be taken into consideration, that at the congress of Vienna an act was adopted, by which it was agreed, that in all the states over which the congress could exercise control, religious difference should create no distinction as to civil or political rights. He had been told that his bill was little and short, and effected its purpose with irrelevant dimensions. But here was the congress of Vienna altering the whole policy of Europe, over an extent of territory comprising from 45,000,000 to 50,000,000 of inhabitants. This great measure was accomplished by the single stroke of a pen. It should be recollected, that England was a party to the arrangements of the congress, and that Hanover was one of the states affected by them. Hanover might have Catholic ministers and Catholic senators, but not so England. It might be said, that the particular measure upon the subject of religion, adopted by the congress, was nugatory. He believed that this was not the case. He was assured by those whom he believed to possess accurate information on the subject, that, before the act of congress was agreed to, the system of exclusion on account of religious differences was exceedingly strict; and, as a proof of this, it was stated that not many years ago, a menial servant in the stables of the emperor of Austria was dismissed on account of his being a Protestant. At this moment he understood the president of one of the chambers of the kingdom of Hanover was a Catholic. When it appeared that a spirit of liberality was diffusing itself throughout the continent, was it necessary that England alone should retain her insulated policy with regard to religion? It was often said, that England was the only country in which the slave became free upon setting his foot upon the soil. Should it also be said, that it was the only country in which disqualifications prevailed founded on religious difference? We had long been accustomed to deal in negatives. Members of that House had long been in the practice of swearing at the table in a manner to make them believe that faith was, not what they believed, but what they disbelieved—to think privation a privilege, and to be proud of that which was called disgraceful. The grounds upon which he rested his measure were, that the dangers which existed, first from the date of the Reformation to the time of Charles 2nd, and, secondly, from the time of Charles 2nd to the Revolution, and which formed a justification for the statutes which had been framed against the Catholics, were now passed away. He was willing to grant to the fullest extent, that a great political necessity had a right to demand the sacrifice of individual privileges; but he coupled this admission with the condition, that the existence of political necessity ought to be incontrovertibly proved. Those persons who endeavoured to show that the act of Charles 2nd was passed in times like the present, had misrepresented, and not quoted, the opinions of their ancestors in support of their argument. He was of opinion that too much weight was attached to the conduct of our ancestors at the period of the Revolution. That was not a time when it could be expected that a man, even of the clearest head—and most humane heart, would try experiments in legislation. Our ancestors, in the unsettled circumstances of the times, took the laws as they found them. Good God! how different was the situation of the country now, from that in which it stood at those periods to which the opponents of the Catholics were fond of referring for arguments against them! For about a hundred years after the Reformation, the Catholic and Protestant parties were combating on this soil; it might be said that a struggle was going on to see which should wed the state, and make her exclusively its own. But the time of combat was passed—the Catholics tendered a willing submission,

"Ausonii videre: tua est Lavinia conjux."

"You," said the Catholics, "have wedded the state: we no longer pretend to be rivals: we wish to be united with you in friendship; we are willing to live quietly under your reign; we call upon you to deal out an equal measure of justice and mercy towards us." [Cheers.] His right hon. friend had argued a question of peace in the spirit of conflict. The question of rivalry had been decided. The Protestant religion and the constitution were inseparably united; and all that he asked was, that the subdued party might be allowed to participate in the enjoyment of that happiness which was to be obtained by living under the constitution of this country, and participating in its privileges. The House ought to consider, that it was not the business of states to found their prosperity upon extraordinary virtues; they must calculate only on the ordinary average weight of good qualities which might be hoped to be found in all mankind. It was a great panegyrick upon those noble persons for whose relief the bill was intended, that under all their privations they had preserved their loyalty and attachment to the constitution unshaken; but it was impossible to suppose that they would always continue in the same temper of mind. By refusing to accede to the measure which he had introduced, the House would maintain a system of exclusion which, when it was necessary was harsh, but had now become inhuman. He called upon them to redeem themselves from the imputation of adapting their own conduct to that uncharitable and unfeeling principle which they ascribe to the Catholic community, and to concede a gift which, if given with grace, would be received with gratitude, and tend to cement in one bond of union the people of the Catholic creed with the professors of the Protestant religion. [Loud cheers.]

The question being put, "That the bill be now read a second time," the House divided: Ayes 235. Noes 223. Majority 12. The bill was then read a second time.

ILCHESTER GAOL.] Mr. Alderman Wood moved, "That an humble address be presented to his majesty, praying that he will order to be forthwith laid before this House the Magistrates' Journal and Keeper's occurence book, from 1808 to the present time." The motion was opposed by Mr. Dickinson, on the ground of its being an interference with private property; and supported by Mr. Bennet, sir. F. Burdett, and Mr. Denman. Mr. Secretary Peel stated, that he had given orders for a prosecution against Bridle, the late keeper of the prison, and that he had also directed eminent surveyors to examine and report upon the present site and state of the prison. He therefore hoped the alderman would withdraw his motion, as well as the general one for inquiry which stood for Wednesday next. Mr. Dawson and Mr. Estcourt spoke to the same effect; and Mr. Tynte vindicated the conduct of some of the magistrates, against whom he thought so general a charge ought not to be made, as he was convinced that many were not implicated in the transactions complained of. The motion was withdrawn.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, May 13.

SALFORD HUNDRED COURT EXTENSION BILL.] On the order of the day for the third reading of this bill,

The Attorney General, upon general principles, objected to the bill. He thought it highly improper, that the lord who had the whole patronage of the court should be allowed to participate in the fees taken by the officers whom he appointed. If the fees were more than sufficient to meet the necessary expenses, their amount ought to be abated. He complained that a measure so important to the public should have been attempted in the shape of a private bill, and moved, "that the bill be read a third time this day six months."

Lord Althorp said, that petitions in favour of the bill, had been presented from Manchester, Bolton, Bury, and Rochdale; and, that, in fact, the whole population of that immense district expected advantage from it. With respect to the fees, the question was, not as to their disposal, but whether they were such fees as ought to be taken. Upon the principle that the bill tended to give the people of Lancashire that invaluable blessing, a cheap administration of justice, he should vote in its favour.

Mr. B. Wilbraham could not help setting his face very strongly against the measure. He objected to it upon public grounds, and upon the ground of its being obnoxious to some parts of the county. The bill, if passed, would be followed by others of the same description; and there was one clause to which he particularly objected, as trenching upon the jurisdiction of the Insolvent Debtors' Court, providing, that persons found guilty of having improvidently contracted debts might be imprisoned, for a limited period, by order of the court. It was a strong measure to give such powers to a tribunal which had served only originally for the recovery of debts under 40*s*. The county preferred the jurisdiction of the Sheriff's court. He trusted, therefore, that the bill would at all events be postponed to next year.

Mr. Brougham said, that the object of the bill was, to enable persons to obtain legal redress upon reasonable terms—to enable a creditor to recover 50*s*. without the expense of 100*l*. The principle of the bill was a good one, and could not be carried too far. He would ask, what opposition was there to the bill? The attorneys of the district, of course, were against it, because it would lessen the cause list at every assizes. The loss of the measure could be owing only to one of two causes—the general indisposition of the House to all projects of reform, or the influence of the solicitors who were interested in its miscarriage.

General Gascoyne was convinced that the principle of the bill was good, and that if it was adopted with regard to Manchester, its advantages would soon be extended to other parts of the country.

Mr. Scarlett said, that the chief objection to the measure was, that it placed the administration of public justice too much in the hands of private individuals.

Mr. Philips said, that the whole hundred of Salford was in favour of the bill, and that the people of Manchester were particularly friendly to it.

Mr. P. Moore said, that only one individual had petitioned against the bill, and that was the under sheriff, who was apprehensive he should not receive as much in the nature of fees as he used to do.

Mr. C. Wilson said, that the primary object of the bill was to aggrandize an individual, (lord Sefton), and throw a considerable sum of money yearly into that nobleman's hands. The question in fact was, whether the House would sanction the transfer of from 4,000*l*. to 8,000*l*. a year from the sheriff's court to this newly created court of record? The funds intended for the maintenance and dignity of the shrievalty of the county. would thus be transferred to erect a new court of record. If the advantages of the bill were such as had been represented, it ought not to be confined to one hundred, but to be extended over the whole country.

The House divided: For the third reading, 70. Against it, 96. Majority against the third reading of the Bill, 26. The third reading was accordingly put off for six months.

Agricultural Distress.] The Marquis of Londonderry having moved the order of the day, for bringing up the Report of the Committee of the whole House on Agricultural Distress,

Colonel Davies rose, to submit the resolutions of which he had given notice. In thus offering himself to the attention of the House, he felt it necessary to guard against being misunderstood. It was not his intention to oppose the resolutions of the noble marquis; on the contrary, he meant to support them as far as they went, as he conceived them better than the existing law; but he should propose a set of resolutions, which the House might pass conjointly with those of the noble lord, or they would reject the one or the other, or both, as to them might seem fit. When this question was first introduced, he had determined not to offer a word upon it; but when he found that six different sets of resolutions, not drawn up with a view to immediate relief, but of providing against remote contingencies, which he hoped they should never live to see, he felt himself bound to propose some measures calculated to give immediate relief. They had been told by great authorities in that House, that the present agricultural distress was not caused by taxation, but by the redundancy of supply; and the noble lord had contended, that from no practicable reduction of taxes could any effectual relief be derived. To say that, was in so many words to say, that the price of corn must remain permanently at 70*s*. per quarter. It was impossible, therefore, to grow corn at a much cheaper rate considering all the burthens which at present bore upon its production, than 70*s*., unless a reduction of taxes could be effected. The scheme which had been suggested by the noble lord was, in its nature, impracticable. It was pretty obvious that Ireland could raise her corn at a cheaper rate than England could. If, in what he had now to offer with respect to the different rate of taxation in regard to the two countries, any thing should appear to be dictated by a hostile feeling towards Ireland, he begged leave to disclaim all such intentions. But, while he wished to do justice to Ireland, he begged to claim, at the hands of the Irish members, justice for England. There were many taxes which entered into the course of production in England, which did not affect Ireland. It would be found that the gross produce of the Excise duties on salt, hides, soap, and candles, in Great Britain, amounted, in the year ending the 5th Jan. 1822, to 3,857,239*l*.; and the nett produce to 3,478,776*l*." Of this sum, about two-thirds were raised upon the agriculturists, and therefore it might be assumed that in England 2,500,000*l*. was the amount of taxes that entered into the cost of production. To this amount of taxes, bearing exclusively on the agricultural production of England, the House must add the additional burthen (as compared with Ireland) of the poor-rates; which, in March 1821, amounted to 7,500,000*l*., of which about 6,000,000*l*. were paid by the land-owners. But, if the diminished price of the necessaries of life, and the consequently decreased charge of supporting the poor, were considered, the burthen of poor-rates might be fairly computed at 5,000,000*l*. a year on the agriculture of this country. It was his present intention, however, to take into the calculation those taxes only which were paid to the Excise, and he thought he could suggest such a way of relieving the country from the burthen of those taxes as even the noble lord himself would not object to. The taxes of a similar nature which might be said to bear on the cost of agricultural production in Ireland were the leather-tax, producing 31,594*l*. and the Custom-house duties; being, for duties paid in Ireland, 93,000*l*., and in England, 160,000*l*. In the last year, about 600,000*l*. quarters of corn were imported from Ireland; and looking to these facts jointly, the House would easily apprehend what was the production of that country, and under what favourable circumstances it was realized. If it was possible that Ireland might hereafter become the granary of the empire, he thought it was at least proper, that the relative taxation of the two countries should be reduced to something like a proportion. For if the Irish land-owners, on account of the present bounty which their produce had in fact the benefit of, should be induced to break up their meadow land, and turn it into arable for the production of corn; and if that bounty, either on account of the depressed condition of our own agriculture or from any other cause, should hereafter cease, he left the House to judge whether such a state of things would not be a positive evil to Ireland. An hon. gentleman had observed on a preceding evening, that if any check were now given to the improving culture of that island, it would be productive of serious mischief to it. But the resolutions he had to propose could in no-wise operate as such a check, that the natural fertility of the island, and the present state of Irish growers, could be sensibly affected by it. His object in proposing, then, the repeal of Excise taxes, only as they regarded our agriculture, was, to repeal those which were of all others the most vexatious; while it was very possible, on the other hand, that the customs paid in this country operated as a protection against foreign importations. His resolutions would not attack the sinking fund. The noble lord, on a former evening, had told the House, that by the effect of his commutation plan, there would be left a disposable surplus of 2,800,000*l*.; but it was proposed to apply towards the reduction of taxation 1,800,000*l*. only; the remainder of it being reserved to be applied to any unforeseen contingent expenses. The noble lord had also said, that the revenue of the country had increased in the last year, by more than 1,500,000*l.*; and he had understood, that the improvement during the last month had been in the same ratio. Now he should suggest, that it would be better to take from the surplus mentioned by the noble lord another 1,000,000*l.*; and from the increase on the revenue, also, 1,000,000*l.*, which, added to the proportion of the surplus said by the noble lord to be applicable to the reduction of taxes, namely, 1,800,000*l.*, would give a sum of 3,800,000*l.* applicable to the remission of those taxes which he proposed to have repealed. The only objection which could be urged against this plan, was, that the revenue might not go on increasing. But this was not the time at which the calculation of possible events was to be put in opposition to actual results: neither did it follow that as the taxes were heavy, so was the revenue large. Any one who looked into the history of taxation, would find, that so far from an increase of revenue being the necessary consequence of increased taxation, the consequence was rather decreased revenue. In 1808, the tax on foreign brandy, was 12*s.* 7½*d.* per gallon; and it produced a revenue of nearly 2,000,000*l.* a year. the importation being about 2,600,000 gallons. In 1810, an additional duty of 2*s.* 6*d.* a gallon was imposed. The consequence was, a very great diminution of the imports, and a consequent decrease of duty; so that the revenue on these articles fell to 1,529,000*l.* In 1812, the duty was run up to 19*s.* 1½*d.* per gallon; the quantity imported declined to 200,000 gallons, and the revenue to less than 200,000*l.* The more expedient course would be, to lower the duty, by which the productiveness of the revenue would be increased. In Ireland, the effects of the present system had been even more fatal. Since 1807, the increased taxation there had amounted to 3,737,000*l.*, yet the revenue was at this moment 700,000*l.* lower than in 1807. It was his intention to alter one of his resolutions, so as to propose the repeal of the whole of the duty on salt, candles, and hides, and a part of the duty on soap, and to reduce, by half, the tax on windows, the duty on leather, and the customs duty on salt in Ireland. Hence, he contended, that a direct and immediate relief would be afforded to the country of 3,600,000*l.*, without infringing upon the sinking fund, or encroaching upon a single establishment. Some of these taxes carried a self-destroying principle with them: the tax on wine had been trebled, and the wealth of the country since the great augmentation had trebled also: it ought, therefore, to produce four and a half millions; yet it did, in fact, produce only a little more than 1,500,000*l.* The tax on leather brought only about 500,000*l.* into the Exchequer; but the people suffered by it to the extent of 1,500,000*l.*, for each tradesman through whose hands the commodity passed, indemnified himself for the duty at the expense of the consumer. After all, the reductions he suggested were trifles compared with the vast ocean of taxation; and more than three times the amount of them would be insufficient to place the country in the situation in which he wished to see it. His proposition was only 1,400,000*l.* beyond the promised reduction of ministers. The hon. colonel concluded by moving the following resolutions:

1. "That any tax which, by being unequally distributed, acts as a bounty to one part of the kingdom and to the prejudice of another, is in its nature unjust, and ought to be discontinued.—2. That the gross produce of the excise duties on salt, hides, soap, and candles, in Great Britain, amounted, in the year ending 5th Jan. 1822, to the sum of 3,857,239*l.*; and the nett produce to 3,478,776*l.*—3. That there are no excise duties levied in Ireland, on soap, salt, or candles; and that the gross amount of the duty on leather, in the year ending 5th Jan. 1822, was 31,594*l.*—4. That the whole of the excise duty on salt, and three-fourths of the duties on soap, candles, and hides, in Great Britain, be forthwith repealed.—5. That the taxes on windows and leather, in Ireland, be forthwith repealed."

The Speaker suggested that it was impossible that the question could be put in the shape proposed. The resolutions of the hon. colonel could not be made part of the report of the committee.

Sir J. Sebright said, he was in favour of every practicable reduction, but he felt bound to vote against the resolutions for this simple reason, that they had nothing to do with the question before the House. He returned the noble marquis his thanks for what he had done. As far as he could judge, the resolutions of the noble marquis were an improvement upon the existing corn laws.

Colonel Davies expressed his readiness to withdraw his resolutions for the present.

On the question, that the report of the committee be brought up,

Mr. Western said, he was firmly persuaded that the noble marquis's resolutions would, neither directly nor indirectly, contribute to the welfare of agriculture; but that they would even add to the load of distress which already burthened the farmer. The question mainly, if not altogether, depended upon the price of grain in the foreign market; and he contended that the noble marquis had made his calculations upon the evidence before the committee, which was given in British currency, and not according to the price of gold. If hon, gentlemen would refer to the testimony of Mr. Solly, they would find this to be the fact. Thus, the price of grain was made to appear higher abroad than it really was; and the noble marquis had, in consequence, felt warranted in proposing a duty proportionably lower. That important subject had by no means been sufficiently investigated, either by the committee of the present or of the last year; and the House was consequently legislating in the dark. At Hamburgh, wheat was now selling at from 26*s*. to 31*s*. per quarter; rye 13*s*. to 14*s*.: barley 8*s*. to 9*s*.; oats 5*s*. 9*d*. to 8*s*., it was not to be forgotten—also, that freights from Hamburgh to London were not dearer than from some parts of the coast of Essex. So great was the suffering at Hamburgh, that the Danish government had been obliged to take 700,000 quarters of wheat in payment for taxes, and that quantity would of course be converted into money at almost any sacrifice. The reduction of the import price from 80*s*. to 70*s*. had spread dismay in all quarters, both through Ireland and England. The resolutions of the noble marquis had doubled the despair of the agriculturists. They looked upon it, and justly, as a violation of a solemn pledge given by parliament—as a breach of public faith. The landed interest would have been much better satisfied to have remained under the former law, defective as it was, than under the proposed improvement. The hon. member sat down, after referring to the too hasty and peremptory contradiction he had received on a former night on the subject of prices from the hon. member for Portarlington.

Mr. John Smith said, it was his opinion that the distress of the agricultural body proceeded in a great measure from a superabundant harvest, and that the House could not apply a remedy. Various remedies had been proposed, but it appeared to him that the remedies, as they were called, would lead to nothing but ruin and degradation. He regretted that he had been prevented by illness from attending the discussion of a motion of an hon. gentleman (Mr. Wyvill). That motion went to embrace a great and general reduction of taxation; and the speech with which it was introduced suggested the propriety of taking off 20 millions of taxes, in order to relieve agriculture. Now, he did not think, if it were the intention to ruin agriculture, that there could be a better expedient proposed. The effect of taking off 20 millions or 15 millions of taxes would necessarily be a diminution of the expenses of the country. But how could the public expenses be diminished? No man would be so absurd as to say that the navy and the army could be prevented from receiving their pay. What then was to follow? He thought it would not be uncharitable to say, that the meaning of the hon. member was, to reduce the interest of the stockholder. What would be the effect of that measure? The first consequence would be, to reduce the dividend of the fundholder one half—an act of injustice in itself, and one which would excite great alarm, particularly amongst foreigners who had large sums in the English funds. If the dividends were to be reduced one-half, or at all, foreigners of course would hasten to sell out, and invest their money in their own country. But it was not foreigners alone that would do so. Englishmen would be ready to follow their example; indeed, at the present moment, there existed a strong disposition upon the part of Englishmen, to invest their property in foreign funds; and it was clear, that if the dividends were reduced by one-half, that disposition would greatly increase. The consequence would be, that exchange would fall in this country, as it did in France in 1792 and 1793. The consequence of that fall would be, a great and immediate demand for bullion, and if that demand continued to be made, the Bank would cease to pay in bullion in the course of one month. The greater part of the property of the Bank was in the hands of the government. But if the scheme was once adopted that the public creditor should be deprived of his dividend, the question would soon arise whether the Bank had a better right to be paid than any other of the public creditors? In that state of things, it would be certain that the notes of the Bank would not, and ought not, to pass. The private banks would next close their doors. Independent of their connexion with the Bank of England, the private bankers were themselves fundholders; their property depended upon the state of public credit; and if that were interfered with, the town and country banks would not stand long. A scarcity of money would necessarily follow. If there was any principle more than another which that House had contended for, it was this—that a scarcity of money produced low prices. If prices were to fall still more, the land would do little more than support its paupers and the cultivator. He lamented that he could not attend in his place at the discussion of the motion, and he regretted that he did not see the hon. gentleman who proposed it in his place. He respected that hon. gentleman—he respected him the more highly, because he was the son of a man whose name was dear to the liberties of his country. He was aware that the hon. and learned member for Winchelsea, and his right hon. friend (Mr. Tierney) voted for the motion. For both of them he had the highest respect. They acted from conviction, no doubt; but still he regretted their vote, because that vote was likely to be remembered when the qualifications which they attached to it were forgotten. He knew it would be said, that he belonged to what was called the monied interest, and that he did not feel for the agriculturist. With respect to the monied interest, he was not aware of any act of cruelty or insensibility ever committed by them. He would be glad to repeal taxes as much as with safety could be repealed. He would wish to oppose the salt tax, because he looked upon it as injurious and oppressive. Various other taxes ought to be repealed, and for the repeal of every tax he would cheerfully vote, save that general sweep of repeal which would lead, not to retrenchment, but to infamy and ruin. It would take twenty years to settle the country after such an alteration in its system as must be produced by a remission of taxes to the amount of 20,000,000*l*. They might look at France as an example in point. And therefore, his objection to the motion of the hon. member for York was, that such a remission would not give immediate relief, but would produce immediate ruin. He did not say, that the country would not right itself at last; but then other sentiments rushed upon his mind, other feelings struggled in his breast, on which, perhaps, he had better be silent, for he feared that he could not do them justice. Was there no such thing as national honor? Was there no such thing as national faith? Was there no such thing as moral strength? [Hear.] Could they who had the good fortune to inhabit this happy island, contemplate with patience the abandonment of all moral principle? It had often occurred to him, when he reflected on his own country, that it had done more for mankind than all the rest of Europe. It had advanced the cause of science—it had advanced the cause of humanity; it had uniformly supported the cause of civil liberty; and, above all, that which was its highest honour and proudest recommendation, it had upheld the cause of religious toleration, which now extended its goodly branches over all Europe. It might be said, that though toleration reigned here, yet bigotry remained in various quarters. It might be so; but the principle of toleration was at work, and the day was not far distant, when its holy influence would be felt all over the world. Who would degrade such a country as this? For his own part, he contemplated national dishonour, national perfidy, and national robbery, with horror—with more than horror, if he had a word to express such a feeling; and he hoped that death would close his eyes for ever, before he witnessed the degradation of his country—he hoped he should be spared the misery of contemplating the infamy of his native land [Hear, hear.] The sentiments which were contained in various petitions, and which had been delivered in that House, implied a belief that an immense reduction of taxes would serve the agricultural interest. His view was, to show that this was a mistaken idea; and that, on the contrary, such a remission would ruin the agricultural interest, and reduce all society to one common mass of shapeless ruin. If it was true, that the non-payment of the dividends would have the disastrous effects which he had pointed out, he would ask the House and the country to mark the deep and commanding obligation by which they were bound to avert such evils. He could entertain no doubt, however, that a considerable sum of money might yet be saved to the country without any material inconvenience to the government. Much might be saved in the colonies—in the expenses of the Cape of Good Hope, for instance; in the naval and military establishments; and in different other departments. If he were told that such reductions would weaken the influence of the Crown, he must deny the assertion. It was idle, in the present state of intellect in this country, to advance such an argument. Neither the Crown nor the government need fear any want of influence, if wise measures were adopted; and he would say, what he had before observed, and what he now repeated on mature reflection, that if the gentlemen opposite were true to their own interest, they would create more influence by adopting principles of rigid economy, than they could by any other means. He should trespass no farther on their time, but to observe, that the moment they violated public credit, that moment misery and discord would overwhelm the country, and the sun of England would be set for ever [Hear, hear.]

Mr. D. Browne expressed his conviction that the resolutions would neither benefit the agricultural interest, nor satisfy the country.

Sir W. W. Wynn deprecated any breach of faith with the public creditor. He approved of the resolutions, because they formed a medium between those which proposed a very low, and those which called for a very high protection. He could, however, have wished, that the protecting duty had been higher.

Lord Althorp said, he would not answer the argument which his hon. friend (Mr. J. Smith) had adduced to shew that a national bankruptcy would be mischievous, but he thought it highly unfair that it should be insinuated, that all persons who voted for a reduction of taxes contemplated a national bankruptcy. He had not voted for the resolution of the hon. member for York, not because he disapproved of it (on the contrary he should support it whenever it might be again brought forward), but because it tended to interrupt an adjourned debate.

Mr. Chaloner said, his hon. friend and colleague did not state 20,000,000*l.* to be the measure of taxation which he proposed to be reduced, but that it was the amount short of which he conceived no very material relief could be afforded to the country.

Mr. Philips said, he had not heard the whole of the speech of the hon. member for York, when he made his motion. He did, however, hear something said about 20,000,000*l.* as an abatement of taxation, which was cheered, and immediately after the motion for a reduction of taxes was proposed. He could not, in consequence, abstain from stating his disapproval of such an abatement of taxation, which must either have the effect of cheating the public creditor or of depreciating the currency; but, when he found that the motion only pledged the House to a reduction of taxation, without stating any specific amount, he voted for it. The hon. member for Essex had again made a reference to the calculations of Mr. Solly, which had already been perfectly explained by the hon. member for Portarlington. The hon. member for Essex objected to the period when those calculations were made; but he should have recollected, that those calculations came down to 1820-1, when the metallic currency had been restored; and what calculation could he wish to have except one founded on that currency? To take the present price of grain on the continent was a deviation from the ordinary course of things. On referring to the evidence contained in the report of last year, it would be found, that the average price of wheat at Dantzic, for 30 years ending 1819, was 53*s.* The hon. member for Corfe-castle was of opinion, that averages should be taken on shorter periods. He (Mr. P.) had done so; and he found that the average price of Dantzic wheat on board for 5 years from 1796 to 1800, was 53*s.* 8*d.*, and for 5 years from 1816 to 1820, the average price of Dantzic wheat on board was 67*s.* 7*d.* So that even the averages of these short periods showed, that unless they had monstrous high duties on importation, foreign wheat must find its way to this country. He was unfriendly to any system which created a fluctuation of price, and he believed there were no persons to whom steady prices were of so much importance as the landed interest. When the agriculturist possessed high prices and high rents, his habits and arrangements were formed on that high scale; and when low prices and low rents occurred, then came distress, and misery, and applications to that House. He thought it unwise to adopt a system of high import duties. He believed it to be absolutely impossible to keep up high prices; but he was sure that much mischief would be done by legislating on the subject. Great complaints had been made by the landed interest in that House, that they had not attended sufficiently to their own advantage. They complained of the corn law which occasioned great fluctuations. It certainly was the worst measure which could possibly be adopted; but it was their own measure, and they had no right to come forward and say that they had neglected their own interest while they took care of those of the manufacturer and the merchant. Those who imagined that the present distress arose from the resumption of cash payments, suffered under a great delusion. When France resumed cash payments had that measure the effect which was attributed to the resumption of cash payments in England? In France the metallic currency had been driven out by the assignats, and the resumption of a metallic currency had had a greater effect than in this country, because the quantity of currency was there less than in England, from the limited nature of her commerce. Yet in France the resumption had produced no effect on prices. It had been alleged, that importations of corn from Ireland had increased the distress of this country: but Ireland had in return received our manufactures, and thus both countries had been benefited. If corn were not allowed to be imported from Ireland, and prices should be raised to double their amount in other countries, could they be maintained in that state? Manufactured goods would rise, and commerce would be obstructed; for our manufacturers could not compete with the manufacturers of other countries. The poor-rates would increase; wages would get lower; and what would then become of agriculture? The situation of the country at present was far superior to what it would be if agricultural produce were raised high while they were low in other countries.—He wished to take that opportunity of correcting some mistakes which prevailed respecting the state of the manufacturing interests. The fact was, that the manufacturing interests were only recovering from a depression, similar to that under which agriculture now suffered. The manufacturers had been every day seeing their capital diminished. They had now a prospect of recovering; but it was not to be denied that their profits were extremely low. By low wages only—which again could only be borne out by extremely low prices—could the manufacturers go on. He wished also to advert to another mistake. It had been attempted to calculate the prosperity of manufacturers by their annual exports. This was not at all a test by which to judge of their situation. The manufacturer himself often did not know the result of his own trade during the year. His exports were made, not in consequence of foreign orders, but according to his own judgment and at his own risk. He sent agents abroad; if he had the good fortune to send goods to a market where the supply was deficient, his agent often wrote in return—"I have made an advantageous sale, but I do not know what the proceeds may be; if I take bills, the course of exchange will destroy all the profits; and if I take the manufactures of this country, they are so high that you will lose by them." Thus, perhaps, the manufacturer lost money, after his hopes had been raised of making considerable gain. If, then, the manufacturer, whose whole study was to adapt the supply to the demand, and who was not dependent upon the seasons, often lost, notwithstanding all his experience and sagacity, was there not a much greater probability that grain could not be adapted to the demand so accurately as to protect the agriculturist from loss at all times? They might shut out importations of grain, but they would only on that account be more exposed to the evils of fluctuation. He wished to get rid of the system of averages, and therefore the only set of resolutions he could approve of, were those of his hon. friend, the member for Portarlington. Far from agreeing with his hon. and learned friend (Mr. Brougham), and the noble member for Northampton, that the effect of indirect taxation was greater on agriculture than on manufacture, he thought that if they traced the progress of a manufacture from the raw material, they would find it more burthened with taxes than an agricultural product. He concluded by hoping that his hon. friend (Mr. Ricardo) would bring forward his resolutions year after year; convinced that time would prove the correctness of his positions. The more his hon. friend was known, the more he would be respected; and the more universally recognized, by all who had sense or candour, as one of the most original and wisest writers, and one of the soundest thinkers on the subject of political economy.

Mr. Sykes contended, that the proposition for the reduction of taxation was so obviously a remedy, and the only remedy for the great distress which was now felt, that he was surprised that there could be any difference of opinion upon the subject. No proposition could be more clear to his mind. His hon. friend (Mr. J. Smith) had been conjuring up a chimera, and then destroying his own creation. No one in that House had said, that national credit was not to be maintained. The reduction of taxation was the best ground on which national faith could be fixed. He had not voted on any one of the resolutions brought forward, because he had not been able to bring his mind to agree with any one of them. It was, in his opinion, the change in the currency which had caused the distress. He agreed in the main with the hon. member for Callington, (Mr. Attwood.) If they succeeded in raising corn to a high price it would be by oppressing other classes; and they would throw a burthen on the manufacturing interests which they could not bear.

Mr. Ricardo, in explanation of the allusion which had been made to his statement of the average prices of foreign corn, by the hon. member for Essex, begged the House would bear in mind, that there were two authorities on that subject that were quoted from, who differed much in their items. The calculations of Mr. Solly were made in conformance with the variations of our paper currency, and were, therefore, always higher than those of Mr. Grade, who made his calculations upon a fixed exchange. He had built his argument on the latter, and it would be found that whilst he was quoting from one paper, the hon. gentlemen was quoting from another, and thus the misunderstanding arose. He therefore hoped he should be acquitted of any intention to mislead.

Mr. Attwood said, he rose in consequence of what had fallen from the hon. member for Wootton Basset on the subject of the prices of foreign grain, and from other hon. members on the same subject, in the course of the debate. The present measure rested for its details, altogether on the information they possessed respecting those prices. They took the price of grain in foreign markets, according to what they believed it to be. They added the cost of transmission here, and to this they added their duty; in order to form the amount of protection, they were willing, and proposed to, give to British agriculture. All this rested, therefore, on the accuracy of the information they possessed, respecting prices in foreign markets: and on that head, there was no information whatever before the House, on which it could safely act; none that was not defective or fallacious; and they were proceeding to regulate the most important interests of the empire, the interests of that vast body of petitioners before them, upon information which no man would be satisfied to act upon in the conduct of his own affairs. The noble marquis who had proposed the protecting prices now under consideration, had stated, that with respect to the prices of grain in the Baltic ports, they were not to take the prices of the present time, which were low; but that they were to ground their calculations, on what had been the average prices of the last 20 or 25 years. Undoubtedly they must take an average price, and not the price of any particular time or year; but then, so far from its being the average of the last 20 or 25 years which they ought to found their calculations upon, it was an average out of which that 20 or 25 years ought to be entirely struck. That was a period when the high prices of this country, by whatever cause occasioned; whether by the alterations in their currency as he contended; or by bad land, and bad corn laws, as the hon. member for Portarlington would contend—from whatever cause those prices had arisen, they had, during their existence, during the last 20 or 25 years, materially deranged the prices of all those foreign markets, with which this country was connected, and from whence it had drawn supplies. The price of the Baltic ports was, in fact, no other than the price of Mark-lane, whenever importation was free. The price of Mark-lane was known to the Baltic merchant; and he knew also, the cost of transmission, and that his grain was worth the Mark-lane price, deducting that cost. But were they to consider, that because a high price had existed in the Baltic, occasioned by a high price here; that the Baltic prices were to continue high when their own had fallen? That because they had paid high prices for the Baltic grain for the last 20 or 25 years; that therefore at a low price this grain would not be delivered here?. It would be just as reasonable to take the average price at which for the last 20 or 25 years the corn of Yorkshire had been sold in the London market; and conclude that if for the next 20 or 25 years the London prices should fall below that average, no corn would arrive from Yorkshire in that market. He submitted that one conclusion would be just as reasonable as the other. In the tables which had been laid before the House, for its information respecting foreign prices; even the difference in the exchanges had been lost sight of, as giving a different estimate for corn when marked in money of a low, from that which would be given, when marked in money of a high value. No allowance had been made for the essential difference, which a corrected estimate of the exchange would have made in those tables. That important distinction had been entirely overlooked; and he confessed that when that error had been recently explained to the House, by his hon. friend the member for Essex, he had witnessed with some surprise, the confident contradiction which the hon. member for Portarlington had given to his hon. friend's statement; because he then believed he recollected, what he had since found on reference to be the case, that the hon. member himself had, in a very detailed statement of foreign prices which he had delivered to the committee of 1821, fallen into that very error which when the member for Essex pointed it out, he did not believe could have existed. And the consequence of that erroneous method of computation was, a difference no less than this, that when the House referred to the hon. member's table; for a price marked of 21*s.* 6*d.* they ought to read 14*s.* and for a price of 26*s.*,—16*s.*; and a difference of a similar kind ran through the whole table. The present prices in the Baltic, he believed, were 33*s.* at Dantzic, and 25*s.* at St. Petersburgh; the freight to London was, perhaps, double, or little more than double, of that from Yorkshire; and at prices somewhat similar to those, he had little doubt, but, in common years, all the surplus corn the Baltic could produce, would be sent to this country if they would receive it, and the English markets should admit of no higher price being given.

There was one great corn country also, France, that had been nearly as much overlooked on this subject, as though it had no existence—although it was most probable, if not altogether certain, that whenever importation should again take place; from France their main supplies of grain would arrive. Many districts of that country, produced in all ordinary years, a great disposeable surplus. Corn was grown very cheaply there, with few taxes; that country was close to their own shores; the carriage of corn from thence to Mark-lane, would be little more than the carriage from Essex; and the only information the House had before it, as to the price of grain in France, was to be collected from the evidence of Mr. Jacob, who had incidentally mentioned, that in one particular market the price of which he had noted: he found wheat at about 3*s.* a bushel. Did not this circumstance indicate a necessity for further and for accurate information respecting prices in France; when they were determining what duty would, or would not be, a protection here against corn of a foreign growth? The prices of France, it was important also for them to look to, in another view. The steadiness which he believed it would be found, that those prices had maintained, was calculated very strongly to elucidate the causes of those extraordinary fluctuations which had taken place at the same time in this country, and had been attended with consequences so important. There was no objection to taking the average of the last 20 or 25 years, for the prices of France: those prices had not been affected during that time, either by any derangement in their own currency, or of the markets of this country. They had preserved, therefore, a steady uniformity, the present prices were those of a century and a half back. They were those, also, of the late war: Mr. Malthus had found that the price there, in 1814, was 36*s.* 8*d.* a quarter; and, that that was then considered as a high price. In some districts, riots had then taken place on that account, and corn did not appear, on an average, to have been higher during the ten preceding years: the period when corn attained its highest prices here. The present prices of France, were not materially lower than those thus cited in 1814. The price given by Mr. Jacob, it would be found, was not to be taken as the average of the kingdom, it was the price of a particular town; and corn, from a variety of causes, varied in price in different districts in France, much more than in this country. The state of the corn laws in France confirmed this information respecting its price. In November last, the free importation of grain into France, was restrained for the first time since the war. It was, as the king of France told the Chambers, in consequence of the effects of an abundant harvest. That is, the manner in which he described the agricultural distress, which they were told existed in France. The average price for the whole of France at that time, as appeared by accounts published by the French government, was equal to 34s. 2d. a quarter, of English money. By a law which had been passed in 1814, the exportation of wheat was prohibited when the price rose to about 48s. These two prices might, therefore, perhaps, be taken, as the extremes of prices in France, for the average of the kingdom: with a price of 48s., it was to be concluded, that the landowners were desirous of no farther rise; at 34s. the consumers were satisfied; they desired no lower price. The law made in 1814, prohibiting exportation when the price exceeded 48s., corresponded with a similar law made fifty years before, in 1764; which fixed the same price of 48s., as the price when exportation should cease; and this exhibited strong evidence, that the average prices of those two periods had not been materially different from one another; and the tables exhibited the same results. From an examination of those prices, then, it was manifest, that those statements which had been made in parliament, of a condition of agricultural distress, existing in France, similar to that experienced here, were without foundation in fact. Such information ought not to have been given to parliament; nor such statements hazarded, on so important a subject, at random, and without due inquiry. They misled the country as to its own condition, and its causes. Slight, partial, and temporary fluctuations in prices, were all that had been experienced in France—varying from year to year with the state of crops. There had been no such fall of prices there, as had taken place here, and could not have been, for there had been no such previous rise.

When the agricultural committee now sitting, was appointed, it was stated by the noble marquis who moved it, that one object of the labours of the committee, would be, to 'investigate this important subject of foreign prices; to obtain accurate information upon it; and upon the condition of foreign agriculture. It was to be regretted, that that suggestion had not been acted upon: the committee could not have been more importantly employed;' nor could the House have been put in possession of information more necessary; whether for the purpose of guiding them in regulating their own corn laws, or of assisting their inquiries into the cause and origin of the condition of agriculture in this country. The committee of 1821 had performed this duty most inefficiently. They had examined, on this head, a few merchants respecting the prices of a few sea-port towns; connected with their own markets, influenced by those markets, deranged by them; and on that evidence had not hesitated to report to the House, that as great a fall in agricultural produce had taken place throughout the continent generally, as in this country. Statements of that kind on insufficient evidence, conveying erroneous information, were most mischievous. They misled the government, the House, and the country, upon the most important subject on which they could be occupied; the causes which had occasioned their own difficulties. For if those difficulties were common to this country with the world at large; then it was to be believed that they had their origin in some general cause, over which this country had no particular control;—but if, on the contrary, the distress experienced here was peculiar to this country; if it was not generally felt, its cause was then to be looked for in their own internal measures. Nothing could have been obtained more readily, than correct information on this important subject: their foreign ministers and consuls could have transmitted to the committee, with great facility, tables, shewing the prices, and fluctuations which had taken place in grain of late years, in the different countries where they resided; and the present condition of agriculture there. Such information was extremely necessary, the want of it involved them in much error and inconsistency. The noble marquis himself, in discussing the question of the distress of their own agriculture, at the commencement of the present session, had stated, that great as that distress was, it was exceeded, by the difficulties experienced, at the same time, by the cultivators of the soil in all other countries; and he had confirmed that information by a letter which he read to the House from one of their foreign ministers, who described, that in that particular country, where he was stationed, or in a district of it; in Silesia, so great was the destructive superabundance of agricultural produce, that the crops of corn were left to perish in the fields. But it then appeared that this document did insufficiently support the most important statement the noble marquis had been led to make upon it; for he had not stated that government had received similar information from other ministers in other countries, or from their foreign ministers generally; and the probable conclusion, therefore, was, that no such statement had been received; no such distress elsewhere observed; and that the letter from Silesia, described merely a local distress, occasioned by some peculiar circumstance, and that consequently no general opinion could be justly formed from it. And indeed on a subsequent occasion, when the noble marquis had occasion to read the letter of another minister or consul, in which agricultural prices were incidentally mentioned, it then appeared that in one part of the world at least, there was no superabundance of corn, or agricultural distress; for it was on the ground of the high price of agricultural produce in that country—the high price of the quartern loaf, for which the consul said, he had to pay no less than two shillings and eleven pence—that he demanded, and apparently with very good reason, an increase to his fees or salary. Now he must confess, it had appeared to him, that this high price of agricultural produce thus evinced; for it was nearly double what had been the highest price in this country; that this high price had appeared to him quite as extraordinary and important as the harvests perishing on the ground in Silesia; and he had been induced to make some inquiry into its circumstances; and as he could not but esteem that in the present condition of the country, every thing tending to explain the causes of the high or low prices of agricultural produce, in whatever country, was of importance; he would repeat the information given him to the House. It was in the Brazils that this high price of corn was noticed. The Portuguese court had established in 1808, its royal residence, as he need not repeat, in the Brazils. They found existing there, an establishment which issued paper-money, called the Brazil Bank, which became decorated with a new title, and became the Royal Bank of the Brazils. With this establishment the Court found it convenient to become very largely in debt; and that that operation would be greatly facilitated if the court should impose an injunction on the bankers, to refuse payment of their notes to those who held them if presented for payment; and these notes thus issued, and being incapable of returning to the issuers, of course circulated about, wherever they could find customers, and wherever property was to be purchased. This state of things had not been long established, before a great rise in the monied price of all property followed; the quartern loaf advanced, as their consul had observed—the exchange fell—the mill-rea, which had before exchanged for 96 British pence, would exchange only for 45.—Gold advanced; it rose greatly above the mint price. All agricultural produce greatly rose;—there was, in short, in all things one general advance. Now, he submitted this state of things to the consideration of the political economists; of those whose attention had been directed to the causes of the rise first, and then of the fall in agricultural produce here;—if he permitted him, to the hon. member for Portarlington;—and if that hon. member should ask if there existed any corn laws in that country?—if there was any bad land—or changing that ground, on the suggestion of the hon. member for Bridgenorth—if there was any good land?—That, he confessed he could not answer—his information did not extend to it.—But he would confidently submit a farther problem—that if that government should become so wise and politic as to see no other evil in all this but that of a high price of gold, and a low course of exchange—if they should become seized with the ambition of preserving public faith by one general confiscation and robbery—of atoning for fraud committed on one body of men by committing still greater fraud on another—if amidst the dangers, with which they were surrounded, they should fix their attention on nothing but the restoration of an old metal standard—and in pursuit of that wretched object should proceed to repay their debt to the Bank, to return the notes borrowed, to take away the injunction upon it—if they took that step without a full inquiry and a knowledge of its importance—if it were not accompanied with measures of important precaution and arrangement—with provisions for adjusting public and private engagements to the alteration they were engaged in—or if, failing to adopt measures of such complicated precaution and extensive foresight; they did not alter the value of the metal money in which the Bank paper was to be paid; if they did not make the mill-reas and little joes which were the coin of that country somewhat less than they are—then would there be seen in that country an excessive supply of all commodities in all markets—an overproduction of all the productions of the earth—no adequate market, no adequate demand—the farmers there, if they had leases would be, to a man, ruined — the landlords if there were taxes and debts would be in a situation little better, and one general scene of derangement, confusion and ruin, would ensue [Hear, hear!]. These would be the certain consequences. There were others that might be more doubtful. He should not be surprised under such circumstances, to see the people, in ignorance as to the cause of such calamities, mistake the accidental error of their new government, for its essential character—if that weak government were, under such circumstances, shaken from the shoulders of that rising people, as an intolerable burthen—unless, indeed, there existed there a body of country gentlemen so patient as to permit their burthens and engagements to be thus increased—their tenantry to be ruined that it was their duty to protect—their own fortunes to be sacrificed; their station in society subverted, and the prospects of their families destroyed, by a miserable operation such as this [Hear, hear!]. But a body like that indeed—as it supported, under all circumstances, in one country the measures of an administration, might save a government in another. But, however this might be, he (Mr. Attwood) hoped that this consul of theirs who had so readily discovered a ground for the increase of his fees and emoluments, would be equally prompt—whenever this alteration again took place—to propose himself—a reduction of those emoluments to the old scale; and that he would not dream of making a miserable juggle like this the ground of a permanent encroachment on the resources of this generous and credulous, but distressed and abused country [Hear, hear!].

But, to return to the present corn law before them. There was one part of that bill—that which went to permit that foreign wheat at present bonded, should be admitted to home consumption when the average price rose to 70*s.*—on the payment of a duty—instead of being, as at present, admitted at 80*s.* with no duty,—for which he had heard no one reason given, and was altogether at a loss to know on what grounds it could be justified. It could not, by any perversion, be said to be other than an injury to the British farmer; that alteration at least was to him a measure of unbalanced evil. It was not to the advantage of the proprietor of the corn; it exposed him to a duty, and took away the only prospect of even speculative advantage which his situation gave him. What, then, was the object of this? It was an injury to the farmer. It was no benefit to the importer. But it might give a little duty to the Exchequer. The agricultural community appeared before them in expectation of relief under unexampled distress. The House could afford them none—but it could not be content to dismiss even those petitioners without an attempt, though they could not relieve them, to levy a miserable duty on their misfortunes, and to scramble a little money into the Exchequer—by whatever means—whatever interest was to suffer from it—that Exchequer which they were told was so full and abundant in the midst of the poverty that surrounded it—which the right hon. secretary opposite had told them, with his characteristic candour, so greatly flourished in spite of his bill; or in consequence of it, for he did not collect which—a prosperous Exchequer, and a ruined country—an Exchequer flourishing amidst the ruin of those from whose resources it was drawn—that was a state of things which the right hon. secretary might look on with satisfaction, though he did not. He could look with satisfaction on no revenue which was not commensurate with the resources of the people, nor could he see any thing which in his mind was more ominous than a taxation increasing with the public distress [Hear, hear!].

It was necessary also for the House to take into its view, before they adopted these new rates for the importation of corn, all those considerations that arose out of the uncertain condition in which their currency at present stood. If the old standard now attempted to be established should be again abandoned; as no man could venture to affirm with confidence its permanence; then in the rise of prices that would follow its abandonment, the rates now proposed would be altogether inapplicable, and would afford no protection against foreign corn. On the other hand if that disastrous attempt should be persisted in; if it should prove capable of being finally carried into effect, and the old standard be again established as the measure of value and price—then was this country on the eve, or in the midst of a great internal change; operating on all its important interests, agricultural, commercial, and above all, perhaps, political. In circumstances like those he deprecated all measures of needless, officious, half-informed and partial legislation. The present standard would not be finally established; the changes now in process would hardly be complete, without the entire destruction of that vast and important body by whose capital their soil was cultivated; of a great portion of those to whom as property it belongs. Under circumstances like these, he again repeated, that he deprecated all needless, officious, partial legislation. As far as the importation of foreign corn could affect them, the agricultural community was at present secure from that danger; they were safe from that danger beneath the shelter of the present corn laws. There he conjured the House, that it would permit them to remain. If they could not relieve their distress, let them avoid aggravating their calamities; nor forfeit, if it were possible, their confidence; nor above all provoke their resentment; nor urge the violence of a storm, which they would find it much easier to excite, than to control or allay. They had been told that this change in the value of their currency was now completed, that the measure was at an end; its operation finished. Would you derange again, it was asked, a system now established, a change now complete? Complete was it said? It was at that moment in the midst of its operation. There was not a day, nor an hour, in which that most iniquitous measure was not now working wrong, and injustice, and fraud, and disguised robbery in every part of the empire to its furthest extent, and in its remotest districts. [Hear, hear!]. Could the House forget the statements which were nightly made to it, the petitions presented? Let them consider the statement made to them two nights since by the hon. member for Sussex, of the condition of that district in which were two whole parishes, in process of utter, and necessary, and inevitable abandonment of labourer, and occupier, and landlord; necessarily and entirely to be abandoned in consequence of a contract for tithes—of a contract made as the hon. member expressed it, in the reign of the paper money—a contract made in money of one species, to be executed in money of another. Each acre as it became abandoned increasing the burthen on the others, and the whole at this moment in course of rapid desertion. Those parishes were but a picture of the country at large. The manner—the degree—was different—the operation was similar. Let them consider what representation the hon. member for Essex had made to them, with an earnestness befitting its importance, of two-thirds of the whole tenantry of that great county in a condition of insolvency—that is, in a condition of beggary—not possessed of a shilling; all their capital confiscated; the produce of lives of labour, the provision for children, for age, every thing that renders property valuable. confiscated; not capable of discharging their debts, if present prices continued. What condition of a country was this? In which the peaceful cultivators of the soil, were thus given over to one common destruction; in a mass, and to a man—and by measures of that government, which exists for their protection, and advantage, and security. And were they to be told that those measures were not to be disturbed, that they were sacred, that they were complete? They were but in part began. He would tell them of one great operation, necessarily connected with those measures, necessarily arising out of them, demanded in necessity and justice: by those measures which had not even commenced. That was, the reduction of salaries; that was, the reduction of pensions; that was, the reduction of every description of pay, and pension, and salary of all the servants of the Crown, in all the departments of the state [Hear, hear!]. What? those that had urged forward these measures—the authors—were they to profit by them? Were they to make them a means of profit and advantage to themselves? That would be to clothe these measures with all that odious and reproachful character, with which alterations in the monied standard have been on other occasions stigmatized. These measures were adopted, they were told, to support public faith, and the national character. Was it in this way that public faith was to be supported and the national character upheld? Was not a rise effected in the value of money to whatever extent, an advance exactly equal to it on all the salaries and pensions held under the Crown? Indirect, indeed, concealed, but not the less effectual in its profit to the holders, or in its burthens to the country. It was an advance obscurely effected, its nature and operation was only slowly seen or understood by those even, perhaps, who profited by it; but it must of necessity become at length evident; it must be at length acknowledged: and whenever that acknowledgment was made on the bench opposite; whenever that advance was admitted—to whatever extent admitted—it must be of necessity, at the same moment, proposed by his majesty's government themselves; to reduce at once pensions and salaries to the extent they would be thus acknowledged to have been raised. If they should fail to accompany that acknowledgment, whenever made, with that proposition for reductions — then whilst they had been calling on the House, and the country to submit to sacrifices in support of public faith and the national character, they would themselves have affixed disgrace on both—they will have imprinted on the character of the country—by measures adopted on the plea of upholding it —as vile a reproach as any that the pages of its history present. On these grounds, therefore, he should give his vote against the further progress of the bill before them. — The hon. gentleman sat down amidst loud cries of Hear, hear!

The Marquis of Londonderry said, he would not follow the hon. member through a great part of the arguments which he had used, many of which did not apply immediately to the question. But he must protest against the endeavour of the hon. gentleman to suspend the operations of the legislature, and to adjourn the business of the country, until he could bring about a change in the standard of the currency. Whether the hon. member fixed upon corn, gold, or any other settled unit as the sign of value, it was difficult to form an idea of his standard by which all contracts were to be adjusted. The declamation which he had mixed up with his political economy, respecting the increase of salaries by the change in the currency, was unwarranted by the state of the fact. When he called upon ministers to reduce their incomes on account of the restoration of cash payments, he only imitated the hon. gentlemen who cheered him on the side of the House on which he sat, who excited passion when they could not produce conviction. They knew that the emoluments of offices and pensions had been reduced by the depreciation; and that, so far from being increased by the late act, they had only been restored to their former amount. They knew that the Irish pension list had been reduced one-half, and the Scotch very considerably. He would again protest against the suspension of all public business, and the delay in bringing up this report, until the hon. gentleman had settled the standard of currency, and reduced to his own scale the salaries of public officers. The noble marquis, after some further preliminary observations, entered on the question of the corn laws, and discussed the objections made to the resolutions by the hon. member for Essex, whose knowledge, intelligence, and sound judgment, as applied to the interests of the agricultural body, he highly praised. He denied that in passing the resolutions fixing an import duty they were legislating in the dark. The committee had had before it the prices of corn in most parts of the continent transmitted by our consuls. These prices varied from place to place and time to time; but they afforded the means of deciding what amount of duties would yield protection to the British grower. The mistake of those who opposed the resolutions before the House, on the ground of their including an insufficient amount of duty, was, that they took the continental prices at the present state of the market, when there was no demand, and when, of course, prices were ruinously low. Adding, then, the duty and the freight to these prices, they found that importation could take place at so low a rate as to enable foreign corn to obtain an advantage over that of our own growth in the British market. But this was not the way of viewing the matter. The continental prices of former times were to be considered, and then 17*s.* of duty, and 10*s.* for freight, insurance, and profit, added to the original cost of the article, would raise the price of foreign grain sufficiently to afford protection to the British farmer. It was a mistake to suppose that the House was now called upon to legislate finally on this subject. Parliament could never preclude itself from revising its own arrangements on a question of this kind. The proposed duty might be found too high in more settled times. It was, however, a great improvement on the existing law, as it would prevent the great inconveniences to be apprehended from the opening of the ports at 80s. At the same time, the change was breaking no faith with the farmer, as the legislature had never promised him 80s. for his wheat. When the import price of 80s. was fixed, it was said by the friends of the measure, that corn would seldom reach that amount, but that the abundance, which would be the consequence of a secure home market, would reduce prices much below it, while its enemies contended, that its object was, to increase the price. It would be recollected, that the ports were not to open till the price reached 80s., and the 70s. then fixed upon was equivalent from the change in the currency to the former 80s. The hon. member for Essex had given notice of a motion for making an important alteration in the currency. What the hon. member's standard was, or what he meant to substitute for the existing currency, he did not pretend to conjecture; but he could not omit that opportunity of adverting to the manner in which the hon. member for Midhurst (Mr. J. Smith) had expressed himself with regard to the public credit. Such a speech from such an authority could not fail to produce a deep impression in that House; and he was satisfied, that nothing but a painful sense of public duty could have induced that hon. member to read such a moral as well as political lecture to his friends around him, for supporting a motion fraught with such alarm as that for abolishing 20,000,000*l.* of taxes, and thereby breaking faith with the public creditor, and endangering the institutions of the country. He would ever contend, that the mode in which that motion had been brought forward and supported, had struck a severe blow at public credit; but, severe as it had been, the effects of it had been counteracted to a considerable degree, by the valuable speech of the hon. member for Midhurst that evening.

Mr. Hume said, that the words of his hon. friend's motion were, that relief was only to be expected from "a large remission of taxation." Now, in that resolution he fully concurred, as did every man in the country, except perhaps the noble marquis. In 1817, the taxation of the country amounted to 60,000,000*l.*; in 1818, to 61,000,000*l.*; in 1819, to 60,500,000*l.*; in 1820, it amounted to 61,634,000*l.*; and in 1821 it reached 62,463,000*l.* Now, how was it possible for agricultural produce to obtain a remunerative price in the market, if the farmer was to be called on every year to pay such an increased proportion of taxes? With these facts before them, would the landed interest allow themselves to be robbed any longer? The resolutions of his hon. friend the member for Portarlington, were those to which he thought the House must hereafter come; but those of the noble marquis he was of opinion would improve on the present law, and so far they had his support.

Mr. Secretary Peel was surprised, that the hon. member for Callington (Mr. Attwood) should have entered on the present evening into a discussion on the state of the currency, when he knew that the hon. member for Essex had given notice of a motion which would bring that subject fairly before the consideration of the House. As the hon. member had made several pointed allusions to him (Mr. Peel), he could not allow the present opportunity to pass without making some observations upon them. And here he must be permitted to express his surprise at the applause with which a part of the hon. member's speech had been received by gentlemen on the other side. When he heard the bill which he had had the honour of introducing in 1819, called an iniquitous measure, and found that appellation of it cheered by many gentlemen who had at that time supported it—when he recollected that the concluding resolution of Mr. Horner in 1811 contained the principle on which that individual stated that the currency ought to be conducted, and that that principle was, that within two years the Bank should return to cash payments—when he remembered that strong fact, and contrasted it with the cheers which had burst from hon. members when the act of 1819 was stigmatized as an iniquitous bill, he could not sufficiently express the surprise which he felt, or prevail upon himself to submit to such an epithet in silence. He would here take the liberty of asking, whether the principle on which that bill was founded did not receive the support of the other side in 1816? The House must recollect well that it did receive the approbation of hon. gentlemen opposite; and that circumstance made their cheers of this evening more extraordinary than they otherwise would have been. If there was any man whose conduct he was more surprised at than another, it was the hon. member for Coventry. That hon. member had moved resolutions to amend those which he had proposed to the House. His (Mr. P's.) resolution was a resolution to compel the Bank to pay in specie in May, 1823. The resolution proposed by the hon. member for Coventry was a resolution that the Bank should pay in cash in May, 1822. The hon. member might perhaps say, that he had also moved some previous resolutions. He admitted that this was true. The hon. member had certainly made some proposition relative to the re-payment of certain issues to the Bank. But the hon. member said, that on leaving the House upon that occasion, he had whispered into the ear of the hon. member for Salisbury, that no return was to be made to cash payments, whilst the price of gold was 5l. 10*s.* What the hon. member whispered into the ear of the hon. member for Salisbury, he could not tell: he knew, however, what was the resolution the hon. member had recorded, and against his alleged whisper he would place in opposition his recorded resolution.—He would now return to the hon. member for Callington, who had endeavoured to overwhelm him with his sarcasm. But as he was to share that sarcasm with his hon. friend, the member for Portarlington (if he might be permitted, on account of the respect which he felt for that hon. gentleman's great talents and high character, to use a term which he certainly had no right to use from long intimacy with him), he would only observe, that he was willing to share it, so long as he shared it in such company. The hon. member for Callington had repeated certain observations of his upon the fulness of the Exchequer, and had made his own comments upon them. This made it necessary for him to repeat what he actually had said. He had said that if the currency had indeed been raised 40 per cent, it was most extraordinary and at the same time most consolatory, to discover that the taxes had increased in amount, and that there was one of two alternatives proved by it—either that the resources of the country were most flourishing, or that the depreciation had not been so great as was generally stated. But, if he had spoken of seeing with satisfaction the result which he had mentioned was it to be understood that he saw with satisfaction so much money raised from the people? No such thing. What he meant to say was, that he had had great satisfaction in seeing that sum raised without any recourse being had to processes of law to extract it from those who were unwilling to pay it. His reason for making the observation was, to use it in refutation of a witness who had been examined before the agricultural committee, and who had stated, that the consumption of all the necessaries of life, had, for some time past, been greatly decreasing. The following was the evidence of that witness:—"You have stated that in the necessaries of life you conceive the consumption to have diminished one third in Birmingham; do you think that that diminution of consumption is at all general? A general diminution of the necessaries of life, I believe, exists throughout the whole kingdom, except in the markets of London.—"Do you consider salt as a necessary of life? Certainly.—Soap? Certainly.—Malt? Yes.—Candles? Yes. —Sugar? I do not; but the poor people do.—Tea? Yes." The name of this witness was Thomas Attwood, esq. [Hear.] And, if he had spoken with satisfaction of the increase of the revenue, it was because he had wanted to show that no decrease had taken place in the consumption of the necessaries of life. The hon. member for Callington had then stated, that if he (Mr. P.) would examine the records of his office, he would find that the prevailing distress had given birth to disturbances in various parts of the manufacturing districts. Now, if the hon. member was speaking of the present, he must beg leave to say, that he found no disturbances at present existing among them. The hon. member might, perhaps, allude to the riots in Staffordshire and Monmouthshire—the only counties in which the laws had been violated.

Mr. Attwood said, he alluded to Staffordshire.

Mr. Peel contended, that the disturbances in that county did not arise out of any distress.* As a proof of it, he would state one fact:—The master manufacturers had offered their labourers 3*s.* a day, besides two pints of beer each, and fuel for their family.

Mr. Attwood said, there was not employment for those labourers. The wages were probably as stated; but the men had not employment for more than four days in the week.*

Mr. Peel said, he would leave it to his

hon. friend, the member for Staffordshire, who at his request had left his parliamentary duties to visit, in his magisterial capacity, the county which he represented, to speak more fully upon that particular point. He would now refer, not to the present, but to a past period, to illustrate his argument. The period to which he should allude was a period under which that beautiful order of things, a paper standard, flourished most largely. Why, the very words "paper standard" was a contradiction in terms. Yet, under that beautiful order of things, what was the state of the manufacturing population? In 1816 and 1817 we had all the blessings of the paper standard; but in those years we had the Habeas Corpus act suspended, and several other precautions taken for the preservation of the public tranquillity. Disaffection to the government and the constitution was not at that time attributed to the bulk of the people, but, as was stated in a report from a committee of that House, to causes existing among the lower classes, one of which was, privation in consequence of the lowness of wages and the increased price of the necessaries of life. "But," said the hon. member for Callington, "there had at that time been a great revulsion of prices." To be sure there had: that was one of the evils arising from the paper standard. "Oh yes," said the hon. member for Callington, "but you ought to recollect that a paper currency gives you wealth and capital." Of course it did; but only till a day of payment came. In 1816 what was it but an over-issue of paper which led to great speculation, and a reaction of it created much bankruptcy and distress, that reduced the country to its pitiable situation? That system might go on well if it were always to continue. But, though a man might be happy when he got drunk, or when he imbibed oxygen gas, still he must expect to endure some misery before he returned to a state of sobriety, or before he was again able to inhale the atmospheric air. To go on well under a paper system, it must always continue—just as a drunken man, to be always happy, ought to be always drunk. The right hon. secretary then proceeded to state, that he must again refer to the evidence of the witness whom he had quoted. That witness was asked, "Has there been no circumstance in the last two years but supply and demand to determine the price of any of the necessaries of life?" To which he replied, "Certainly; nothing can determine the price of articles but the relative state of supply and demand." That was an admission which the hon. member seemed to have forgotten that evening. [Here some gentleman interrupted Mr. Peel, for the purpose of informing him, that the member for Callington was Mr. Matthias Attwood, and not Mr. Thomas Attwood.] He had thought that it was the opinion of the hon. member for Callington, that he had been quoting: sure he was, that he had seen the same or similar doctrines from the hon. member in print; and he had referred to them to show what he conceived to be a great inconsistency in the argument of the hon. gentleman that evening. With regard to what had fallen from the hon. member for Callington, as to making corn the standard of value, from the year 1700 to 1783, there had been little or no change in the price of gold, whilst, on the contrary, there had been the greatest fluctuations in the price of corn. In 1815, when wheat was 64*s.* per quarter, gold was 5*l.* 6*s.* per ounce, and accordingly paper was much depreciated. In 1817, when wheat was 94*s.* per quarter, gold was of much lower value. Indeed, of all articles corn was that which it was most unfit to fix as a standard, since it was liable to great fluctuations in consequence of the smallest increase or decrease of the natural quantity in market.

Mr. Attwood said, in explanation, that he did not recognize any opinions that had been expressed by him, amongst those which the right hon. secretary had so preposterously ascribed to him. He would request the right hon. gentleman to take his opinions from himself, and neither to form, nor collect systems for him, nor imagine that he was to be responsible for them, when collected from whatever sources. With respect to the long extract of evidence which had been read, he was at a loss to know what conclusion the right hon. gentleman meant to draw from it; but as he seemed to think he had established by it, some inconsistency in him (Mr. Attwood), he begged to inform him, that he had never even read, and did not know of the existence of such evidence, till the right hon. gentleman was pleased to read it to him; and all he had then to say upon it was, that the answers seemed to him at least as correct as the questions.

Mr. Ellice, in answer to the observations of the right hon. gentleman, maintained he had always been a strenuous and consistent opponent of the paper system, but, unlike the right hon. gentleman, he had never ceased to warn the House of the ruinous and unjust consequences of the measure of 1819. The right hon. gentleman had taunted him with cheering his hon. friend (the member for Callington), for whose luminous and able statements he was, in common with the rest of the House, so much indebted, when he had called the bill of the right hon. gentleman a fraud on all creditors. He was not aware, that the observation of his hon. friend was applied exclusively to that bill, but he had no hesitation in expressing his entire concurrence in the opinion, applied, as he understood it, to the various measures adopted since the first conclusion of the war in 1814. These had been equally fraudulent on the part of government towards creditors, as the bill of 1797 had been before to all debtors. The right hon. gentleman recalled to the recollection of the House his (Mr. E's) support of the bill of 1819, and stated he rather outran the proposers of that measure, than fell short of their endeavours to restore the standard. The right hon. gentleman might also have been candid enough, to admit the principles, on which he then advocated the necessity of fixing some standard. He would not say he had been able sufficiently to explain those principles, for it was the first time he had ever addressed a public assembly, but he appealed to those who attended the discussions in 1819, whether he did not qualify his support of the bill, preferring it as the only alternative to a further perseverance in the existing system, which was then before them. The country had been too long subject to the experiments of the chancellor of the exchequer and the Bank directors, who had complete control over its circulating medium, without the most remote acquaintance with any of the common principles on which a paper currency could safely be regulated. We had had first, on the cessation of the war in 1815, a sudden contraction, and then in 1817 an immense over-issue of paper, apparently without the least reflection, and certainly without any knowledge of the necessary results of such opposite and contradictory proceedings. On the report of the committee, he entirely concurred in their recommendation that a definite standard should be settled, to prevent the recurrence of such a state of things, and to put down, he trusted for ever, the unlimited power possessed by the Bank; but he also protested against misleading the country with respect to the necessary consequences of the proposed alteration. He denied then, as he denied now, that the price of gold, banished as it had long been, in this country as a circulating medium of exchange, could be any index of the true extent of the depreciation of our currency; or rather that the difference between the accidental price at any particular period and the former mint price, could at all measure the effect of the depreciation on general prices of commodities and contracts. Upon this view of the subject, he proposed to obviate their acknowledgment of the rule laid down by the committee, rather at once to resume the old standard, than adopt the graduated scale which neither for the time it was intended to continue it, nor in its difference from the former, could afford any adequate relief to the difficulties he apprehended. He foresaw in the disposition of the Bank at the time, as the practical working of the plan must be left to them, that before the bill could pass, their paper might be even more valuable than gold at the old standard —this actually happened. The House would recollect he had added a rider to permit the Bank to pay in coin as soon as the price of gold was actually 3*l*. 17*s*. 10*d*., from an apprehension that this might occur. The Lords rejected his amendment, and the consequence had been, the necessity of passing a bill last year, to meet precisely the case he predicted. But did it follow, because such had been the line he pursued, that he must necessarily be included among those who concurred in the measures recommended by the committee, as well as in their general principles? It was in the extent of the application of those principles under the particular circumstances of the country that he entirely differed from them, and his difference was to such an extent that he could not prevail upon any person to second an amendment substituting 5*l*. 10*s*. for 3*l*. 17*s*. 6*d*. His noble friend the member for Sarum (lord Folkestone) would have sanctioned a resolution for fixing the standard at 4*l*. 10*s*. But considering that, even, ineffectual and inadequate to meet the effect of the previous depreciation, he declined proposing it. He subsequently, in a future session, from the same feeling, although he had previously brought before the House a detailed statement of the severe effects of the alteration of the currency on the mercantile interest, which was confirmed by his hon. friend, the member for Bramber (Mr. Irving), voted against the proposition of his hon. friend the member for Taunton, for establishing the double standard of gold and silver, at the depreciated scale of our silver currency. That would have been a relief equal to fixing the standard of gold at 4*l.* 5*s.* or 6*s.* but still in his opinion insufficient, and nothing could be so impolitic or inexpedient as tampering in this way, from year to year, with the currency. Indeed, he should say now, that to whatever extreme measure our difficulties, when more fully ascertained by experience, might lead us, nothing should induce us again to alter the standard fixed by the bill of 1819. But he did not expect to hear from the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Peel), the charge he had made against him of inconsistency in his opinions on this subject. Those who had done him the honour to listen to any thing he had said, since he first came into the House, must know what his invariable impressions had been respecting it; but if he could justly be charged with inconsistency, the accusation came with a bad grace from the right hon. gentleman and his friends, who had voted both for the resolutions of the chancellor of the exchequer in 1811, and for the measures of 1819. Every hour's experience confirmed his apprehensions of the ultimate result. The country, it was true, was altogether as rich, or possibly more so than at any former period, and it was of little consequence whether our general capital and profits were double the nominal amount in Bank notes of 1814 or 1818, or half that amount in the reformed standard of 1819. The difficulty was, in the disarrangement of all the respective claims of debtor and creditor on that capital, and in the enormously oppressive operation of taxes imposed in one currency, and levied in another, on means reduced in an inverse proportion. He had watched attentively the progressive operation of the last of these measures, the bill of the right hon. gentleman, and which was only a part of the system. He had seen the merchant who had engagements either absolutely ruined, or still struggling to put off the evil day, in the hope of some advance in the value of his means of payment, arising from changes for the better, which could never arrive. They had before them the just complaints of the cruel distress of the agriculturist, who was called upon for the same taxes and charges from his produce reduced one half in price. In short, they were daily witnessing the progressive destruction of all the productive interests of the country, striving against burthens and engagements, which with all their exertions, they might be unable to meet. The creditors and unproductive classes, on the other hand whose means were derived from the profits of the industrious and active population, were taking an undue proportion of their earnings. According to the progressive distress of the latter, the wealth and influence of the former increased, and it appeared to him a silent revolution was steadily advancing, under which all that was valuable or useful in the community, must be gradually but ultimately sacrificed to an insatiable monied interest. Indeed he could not blame the latter; their good fortune appeared forced upon them by government and that House, and he conscientiously believed they had sufficient experience of the extremes to which the country had alternately been exposed, to be rather apprehensive of a long continuance of the present state of things, and desirous of some fair and equitable settlement to all parties. It appeared however in the opinion of his majesty's ministers that matters were not yet sufficiently ripe for a consideration of this subject, and it was useless until the majority of that House had a little farther experience of the present system, to press further for a revisal of it. The resolutions before the House were a melancholy proof of the delusion which still existed, and of the weakness of those who expected from such measures any, he would say, the smallest relief from sufferings produced by obvious causes, which they persisted in denying. He certainly would continue as far as the expression of his opinion went, his decided opposition to them all, although he really did believe, beyond the adoption of a most unjust and unwise principle, a course which unfortunately that House was often in the habit of pursuing, any measure to be founded upon them under present appearances would be equally unproductive of mischief or benefit to the community. The discussion had served a useful purpose to ministers, in distracting and dividing the attention of the landed gentlemen from the real cause of their embarrassment, but he even did them the justice to believe, they would be as strenuous advocates for the repeal of the proposed bill, as they were now for its adoption, if unfortunately by its enactments coming into operation, the price of provisions should be increased to the consumer, to double their cost to the industrious classes in other countries.

Mr. T. Wilson observed, that when the measure of 1819 began to operate, the depreciation of our paper currency, did not exceed five or six per cent. There was no ground, therefore, for the assertion of his hon. friend (Mr. Attwood), on this point. Neither could he agree with his hon. friend, that they had not now sufficient information to enable them to legislate on this subject. He had no doubt that the measure before them would prove beneficial.

Mr. Littleton confirmed the truth of the right hon. secretary's statement, that the disorders in Staffordshire did not originate in distress. It was actually true that the miners had refused an offer of 3s. a day, besides beer and fuel.

Mr. Brougham asked, upon what principle he was required to exculpate himself, on account of the vote he had given in favour of the motion of his hon. friend the member for York? He must protest against a practice, which would have the effect of cramping members in the votes which it was their duty to give on public questions; and must also declare, not only that he made use of no argument in favour of a remission of taxes to the amount of 20,000,000*l.*, but that he had heard of none such on the occasion alluded to. It might happen that beneficial measures were supported by doubtful arguments; and, independently of the reasoning urged in its defence, or of the quarter whence it proceeded, he would vote for a resolution which had, in his opinion, a salutary tendency. Of this readiness he could not furnish a more decisive instance, than by voting, as he should do, for the resolutions of the noble marquis that night, although he had a well-grounded distrust of the principles on which the noble lord administered the government of this country.

The question being put, "That the report be now brought up," the House divided: Ayes, 153; Noes, 22. The report was then brought up and read. On the motion that the said Resolutions be read a second time,

Mr. Huskisson rose, for the purpose of submitting his resolutions, not with any view of opposing them to those of his noble friend, but he wished to have them recorded on the Journals. He thought the House had, in approving the resolutions before them, attended too much to one inconvenience—that of the danger of too great an influx of foreign grain from the warehouses; while they overlooked another—that of the want of a steady remunerating price to the farmer. It was his opinion that the safest mode would be, a free trade in corn, with a fair protecting duty. Without this, the farmer would in time of dearth be inundated with foreign corn without an adequate protection. The time, he was convinced, would come, when we should have such a trade, by which the British grower would be protected in a degree equivalent to the disadvantages under which he laboured. The right hon. gentleman then moved his resolutions by way of amendment. [See p. 209.]

The Marquis of Londonderry said, that in giving the negative to the resolutions of his right hon. friend, he would not deny the general principle which they involved; but he thought that principle applied to a different state of things. He was anxious to see the general basis of the corn laws well settled before he consented to such a measure.

The amendment was then put, and negatived. Mr. Ricardo then submitted his resolutions for the sake of having them recorded on the Journals. [See p. 201.]

Mr. Maxwell said:—The duty on foreign wool recently imposed has been followed by the most prosperous trade ever known in woollen manufacture, and the monopoly of the corn-market has been followed by universal demand for British manufacture; yet we are told, that protecting duties are a positive detriment to the country, and a poll tax upon the community. High prices here, and low prices on the continent, would lead the farmer into the most disastrous situation, we are told—and yet we have never had complaints from the wool grower on this ground. If we raise the price of provisions, we are assured of the flight of commerce—and yet we are told that a monopoly regulation is inoperative in effecting a rise of prices. Have the junto at Henderson's hotel—has Mr. Webb Hall—ever advanced positions more unreasonable or less demonstrable than these? Can any one doubt them to originate with the merchant and the monied interest? Let us lay aside the intrigues of corn jobbers and of corn growers, and consider, as consumers desirous of keeping faith with the public creditor, how we can most honestly obtain cheap bread. Let us examine the price of labour in Britain and on the continent, and give the farmer indemnity for employing workmen at such prices as may keep the industrious family from privations incompatible with comfort or contentment. This is the first duty we have to perform; and it is one which will be as salutary to the state and consonant to justice, as prohibitory laws are at variance with equity, and opposed to commercial prosperity. The price of grain depends upon the currency—its value, upon the wealth of the community. What right a corn jobber and a Pole have to profit, arising from evasion of the burthens imposed on industry in Britain, I cannot discover, any more than I can comprehend why the farmer should have a boon not accorded to the manufacturer. Let ministers subject the seller of Polish grain to those burthens with which he overwhelms the British seller, and cease to punish the latter for being his countryman. The bounty of Providence is said to be a calamity. Nativity in Britain will be considered a misfortune, if a free trade and a debt of 200 million ounces of gold are co-existent. Protecting duties must be kept in force, where taxation falls upon the necessaries of life in a degree unknown in any other country. But struggling emigration, expensive revenue establishments, and corrupt influence, will accompany their enforcement, and the public and the state be at variance. A good minister would remove the taxes from the necessaries of life, and place them upon property: a wise parliament would sanction a change calculated to give industry a stimulus. Mercenary defence of the state, spies, incendiaries, pauperism, and all the vice and crime, cause or effect of such nuisances, would be diminished, low prices of food would be a universal good, and machinery a blessing instead of a curse to the working classes. Let the consumer weigh in his own mind the consequences of the present system: let him estimate the moral good that would arise from a juster system of finance, and unite with the farmer in making that property, secured by the war, amenable to the consequences involved in its security. Let the land-owner avow that it was his own acres that he mortgaged. Let him act in unison with his avowal, and take the burthen from the industry of the country to its wealth, before the people leave him lord of a depopulated domain, and chief of a beggared populace. I shall oppose no measure of relief to the farmer, except prohibition or schemes to raise the price; protecting duties and reduction of taxes must be resorted to, until the labourer of Britain can live as cheaply as the Frenchman or the Belgian; and any scheme which shall give to the Exchequer what the corn importer defrauds it of, must be a public gain, and will not alter the price of food I am persuaded.

Mr. Ricardo's resolutions were negatived; after which those of the marquis of Londonderry [See p. 190.] were agreed to.

Post Master General in Ireland.] Mr. S. Rice asked the noble marquis, whether it was the intention of government to adopt any resolution with respect to the second post-master of Ireland?

The Marquis of Londonderry said, that when government advised the Crown to take measures with respect to the second post-master of England, they advised the same measure with respect to the post-master of Ireland.

Mr. Hume wished to know whether a similar arrangement was to take place with respect to the post-office in Scotland.

The Marquis of Londonderry said, that the post-master there had other duties to perform, besides those of the post-office; and, besides, his salary did not exceed 800*l.* a year.

Mr. Hume thought 800*l.* a year too much for doing nothing.

Tuesday, May 14.

Ale-houses Licensing Bill.] Mr. Bennet, in rising to move for leave to bring in a bill "to alter and amend the present mode of licensing ale-houses," observed, that under the present system an individual who solicited a license was obliged to give in a certificate of character. It might naturally be supposed that this certificate would be derived from the place where he had last resided. No such thing; it was required to come from the place to which he was going. He would alter this practice, and provide that the certificate should be signed by some individuals living in the parish in which the publican had last resided, and state particularly what business he had formerly pursued. The next point was that of recognizances. Under the present law, a publican was required to enter into recognizances for his proper behaviour; but this was merely a matter of form, no real securities being ever given. His bill would provide that substantial securities should be given. It was an evil of the existing system that it presented no intermediate degrees of punishment for the improper conduct of publicans, between absolute ruin by the deprivation of licenses and the infliction of slight fines. He proposed to remedy this by giving magistrates the power to proportion the fines to the offences; and, in an instance of very gross misconduct, to send the case before a jury. If the jury should return a verdict against the offender, the magistrates would then estreat his recognizances, shut up his house, and declare him incapable of again opening a public-house. It would be required that a magistrate who abrogated or refused to grant a license should state his reasons for his conduct. To the disgrace of the magistracy, the majority of the public-houses throughout the country were in the hands of brewers, who drenched the people with their bad beer, or compelled them to take to spirits as a substitute. The only remedy for the evil was, to increase the facility of obtaining licenses for public-houses; and for that purpose he would enable every man holding a house of 20*l.* a year to demand the right (upon entering into fit securities) of opening a public-house; leaving power to the magistrates, on the next licensing day, to shut up the house if they saw reason to do so. He concluded by moving for leave to bring in his bill.

Mr. Calvert thought something ought to be done to prevent the practice of serving beer in short measures.

Sir I. Coffin maintained, that the poor man was cheated by the publican in the way of bad measure.

Mr. R. Colborne suggested the propriety of permitting the sale of table beer of a quality stronger than that which was allowed to be sold by the present law.

Mr. Grenfell thought the thanks of the country were due to his hon. friend, for having brought the subject under the consideration of the House.

Leave was given to bring in the bill.

IONIAN ISLANDS.] Mr. Hume rose to submit his motion respecting the present state of the Ionian Islands. He commenced by stating, that the task which he had undertaken was not one pleasing to himself, nor, moreover, was it of a description which any man would be disposed to undertake who was anxious for his own ease; but he considered the welfare of 200,000 inhabitants of the Ionian islands, and the connexion which the maintenance of the English character had with their condition, as superior to all personal inducements, and as calling upon him to undertake the task, however painful it might be in any particular point of view. He was, therefore, perfectly prepared to discharge his public duty, entertaining as he did the strongest opinions upon the highly improper manner in which the government of the Ionian islands had been conducted since it was placed under the king of Great Britain, as protector. This was not the first but the third time he had called the attention of parliament to the subject: and he regretted that his endeavours to ameliorate the condition of the Ionians had had so little effect. He did so last year at considerable length; and, in now again submitting the miserable situation of those islands to the attention of the House, he should be happy to compress his statements within as narrow a compass as possible, consistent with the importance of the case, and the rendering all its circumstances as intelligible as was necessary to enable the House fully to comprehend the whole bearings of the question. In discharging this duty, he begged to disclaim being actuated by any personal feelings against the character of sir Thomas Maitland, whom he had principally to arraign in the narrative of these transactions. With that individual or his family he had never had any personal connexion or difference, and could not, therefore, be influenced by private motives of any description. He felt a deep interest in the condition of these islanders, because he had spent a considerable time amongst them, and had had much intercourse with them at that period. He could not, from his knowledge of their past and present situation, look at their condition now, without deploring it in the highest degree.

When he had the pleasure of residing in the Ionian islands, Corfu was still held by France; and the remainder of the islands were occupied by British troops. He had then gone from island to island, and enjoyed the gratifying pleasure of hearing the English name and character, and every thing connected with them, praised and revered by the people: the connection with England was to them the harbinger of peace and happiness, and her protection was felt by them to be an assurance of the early enjoyment of British rights and liberty.

Before he alluded to the formal manner in which England had, by the treaty of Paris, become the protectress of the Ionian islands, he should, for the information of those hon. members who might not have heard him last year, say a few words respecting their previous condition and government. The Ionian islands formerly belonged to the republic of Venice: but when that state became subject to the dominion of France in 1797, they followed the fate of the republic. The French remained in occupation of them until the year 1800, when the Turks and Russians drove them out, and they then came under the protection of the latter, who established what was called the septinsular republic, and under that form of government, they remained until the treaty of Tilsit, when by a secret article they were conveyed back again to the French, who resumed their government and retained it until the year 1810, at which time they were all, except Corfu, (which had a strong garrison) re-captured by the British. He was then in these islands, and present at the time of the capture of Santa Maura. England then occupied Zante, Cephalonia, Ithaca, and the rest, except Corfu; and so they remained until the fall of Buonaparte, when the whole of the islands were placed under the protection of the king of England, by the treaty of Paris, signed at the congress in that capital on the 5th of Nov. 1815. They were by that treaty "declared to be free and independent states," and placed as such under the immediate guarantee and protection of the British government. One article of that treaty states, that they are consigned to the "immediate and exclusive protection of the king of Great Britain." And another article specifies, that a convention shall settle all matters therein (meaning the islands), and that they shall support and pay the British garrisons (which are still to occupy them) in time of peace, not exceeding 3000 men, with all their expenses. By the same article, Corfu was to remain under the then existing form of government, until by a convention of the several islands a local government should be organized there to supply its place. On the 17th May, 1817, a constitutional charter for the united states of these islands was prepared by sir T. Maitland, the lord high commissioner from Great Britain, with an appearance of concert with, but in reality without any sanction of, the inhabitants; and, on the 11th of July following it was confirmed by the king of Great Britain.

In submitting his present motion to parliament, he (Mr. Hume) was actuated by a two-fold object: 1st, as related to Great Britain, on the score of expense; and 2dly, as related to the happiness of the people of these islands, and to the character of the nation in her capacity of protectress to the Ionian islands. He could refer to various speeches of the noble marquis (Londonderry) opposite, declaratory of the interest which Great Britain took at the congress respecting these islands, and what advantages the islanders were to enjoy in consequence of her protection: that the islands were to maintain the British garrisons out of their own revenues, and to enjoy the advantages of a free constitution: and that England was not to be put to any expense, as protector of the independence of the Ionian government.—These were the expectations which were held out by the noble marquis in that House, and by the noble lord at the head of the colonial department (earl Bathurst) in the House of Lords. The people naturally expected the enjoyment of peace, happiness, and tranquillity, under a representative form of government and under the protection of the king of Great Britain. From the whole tenour of the speeches of the noble lords, and obvious interpretation of the articles in the treaty, these people were to form their own constitution, and England was not to be saddled with any part of the expense of garrisoning the islands in time of peace. There was also an express stipulation which provided, that when the British garrisons should exceed the number of 3,000 troops (contemplating a state of war, and some political emergency) then the local revenue were not to be chargeable for more than the maintenance of the said 3,000 men. The words of the convention, which were probably framed by the noble marquis himself, were very precise, and to this effect — "That his Britannic majesty consented that a particular convention with the Ionian States shall settle all matters relating to the garrisons both as to number and expense:" of course the meaning of the contemplated arrangement must have been, that the settlement should take place with those constitutional authorities, in conformity with the stipulation, that all expenses were to be defrayed by the revenues of the islands: therefore clearly implying, that there was to exist a civil and independent government, separate and distinct from the military authorities. It should be stated, that in the year 1816 sir T. Maitland was appointed to the office of lord high commissioner of the Ionian islands, and succeeded general Campbell in the command; he remained a few months on the spot, and returned to England, as was supposed, to arrange with the British government at home the free constitution which it was pretended had been suggested by the islanders. Sir T. Maitland returned to the Ionian states in Nov. of the same year (1816), and the form of their constitution was settled in the spring of the following year (the 2nd of May, 1817). By the 12th article, 2nd section, and 7th chapter, of that charter, it was settled—that all expenses of quartering the regular troops of his Britannic majesty, and, generally speaking, all their garrison expenses, so far as providing for the above-mentioned 3,000 men, should be paid out of the treasury of the Ionian states. Now, he would ask, had that been done? Had not the people of England sufficient burthens to bear—did not their condition call loudly for relief — without being saddled with the large additional expense of maintaining these establishments in the Ionian islands? [Hear]. The main point for which he contended was this—that the Ionian government ought to pay, as the treaty stipulated, the expense of the British garrisons out of their revenues; instead of which, contrary to the express letter of the treaty, and the repeated declaration of the ministers, England was annually put to a very large expense for garrisoning these islands. He found it extremely difficult to get correct returns of the expenditure for the past year; several had been called for by him this session, but, hitherto, none had been laid before the House, and he was obliged to go back to a former return; and one in particular dated on the 25th Feb. 1820, which purported to contain an abstract of the expenditure incurred by Great Britain in the Ionian islands for the years ending on the 25th Dec. 1817, and 1818, as far as these accounts had been delivered by the Mediterranean commissariat to the Audit-office. Since these returns had been made, he was aware that some praise was due to the secretary of the Treasury, for the more distinct manner in which the accounts of the army extraordinaries had been made up: but much remained to be done to bring the colonial expenditure fairly before parliament. By the accounts to which he had referred, it appeared that in 1817, the expenses incurred by Great Britain in the Ionian islands, over and above the sums defrayed out of the local revenues, amounted to 145,203*l.* for the Ionian military establishment alone, exclusive of transports, which were kept there at a considerable expense for three years; and it was only on his moving for certain returns, the year before last, that four or five of these transports, which were kept sailing from island to island chiefly, if not entirely, for the convenience of the lord high commissioner, were discharged. In 1818, the expenditure charged to Great Britain was 120,000*l.* He had moved for further accounts, which were not yet forthcoming, but he knew that an increased number of British troops had been since employed there. At first 2,000 British troops were employed there, then the number was increased at different times, 2, 3, and 400, until the number of regular troops now amounted to 3,900, exclusive of the artillery, commissariat, and other departments. Upon calculating the expenditure incurred by England for these islands, during the seven years that had elapsed since the treaty of Paris, he found that it amounted to above a million sterling, every shilling of which might and ought to have been left in the pockets of the people of England, agreeably to the treaty of Paris; and moreover he was convinced, that under a proper and provident management of the Ionian revenues, sufficient funds would have been derived from them for maintaining the garrisons, without adding any thing to the burthen of England on that account. He would, however, add, that under the profuse and extravagant government of sir T. Maitland, England would be drained to support useless civil and military establishments, and at the same time to deprive the islanders of their rights and liberties [Hear!]. So far, therefore, as pecuniary calculations were involved in this question, he must submit, that the resources of Great Britain were wasted to support establishments in these islands, which were not warranted by the circumstances of the times, or the treaties by which England had acquired the protection of these states. Upon a reference to the returns which had been made of the revenues of the Ionian islands, in the years 1817, 1818, and 1819, he found that in 1817 they were 391,000 dollars, or 87,000*l.*, to which, for the purpose of showing the total expense of their government, must be added the 145,000*l.* charged to England: thus constituting for the civil government and military garrisons in one year of peace, no less a sum than 232,000*l.* [Hear!]. In 1818, the revenues appeared to have been increased to 615,000 dollars, a sum equal to carrying on the whole expense, were it not for the creation of new and useless offices, and the augmentation of the salaries of the old offices by sir T. Maitland. That lord high commissioner himself held a variety of offices in his own person: as governor of Malta he received 5,000*l.* a year; as commander-in-chief in the Mediterranean he received 3,500*l.*; as lord high commissioner he received 1,000*l.*; by a pension from the revenues of Ceylon he derived 1,000*l.* more; and besides these emoluments, he had a regiment, and a variety of allowances, probably putting him during the last seven years, in the receipt of 15,000*l.* a year, or 13,000*l.* upon the most moderate computation. How far these appointments were consistent with the noble marquis's repeated declarations of economy, he (the marquis) would perhaps explain to the House: but he (Mr. H.), contended it was a breach of duty, as well as of promise, for the government not to look into and reduce this expenditure, and save the country the additional burthens it so improperly imposed.

The hon. gentleman then read a list of salaries and offices in the islands, which had all been of late years augmented. There was a secretary in one place at 500*l.* a year, an assistant at 300*l.*, two others at 250*l.* and 150*l.*, all with other allowances, a general treasurer at 700*l.*; his assistant 250*l.*; another at 280*l.*; the head of the supreme council 2,000*l.*; with a variety of other salaries of the same description. Amongst these items he also found an agent for the Ionian islands resident here (an office, in his humble opinion, utterly unnecessary), a sir Alex. Wood, with a salary of 500*l.* a year. Sir F. Adam had also 1,000*l.* a year as chief military officer under the lord high commissioner; four militia inspectors had 383*l.* a year each, and six sub-inspectors some had 228*l.*, and others 191*l.* each. Near 3,000*l.* a year was thus paid for militia inspectors, when he knew, from an officer who had for three years filled one of these offices, that not a single inspector of them had been called out on duty, with the militia for one day throughout the whole of that period [Hear, hear!]. There were 10 staff officers in this manner useless; one of them was major Thomas Fane, a member of that House, appointed so lately as last August: captain J. L. White was another to rank as lieutenant-colonel, as all of them did on their appointment; he was from the 61st foot, and was appointed inspecting field-officer in the gazette of the 4th of August last. These offices were, as the fact proved, merely for the sake of patronage, and not for service, in the gift of either the government at home or the general abroad. It was intolerable that England should have to pay 150,000*l.* over and above the revenues of these islands for purposes of this kind, when their revenues ought to be quite sufficient for every purpose, or, if not so, it should be shown that these revenues were inadequate to the real services required under the protection of England. But no accounts whatever of such necessity were submitted to the House. [Hear.] In looking over the returns laid before the House on his (Mr. Hume's) motion, he found above 350 individuals on the list of offices. He regretted that the gallant general, sir Thomas Maitland, should in his last year's speech (a speech certainly intended for England rather than for the senate to which it was addressed) have taken so much pains to animadvert upon the manner in which duties were discharged without pecuniary remuneration; it was a slur upon the whole unpaid magistracy of England, although there was no doubt that he, by that statement, intended to sanction all the extraordinary salaries which he had established in the Ionian islands. He (Mr. H.), when he was there, knew many persons of great respectability, who were proud to act as justices of the peace in their islands, and as officers of the inferior courts, in the same manner as our magistrates did in England, as an honour, and without reference to any remunerating salary.

But it was said, that these people had taken bribes. He denied the allegation generally, although there might be exceptions: it was improbable, and he thought, in the absence of all proof, his assertion on the one side was just as good as the one on the other. If there be any ground for the charge, why was the proof not produced? Under the Russian protection and the septinsular republic of these islands, the president was paid 1,515 dollars a year: living was cheap there, simplicity reigned in almost every branch of the Ionian domestic economy, and reduced the expenditure to one-fourth, or, perhaps, one-sixth of the cost of living in England; 1,515 dollars were, therefore, considered to be a large and liberal allowance by Russia. What did sir T. Maitland do for the president (whether he was a favoured man or not, he did not mean to say)—he raised his salary to 6,222 dollars a year. The senators, who had but 909 dollars each, received now 3,111 dollars; and the members of the legislative body who, in the time of the septinsular government, had altogether received but 12,000 dollars, were now allotted 26 or 27,000 dollars; and, although their services or sittings were only for a few weeks in the year, they were, instead of being paid during the time of their actual labours, put upon annual salaries, since sir T. Maitland's government. Not less extraordinary were some of the expenses charged on account of the lord high commissioner, sir T. Maitland. He alluded to the travelling expenses, under the head of army extraordinaries in 1819: such as "paid to captain Maitland for the passage and expenses of sir T. Maitland, in his majesty's ships, from Corfu to Malta, from Malta to Genoa, &c. 778*l.*" This was a charge, the House would observe, for the travelling expenses of an officer, receiving 5,000*l.* a year as governor of Malta, who ought to have been all the time on duty at Malta. [Hear.] It would be known to many members, that last year a petition had been sent from Malta, complaining of neglect of duty on the part of sir T. Maitland. In 1820, the charge for similar expenses, and on account of the same individual, was 982*l.* In 1821, it was 615*l.* All this seemed to be very exorbitant and unreasonable; but, why the charge of passage for a civil officer, in a ship of war, was entered in the army extraordinaries, he was totally at a loss to conceive. These expenses, seemed the more unwarranted, because that officer's pay and pensions amounted, exclusively of them, to no less than 10,458*l.* per annum. If such charges, therefore, were to be permitted for such offices, it was in vain for the country gentlemen to ask for relief: relief could not be effected, while items of this nature were allowed to remain.

Having now offered these few observations on the subject of economy, he would beg to add some upon the treatment which these islanders had received at our hands. There were many gentlemen in that House who had visited the Ionian islands since he himself had been there; and they would, perhaps, inform parliament what was the state of things at the time of their residence in those countries. For himself, he could vouch that at the period during which he was among the people in question, the English were almost adored. [Hear.] The Greeks looked up to them as their benefactors; they considered them as the assertors of their freedom; and from the hands which could confer so invaluable a gift, they were disposed to hope every thing. At the present moment, however, the very name of England was detested by all Greeks; and they awaited with impatient anxiety the moment which should enable them to free themselves from the odious thraldom in which they accused us of having bound them; and to break from the galling yoke which they reproached us with having imposed upon their country. [Hear.] They had, in truth, received from us the empty semblance of a representative constitution; but it was one destitute of all the benefits which they might reasonably have expected from it. The delusive constitution which they had received was calculated to be for a long time matter of deep regret to this unfortunate nation. He called it delusive, because it held out the form and appearance of popular representation, whilst it was a perfect despotism, under sir T. Maitland, who ruled every thing. When sir T. Maitland arrived at Corfu on the 17th Feb., 1816, his arrival was hailed by all the islanders with infinite joy, and they naturally hoped that under the representative of so powerful a protector as the sovereign of Great Britain, they should enjoy that freedom and those privileges, particularly the privilege of being represented in their senate, in the possession of which Great Britain herself had attained to such political distinction and renown. The very first opportunity that offered, however—in the case of Theotoki—attempts were made to influence and force the senate in their deliberations. These unfortunate islanders soon discovered that the lord high commissioner was disposed to put them and their institutions at defiance. In short, this case had been so often mentioned, that it was only necessary for him (Mr. H.) to state, that, in a few weeks after his arrival, endeavours were made to induce the senate to accede to measures which they had previously declared they could not conscientiously do. Four senators were expelled, and the most violent and unjustifiable measures were adopted by sir T. Maitland to procure their expulsion to Santa Maura and Zante. No specific charge was brought against them, but they were accused in a public proclamation generally of corrupt and wicked practices. [A laugh.] He (Mr. H.) thought it would be difficult to attach any other meaning to the Italian words "gli atti inetti e corrotti." The senate protested, but in vain; and the event was, that the lord high commissioner thought it necessary to proceed against the senators in a similar way. The senate remonstrated; but this violent conduct was sanctioned by the authority of an English order in council; the ground of which appeared to be, that this government could not consider the senate to be the general legislative body of the Ionian republic; but it considered it as the senate of Corfu only. Now what was the fact? The treaty of Paris had expressly recognized it for the senate of the septinsular government. The government of Great Britain had, by their first act, thus manifested, that they approved of a course of proceeding which was intended to strike terror into the minds of the people. This system of terror it was easy to trace at very different periods. On the 18th Jan., 1817, the drums beat to arms, the garrison was called out, the alarm was sounded, and every thing seemed to indicate that the island of Corfu was about to be attacked. There were at that time his majesty's ships Spartan and Tagus lying at their moorings; and these ships received the lord commissioner's orders to anchor opposite the town in the harbour, as if for the purpose of additional security. All the authorities were alarmed, and great pains were taken to persuade them that a conspiracy had been discovered, and that its objects were directed against the government. Now, this plot, which was called from its author Bignotti's conspiracy, had been anticipated in fact; for it was talked of at least two months before in the governor's house at Malta, as a thing very likely to happen. Private papers were seized; persons were imprisoned; and no one could reasonably consider himself to be safe. Priests, nobles, lawyers—none were respected who were considered to be obnoxious. At length an inquiry took place; the whole story was declared to be false and unfounded, and the parties who had been imprisoned were liberated, with a caution to demean themselves more carefully for the future. From that moment, no individual in the islands dared to express himself in the smallest degree dissatisfied with the British government. [Hear.] But a set of men easily discovered what they had to do, to curry favour with it, and to bespeak its favours by subserviency to the lord high commissioner and the crushing every complaint against his government. After acts of oppression and violence like these against innocent people, it would scarcely be credited that addresses to the lord high commissioner were got up by a set of sycophants—that some persons determined to raise triumphal arches to his honour—others to erect columns, with inscriptions to his praise. On the 5th of April 1817, the inhabitants of Cephalonia agreed upon a plan of this sort, and nothing could please them but a bronze statue of the general [A laugh.]; in Zante they proposed to erect a bust of a colossal size, which they determined should be made by the celebrated Canova. He (Mr. H.) regretted that an hon. gentleman, whom however he had not the pleasure of knowing (Mr. Bankes, jun.), was not now present, because that hon. member was understood to have been in the Ionian islands at the date of these transactions, and could, perhaps, afford the House some information on the subject. There were, however, one or two other members who, from similar circumstances, were equally qualified to furnish some particulars. At Santa Maura they voted a triumphal column; Ithaca and the other islands vied to demonstrate their attachment to the lord high commissioner. Shortly after this it was, that the grand crosses of the order of St. Michael were distributed in great profusion; and he believed that if a list of those distributions were laid before the House, he could with great facility point out those as knights who had been most active in preparing the fulsome addresses, or in voting for the columns, the busts, and the statues. This was much to be regretted, because those honours ought to have served a much better purpose. He really did believe, that if this country had ever done one thing more disgraceful than another, or one thing which was meant more than another to serve the purposes of a corrupt influence, it was the way in which the grand crosses of St. Michael were distributed. The noble marquis might rest assured, and he (Mr. H.) had no hesitation in asserting, that very many of them had been disposed of in the way just mentioned.

The House had been informed, that the lord high commissioner soon drew up a plan for a free government, and the people of course expected that their representatives should have some active part allotted them to perform. But they were disappointed: for those hon. members who had read what was called the constitutional charter, would see, that whatever it might hold out as its ostensible object, its practical effect was, to throw all the real power of the government of the Ionian islands into the hands of the lord high commissioner alone. [Hear, hear.] When the House looked at this instrument, they must perceive that it was one of the grossest delusions and most unblushing impositions that was ever submitted to the consideration of an intelligent people, under the name of a popular representative constitution. He had already said, in short, that the corrupt system of the self-elected magistracy of a Scotch burgh was nothing to it. A Scotch burgh was not presumed to possess a fair representation, and was considered as a mere rotten establishment; yet both purported to be represented by those who were selected by individuals competent to judge and having the power of selection for themselves. The fact was notoriously otherwise, and the analogy between the two cases was extraordinarily close. Would the noble marquis permit him to ask, how long it would take his lordship to settle the constitution of a country? [Hear, and a laugh.] Every body knew the facility of the noble lord in settling governments; and if the noble lord, in reply, should say, that it would occupy him for a space of time equal to that of the sitting of the agricultural committee, he (Mr. H.) would be quite satisfied. [A laugh.] But what was the case with the Ionian constitution? The legislative assembly of those islands was composed of 40 deputies or senators, of whom 29 ought to be returned by the freeholders of the different islands, and 10 were nominated out of a certain number elected by the lord high commissioner. Not contented with the power of electing 10 members, the lord high commissioner had endeavoured to influence the election of all the other senators who were eligible by the people. The people were summoned to vote for those who had been selected by sir T. Maitland. They refused; but being at length informed by the governors that they must vote, they came and voted in the negative. Notwithstanding the refusal of the people to vote for the parties nominated by sir T. Maitland, their votes were recorded, and the parties in question were sent up to the assembly, as if they had been duly returned, although a certain proportion of votes in the affirmative were requisite for an election [Hear!]. On the 24th of April, the assembly met and were called on to take an oath, that they would not divulge the subject or nature of their deliberations until the pleasure of the sovereign protector should be made known. On the following day, the 25th, the constitutional charter (to prepare which, agreeably to the treaty of Paris, they were summoned), ready prepared to their hands, was laid on the table, and read. The assembly were called upon immediately to agree to it—one individual spoke against its being confirmed, but he was immediately put down: no discussion was allowed; and thus the instrument was advanced towards its completion with a rapidity of which the House, quick as it was in the work of legislation, could hardly have an idea. On the 25th, it was finally agreed to, and the seal of the lord high commissioner was affixed to it. This was the Magna Charta of the Ionian islands! [A laugh.] On the 25th, the assembly, the deliberative assembly, who had prepared, between the 24th and 25th, a constitution, were called upon to sign, and did actually sign, and approve of it after one reading! [Hear!] Five days afterwards a deputation was appointed to carry the instrument to England for his majesty's approbation; and on the 5th of May the deputation was sent to its destination. Since that period, the lord high commissioner had controlled every thing; and not a man in the Ionian islands dared to open his mouth against what was known to be his wish or even his will. Setting aside the disappointments the people in question had experienced, and they were grievous; surely it was shameful that England was thus to be held up to the censure and derision of all Europe, for such acts of injustice committed in her name by sir T. Maitland! What could the noble lord, what could any traveller expect, but always to hear the injustice we had committed complained of; and what could be more reasonable than the demand for justice and reparation at our hands?—The hon. gentleman then adverted to the cession of Parga, which he designated as one of the darkest blots upon our national reputation. In that, too, the lord high commissioner had had but too great a share. Then an insurrection had broken out at Santa Maura, and everybody well knew that it was the effect of a most impolitic taxation and oppressive government. Every act of our government in these islands had been distinguished by a character of violence or tyranny. Two priests accused of being concerned in exciting that insurrection were taken and executed in their canonicals. Though they might have been guilty, some measures other than a drum-head court martial should have been adopted that might have sufficiently proved them to be so. He, for one, could not separate sir T. Maitland from that responsibility which he conceived attached to the exercise of the British authority in the Ionian islands. Another act of his government was equally extraordinary and unwarrantable. The whole of the church property had been placed under the superintendance of col. Robinson, as administrator-general. An officer of the marines was appointed head of the church to act under the authority of the senate. He was directed to recover all usurpations of property which he should consider as such, without an appeal or the interference of any tribunal: he appointed the stewards to all the church establishments, and the elections of abbots and abbesses were held under his authority. What must have been the feeling of every Catholic at the nomination of colonel Robinson? It would not be enough to tell him (Mr. H.), in answer to this part of the case, that a change was subsequently made, and col. Robinson's authority in this respect limited to Corfu. In any island the interference of a heretic in that manner with the Greek church was the grossest insult. He would give one instance of the manner in which the powers to which he had alluded were exercised, as far as regarded the recovery of what was called usurped property. An individual of the name of Battaglia owned some land that had been in the possession of his family for a century. It was resumed, as belonging to the Church: he appealed, and four judges were called upon to decide the question: two gave an opinion in his favour, and two against him. The question was then referred to the lord high commissioner, and in his final decision a decree of the doge of Venice, as long ago as the year 1416, was quoted, declaring that none of the church lands could under any circumstances be alienated [Hear.] Accordingly, the land was resumed, and Battaglia had been a beggar ever since. The consequence of these proceedings was, a disturbance at Zante, which, however, did not proceed to the length of rebellion. A number of persons were arrested on suspicion and some were prosecuted; among them Martinengo, who was charged with no distinct crime, but was supposed to have had something to do in exciting an unpleasant feeling on the part of the people against the government. The manner of the arrest of that gentleman and the subsequent treatment would be a fair example of the manner in which the Ionians were treated. On the 7th of August, at midnight, he was dragged from his bed, and kept in silent and solitary confinement until the 23rd October, not even being allowed to have an interview with his adopted son. He was then brought to trial on a charge of so vague and wild a nature, that the learned member for Winchelsea (Mr. Brougham), on a former occasion, had truly stated, that the lowest attorney of the court ought to have been ashamed of producing it. It was worthy of remark also, that Martinengo was not tried according to the forms and court appointed for such offences in the constitutional charter; but a new court was constituted for the purpose, and that court sentenced a man of one of the first families in Zante, and sixty-six years old, to no less a punishment than to be degraded from his rank and to be imprisoned for 12 years in the fortress of Santa Maura. Death would have been mercy, compared with such an infliction. [Hear.] The adopted son of Martinengo came to this country, and on a statement of the facts, this government commuted the sentence to three or four years' banishment, and Martinengo was at this moment in Venice, with some hundreds of his unfortunate fellow-countrymen who have been banished or have fled from the tyranny of sir Thomas Maitland. Were not these facts enough to rouse the most indolent and supine? The bare relation of them made the blood boil; but the endurance of them was ample motive for the Ionians to make every exertion to throw off a yoke so unjust and so onerous. The wonder indeed was, that these brave islanders, under such aggravated oppressions, had not made greater efforts to free themselves from such an odious bondage.

After quoting a passage from his (Mr. Hume's) speech of last session, in which the hon. member asserted, that the blood of the innocent victims would be on the heads of the oppressors, unless the British government interfered to stop such cruel proceedings, he proceeded to express his satisfaction that he had put his opinions upon record; for almost at the very moment he was delivering them, the wretched Ionians had been exposed to a new and needless visitation. The whole presented a scene of injustice and iniquity to which no parallel could be found under any British officer in any part of the world. A large portion of the most respectable inhabitants of Zante, indignant at the injuries their country suffered and at the treatment they received, drew up a petition to the king, which was signed by 32 names of rank and importance, and among them by Signor Georgio Rossi, a judge. It represented the hardships the petitioners and all the islanders sustained, prayed for a reform, and claimed of his majesty the free constitution and the benignant protection promised at the peace of Paris. What was the result? Signor Rossi and all the rest of the individuals who had signed the remonstrance were arrested, hurried to prison, and there confined, for affixing their names to what was termed a "seditious and rebellious petition." One object he (Mr. H.) had in view was, that if he failed in carrying his resolutions, he might induce the House to direct a copy of this document to be laid upon the table. Signor Rossi, the most respectable of the prisoners, however had the good fortune to make his escape and came to England to claim redress. If it were urged that the information which he (Mr. H.) possessed of many of these atrocious transactions was insufficient and defective, that circumstance could be very easily accounted for: every avenue by which intelligence could get beyond the islands was closely stopped; letters were opened and taken, and every channel by which truth could arrive was choked; but still all that he (Mr. H.) had brought forward, he should be able satisfactorily to establish. He then related, on the authority of Signor Rossi, the facts attending his escape, and subsequent arrival in this kingdom. He had been the only individual out of 32, who had been able to avoid the vigilance of their persecutors. He came to demand justice for the wrongs of his country; and having laid the particulars of his case before the secretary of state, he was answered on the 17th of July, 1821, that in his situation, no redress could be given; that he must go back to the islands, and put himself in the power of his oppressors, and that instructions had been sent out to the Ionian islands. At the time the 32 individuals were arrested, 50 other persons had put their names to another petition; the greater number of those were also subsequently confined; and Signor Rossi, obtaining information of the fact while in this country, again addressed earl Bathurst on the 17th September. The answer he obtained was, that "considering the situation in which he (Rossi) stood, lord Bathurst did not deem it proper to enter into any discussion with him." The deputation from Parga, after remaining here until they were almost unable to obtain subsistence, without obtaining redress of any kind, was at last obliged to return to those who had persecuted them. Signor Rossi, in the same way and for the same reason, had been obliged to leave this country and to go to Venice, where he found his countrymen flying from the gaolers of sir T. Maitland; and the only hope they now had was, that a revolution, like that of Greece, might some time or other restore them to their homes and to their estates. Subjected to the arbitrary and unjust conduct of sir Thomas Maitland in their own islands, justice was denied, the ear of mercy was closed against their prayers in England!

In what a deplorable situation, then, were the Ionian islands at this moment. The lord high commissioner had asserted that they were in a state of "peace and tranquillity." They were in peace and tranquillity; but it was such as Mr. Burke had described the plains of Arcot when oppression and death had emptied the abodes of man. The islands had been lately put under martial law; the whole population had been disarmed, an act inflicting the deepest disgrace, for to them to be without arms was a badge of slavery. What was the alleged cause of this most oppressive and unnatural state of things on the part of their protectors? Merely that the people had sympathized with their fellow countrymen in Greece: because they had felt as all men ought to feel in behalf of fellow christians, struggling to throw off the yoke of infidel Turks, they were declared under martial law, and had been deprived of their arms. He agreed with the noble marquis, that this country ought to preserve the strictest neutrality: it had always been too anxious to mix itself in the broils of other states; but what sort of neutrality had been observed towards the Greeks? It was notorious that the public authorities in the Ionian islands had done every thing to favour the Turks, and to impede the march of liberty. [Lord Londonderry asked across the table, how this assertion was proved?] He admitted that it was difficult to establish the fact: in the nature of things it must be so; but it was not to be disputed, that after a fight between a Turkish ship and two Greek vessels, the former made towards the shore of Zante to escape; the people assembled in large numbers, anxious that as the Greek ships had been refused assistance in Zante, no succour should be afforded to the Turkish ships—a conduct fair from neutrals—a military force was dispatched to the shore where the Turkish ship was, under pretence that it was necessary to guard against the communication of the plague. A dispute took place between the inhabitants and the soldiers; both parties fired, and lives were lost on both sides. Another circumstance would more distinctly show that neutrality had not been observed. At Patras resided the consuls of various nations, and among them, Mr. Green, the consul for England. While the Greeks were besieging the Turks in the citadel, they were most unfairly and improperly treated by Mr. Green; but instead of resorting to any more violent course against the envoy of a country they were so unwilling to offend, they entered a protest against his conduct, which was dated April 26, 1821, in which they charged him with being neutral only in words, and partial in deeds, employing spies against the Greeks, and giving information to the Turks, by which all the projects of the former were defeated. This instrument, a copy of which he had in his hands, was signed by the magistrates of Peloponnesus. After a knowledge of this fact, in addition to their own wrongs, was it surprising that the inhabitants of the Ionian islands should feel some degree of animosity against this government, and show a strong sympathy with the Greeks engaged in so arduous and so glorious a contest? a contest in which he hoped they would succeed, in spite of the disgraceful conduct of the British authorities in the Ionian islands [Hear!]. The examples that had been made by imprisonment, and the executions that had been the consequence of their manifesting that sympathy, might have been amply sufficient. Nevertheless, on the 12th of October last, martial law was proclaimed, and every means adopted to reduce the wretched and degraded islanders to what sir T. Maitland termed a state "of peace and tranquillity." This law, too, was extended to Cephalonia, Corfu, and Santa Maura, where not a man had attempted to contravene the orders of government, as was admitted by the lord high commissioner himself in his speech to the legislative body at Corfu. Great pains had been taken to circulate that speech in this country; and though it professed to be intended for the Ionian islands, it was very clearly meant to be read by the people of England. As a proof he might observe, that the legislative body were told by sir T. Maitland (a piece of information certainly not very new to them) that Santa Maura was separated from the continent only by a narrow channel. [Hear!]—a piece of information, somewhat similar to what would have been the case in this House, if the king should inform us, that London bridge connected the city and the Borough of Southwark. Besides, it involved an obvious contradiction, for the governor issued a proclamation against clandestine departures from the islands; yet in his speech he stated, as a reason for disarming the population, that they had left the islands in bands, and in the open day, in defiance of the public authorities. It was admitted, that banditti came over from the continent to Santa Maura, and plundered the inhabitants, and yet sir T. Maitland had deprived the people of their arms, that they might be unable to defend themselves and their property from such banditti [Hear, hear!]. There were strong internal marks in this document, that it was fabricated for publication here; but it bore no marks of having been manufactured by an artist of even ordinary skill. Much had been said of neutrality, and great pains had been taken to prevent any arms or military stores being sent to the Greeks. But gunpowder to the amount of 52,000lb. and 15,000 shot had been, in 1820, sold to Ali Pacha out of the public stores, at Corfu and its delivery superintended by a British officer, in the month of May in that year. It was true that these stores had been taken from the French, but at the time to which he was referring they were under our control, and were disposed of in the manner he had described, by the agency of Mr. Johnson, a merchant. Did this indicate a sincere disposition to preserve neutrality? [Hear!]. The prohibition by proclamation in the supply of arms, although made equally against the Turks, he considered as in point of fact only another breach of the neutrality; for how could they expect that any assistance could be sent by the Greeks from those islands to the Turks? Sir T. Maitland, on his return, had conducted himself towards the bishop of Cephalonia and several ministers of that church, with the most unjustifiable harshness and oppression, on no pretext but that of their having offered up prayers for the success of the Greek arms. This had been done in Switzerland; and surely it was not surprising that amongst the inhabitants of the Ionian islands, a people of the same religious persuasion as the Greeks, a form of this kind should be adopted. Such, however, was the temper manifested by the lord high commissioner, that he issued a proclamation, in which it was declared, "that as the Turks were our friends, it was abhorrent to all the feelings and principles of a good subject to pray for their adversaries." The bishop of Cephalonia was seized and conveyed to Corfu; he was afterwards removed to Italy, where he now continued an exile and a wanderer in poverty and want [Hear, hear!]. He (Mr. H.) knew not what could be urged in exculpation of so cruel and unreasonable a proceeding; but he must say, that it appeared to him to fill up to the brim the measure of that despotism and oppression, which should, in his judgment, have heretofore disposed his majesty's ministers to investigate the conduct of sir T. Maitland. No real inquiry was, perhaps, ever likely to take place, whilst the lord high commissioner retained all his present authority; and therefore it was that he should have considered himself warranted in at once moving for his recall. So long as sir T. Maitland continued in the exercise of all his powers, very few individuals would have the boldness to step forward and offer their evidence to criminate him. Since, however, many of his (Mr. Hume's) friends were of opinion, that the more fair and regular course would be to move in the first instance for an inquiry, he had yielded to their recommendations. Had this inquiry been allowed during the last session, how many melancholy scenes might have been prevented, and how much of that obloquy now cast upon the British name might have been avoided! If the treaty by which those islands were placed under British protection had been attended to, and a free constitution given to them, much disgrace which we have suffered, would have been avoided; the people would have been happy, and an annual expenditure of 150,000*l.* would, in all probability, have been spared to England. Surely these were sums too extravagant to be paid for the reprehension and indignities to which we had been subjected by our administration in those unfortunate islands.—He had to apologize to the House for the length at which he had trespassed on its attention in the discussion of this interesting subject. Without doubt he had been led to express his feelings strongly, but he hoped not offensively; his decided conviction certainly still being, that unless his majesty's ministers would go into the investigation, there was no security against a recurrence of evils as grievous and deplorable as those which he had endeavoured to lay before them [Hear!]. He should now submit his resolutions, the first and second of which were only declaratory of certain facts that were, he believed, unquestionable: the 3rd and 4th were recommendatory of the best means of saving expense to this country, and of ascertaining the truth to be enabled to do justice to the Ionians, as we were bound to do. The resolutions were as follow:

1. "That it appears by documents upon the table of this House, that the Ionian Islands were, by a treaty signed at Paris on the 5th November 1815, between the courts of Vienna, St. Petersburgh, London, and Berlin, declared 'to be a single, free, and independent state,' and were placed under the immediate and exclusive protection of the king of Great Britain; and that, by article 6 of the said treaty, 'his Britannic majesty consents that a particular convention with the government of the said United states shall settle, according to the state revenues, all matters relative to the maintenance of the fortresses now existing, as well as to the support and pay of the British garrisons, and to the number of men who are to compose them in time of peace. The said convention shall also establish the relations which are to take place between the armed force and the Ionian government.' That by article 12, of the 2nd section of the 7th chapter of the constitutional chart of the United states of the Ionian Islands, agreed to by the legislative assembly on the 2nd May, 1817, and sanctioned by his majesty the king of Great Britain, it is settled, 'that all expense of quartering the regular troops of his majesty, the protecting sovereign, and generally speaking, all military expense of every kind to be incurred by the states (as far as relates to the 3,000 men therein named) shall be paid out of the general treasury of the same.'

2. "That it appears by returns on the table of this House, that the expenditure of Great Britain for the military establishments in the Ionian Islands, amounted to the sum of 145,023*l.* in the year 1817; and to 120,045*l.* in 1818, exclusive of the expense for transports, relief of troops, passage money, and other charges, which have not been laid before the House.

3. "That it is expedient, in the present state of the finances of the United kingdom, that the military expense incurred for the Ionian Islands, should be paid from the revenues of those Islands, and regulated agreeably to the stipulations of the treaty of Paris, 5th November 1815, and the convention of the United Ionian states, agreed to on the 2nd May, 1817, and sanctioned by his majesty.

4. "That an humble address be presented to his majesty, that he would be graciously pleased to direct an inquiry into the state of the government of the Ionian Islands, the causes of the general disaffection, and of the numerous arrests and banishments which have taken place there, and for what reasons the inhabitants were disarmed, and martial law proclaimed."

Mr. Wilmot said, it would not be necessary for him to go over the whole ground traversed by the hon. member, inasmuch as his speech, or at least the greater part of it, occupying a space of nearly two hours, consisted in a discussion of topics, verbatim et seriatim, the same as he had brought forward in the course of the last session. The House had then rejected the hon. gentleman's proposition by a majority of 97 and 27; and it could not, therefore, be requisite for him to extend his reply on this occasion, or to animadvert on so many points as he should otherwise have thought it his duty to refer to. The first material difference between the hon. gentleman and himself regarded the construction of the article in the treaty of Paris, by which the Ionian Islands were bound to pay the whole expense attending both their civil government and the military force which it should be necessary to maintain. His interpretation of this article did not lead to the same inference, and he was prepared to contend that the article had been fully complied with. As far as the people of those islands were competent to defray the charges of their own government and security, they had been called upon to contribute to that object. This observation applied to the military as well as civil expenditure; the whole of the latter having been uniformly borne by them. But if it was found expedient to introduce British garrisons (and by another article this emergency was contemplated, 3,000 men being stated as the maximum), it was then to be considered how far the islands were competent to support an additional burthen of this nature. It might not be improper here to advert to the condition of those islands when they came for the first time under our protection. The hon. gentleman had referred to their situation before that period; but he hardly meant to argue, that whilst they were under the Venetian government they enjoyed more practical liberty than they did at the present moment. The dominion of France had certainly not been more favourable to their interests, than it was generally to the safety or happiness of the colonies belonging to that power, or of states placed under similar circumstances. With respect to Russia, it could not be maintained that there was the slightest analogy between the treatment which the inhabitants experienced under her control, and the rights which they enjoyed under the existing constitution. The system introduced by the Russian government in 1803, though called free, had been generally pronounced to be wholly unfit for the wants and character of the people. A different one was consequently established in 1806, and remained till the treaty of Tilsit restored all the islands to France. Such being the case, the House would not be surprised to learn, that when sir T. Maitland arrived among them in 1816, he found the senate to be a mere formula, without power or competency; and that the constitution, so far from being in action, must be entirely re-organized under the auspices of a protecting power. Instead of presenting a mortifying contrast to all good government, a great variety of abuses had been corrected and a very material improvement effected in the general administration, as soon as sir T. Maitland had taken the authority into his own hands. The civil expenses had indisputably been increased, but without imposing any additional burthens of taxation; for he must apprise the House, that if a new duty had been levied on the export of oil, it was in commutation for eleven other taxes which had been found infinitely more grievous. The hon. gentleman had complained that the expence of the civil government had been raised in 1819 from 98,000 to 221,000 dollars. Now, although this statement should be perfectly accurate, yet he would defy the hon. gentleman to prove that the islanders paid more now in taxes, than they had been accustomed to pay when the acknowledged public expenditure was so much less. The fact was, that public money was formerly intercepted and misapplied, in a mode that could not be adopted under the improved regulations now subsisting. Public service was now remunerated in the ordinary way, and adequate salaries were attached to the various offices into which the machinery of government was divided. All this was clearly explained by sir T. Maitland himself, in his speech to the assembly, in 1820; but the hon. gentleman was disposed to view with an unfavourable eye every part of that officer's conduct. Yet the truth was, that with very few exceptions, and those easily accounted for, there never was less discontent amongst the inhabitants than under his administration. It might not, however, have been precisely the same case, if we had, as the hon. gentleman seemed to advise, pressed our sovereignty upon them, and compelled them to raise larger funds than were deemed suitable to their means or resources. In point of fact, we had no valid claim for more than we had received; and no honourable member would blame the practice which had been introduced, of annexing salaries to official appointments. With regard to the charge made by sir T. Maitland for passage money, it was impossible for him (Mr. W.), until he had further information, to explain all the particulars that might have compelled sir T. Maitland to pass frequently from island to island. He could, however, state, that no such charge would again occur, as a vessel was now building for the purpose of conveying him in future on such occasions. The hon. member should not have presumed, without further information, that the addresses presented to sir T. Maitland were at all expressive of any disappointment in the people, and that they had ceased to afford any tokens of their satisfaction. As to the freedom which they enjoyed, he must remind the hon. gentleman, that the constitutional charter of France was not framed at once, or by the whole people, but on a deliberate reference to their wants and situation. The charter granted to the Ionian islands was not supposed to contain the exact portion of civil liberty which they were qualified to enjoy; but such a degree of it as might lay the basis of progressively superadding whatever might be found secure and desirable. It had received the sanction of that House without discussion; and if unsuitable to its purpose, that House must share the blame, and the hon. gentleman had grossly vilified it in vilifying the plan which had been drawn for securing the rights and privileges of these islanders. The latter, indeed, were much better pleased with the British government than they had been represented, and felt relieved from various oppressive burthens, since their transfer to our protection. The hon. member had given a strong instance of his prejudice, in dwelling on the supposed subserviency and adulation in certain testimonies of respect offered to him by some persons, as if they were necessarily agreeable to sir T. Maitland, who had interfered to prevent the erection of a statue, but who could not answer for the various modes which different people had of testifying their loyalty or respect. As to the orders of St. Michael and St. John, he believed they were nearly the same as those instituted by the Russian government. With regard to the form of election, it had been improved by the adoption of a double list; and as the Russians had introduced the ballot, the numbers were also now turned up before the people, to whom both the changes were agreeable. The hon. member next came to the transactions at Santa Maura, which had already been so fully discussed before the House, that he deemed it unnecessary to go into them minutely again. The hon. member asserted, that the circumstance alleged by government as the cause of the disturbance there, was not the true one; and he asked on what authority the statement of government was founded? He would answer, that it was founded on the representation of those who had investigated the subject; and he could conceive no reason why the information of the hon. member should be better than that of the government. The fact was, that when an attempt was made to embody the militia, it was supposed that it was intended to send them to another climate, to act in the service of this country. It was this misapprehension which created the disturbance, and not the improper exaction of local taxes. With respect to the case of Valerio Lerico, the hon. member was entirely mistaken. That individual was dismissed for positive malversation and disobedience of orders. After a rigid inquiry into the conduct of that individual, he was found unworthy of office, and he was dismissed.—They next approached the question of the church establishment. And here the hon. member should recollect, that the law of which he complained was passed in the absence of sir Thomas Maitland, and in the time of sir F. Adam. It was received by the people as a boon and a blessing; and the peasantry expressed a very great wish to have it enforced. They were anxious that the property to which it related should be appropriated to the use for which it was originally intended; and, with this view, that it should be taken out of the hands of private individuals, who dealt with it in an improper manner. There were, therefore, circumstances connected with the machinery of this bill, which fully justified it. On this point, the hon. gentleman adduced no cases except that of Alessandro Battaglia. Now, in that instance, he could not see that any principle of justice had been violated. He knew of no circumstance which could have led the hon. member to think that the person alluded to had been unfairly treated. At all events, he had the satisfaction of knowing, that no such feeling existed in the mind of the person whose case had been quoted. He, as appeared from his own letter, was perfectly satisfied with the treatment he had received. In a letter dated Corfu, March 23, and addressed by Battaglia to sir T. Maitland, he found, instead of expressions of disapprobation, nothing but the warmest acknowledgments of gratitude. The letter ran thus:—"I have received, with the profoundest gratitude, the favour which your excellency has condescended to show, and my feelings, which are overpowered, prompt me to say much, but their violence prevents me. I feel for your excellency the deepest impression of esteem and affection, heightened by gratitude. I feel that delightful sentiment to its fullest extent. Will your lordship receive the testimony of my humble respect, and that of my family, whose ardent prayer is, that Heaven may bless you the longest day you live." [A laugh] Whatever laughter this letter might excite, it was quite clear that this particular case could not be one which justified the interpretation put upon it by the hon. member. He called on the hon. member to adduce other instances; and he denied, in the outset, that any oppressive acts had been committed under the law in question. The hon. member might have cited various cases where the individuals affected by the law complained of its operation; but it did not, therefore, follow, that they had been unjustly treated. There was one case in which property that had been leased for three generations was affected; and, naturally enough, the parties who had been so long in possession thought it extremely hard that the property should go back to the family by which it was originally held. But, hard as it might appear the hon. member could not argue, that the property did not legally belong to the family of the grantors. The law was passed for the purpose of rescuing, for the use of the church, and for no other reason, grants and emoluments which were unjustly intercepted; and the measure, though perhaps it might be faulty in its details, was not unacceptable to the population of those islands.—With respect to the confusion at Zante, which the hon. gentleman attributed to an attack on the church property, his statement had, he knew, created a very strong impression on the minds of many individuals, particularly with reference to the case of Martinengo. But how did that case stand; and of what injustice could the individual complain? One of the first acts of the legislative assembly of the islands was, to place the crime of high treason under the immediate cognizance of the head of the high police. As sir T. Maitland stood in that situation, he was armed with power over that offence. And how did he act? He did that which every man must admit was most just—he remitted the case to a proper tribunal. The individual was found guilty; and, if the punishment to which he was sentenced wounded the feelings of gentlemen, it must give them pleasure to know, that that punishment was commuted. The hon. member alluded to the case of Flambunari and Rossi, one of whom had been deprived of his employment, and the other punished in a different manner, because they drew up a petition, which was meant to be forwarded to this country. The fact was, they had acted illegally. By the charter it was provided that petitions should be sent to England through the high commissioner. The hon. member, in touching on this point, had not read the whole of the petition in question. That petition was illegal, as it had not been handed over to the high commissioner, to be by him examined, and then sent to the mother country. That petition stated, that the constitutional charter was a disgrace to those who composed it —that it was the device of those who wished to place all the power in the hands of one, and thus reduce the government to a despotism. It was therefore disrespectful to the legislative assembly, insulting to the high commissioner, and no less insulting to the sovereign of this country, who had confirmed the national charter. These circumstances were all to be weighed, together with other practices of the parties so petitioning. Was there not every reason to suppose, from the very nature of the petition, that it was not intended to be transmitted to the lord high commissioner, or to the king? Was it not pretty clear, that it was meant for treasonable purposes? It was on these grounds, that steps were taken against the parties. It was impossible to argue the case with analogy to petitions in this country. Situated as those islands were, it was necessary to be guided, in a very considerable degree, by a reference to the practices of those by whom the petition was drawn up. During the whole of this proceeding, the hon. member had reasoned the question on the analogy between this country and the Ionian islands, which, he conceived, was very unfair; because no person could contend, that the people in those islands had the same proportion of liberty which the people of England enjoyed. Making allowance for this, the conduct of sir T. Maitland was, in this instance, very different from what the hon. member represented it to be.—The hon. member, in the next place, had earnestly called the attention of the House to the manner in which the people in those islands had been treated since last he introduced the subject. He complained, that martial law had been proclaimed, and that the people had been deprived of their arms. Now, it should be observed, that martial law was the permanent condition of those islanders, until sir T. Maitland took the command. With respect to the people being deprived of their arms without any justification of the act, the statement of the hon. member was not accurate. There were strong concurrent circumstances, which placed the policy of that measure beyond doubt, and no cruelty was exercised towards those who were subjected to its operation. He would ask the hon. member, did the people of those islands feel themselves disgraced by this measure? The British troops were not numerous, they were scattered in various directions, and there were 50,000 of the inhabitants in arms. Now, if the measure were viewed with a hostile feeling, how did it happen that, under these circumstances, it was carried into effect without any thing being done, which approached, in the slightest degree, to opposition or violence? Under martial law, he might be permitted to observe, no punishment, except whipping, had been inflicted; and that, in the case of only one individual, who had been sentenced to receive fifty lashes. With respect to what had occurred at Patras, it was sufficient to observe, that it could not be permitted to the inhabitants of those islands to proceed there, and adopt a line of conduct which British subjects would not be suffered to pursue. Mr. Philip Green, the consul at that place, had intended to prosecute certain persons for a misrepresentation of his conduct; but, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, it was found impossible to carry on the prosecution. He had, however, published a formal disclaimer of all that had been alleged against him. [Here Mr. Wilmot read an extract from the Moniteur]. This was an authorized extract from a French paper; and, if the hon. member asked him the question, he would say that it was sanctioned by Mr. Green himself; it answered the charges that had been alleged against him, and contained a formal disclaimer of the atrocious conduct which had been attributed to him at Patras. The more they considered the state of feeling in that country, the more they ought to hesitate before they gave implicit confidence to any report, when they knew that passion was so strong, and feeling was so weak.—The hon. member, in the next place, alluded to the affair that had occurred at Zante, where, he stated, a Greek brig was stranded, and when a part of the crew attempted to land, they were fired on by the soldiers. Now, this was not the case. The soldiers of the island came down to enforce the existing law, and were resisted. They surrounded the party who had landed, and fired two shots over their heads. The person in command of the Greek party caused his force to fire: a cry of murder was immediately heard, and it was found that an officer was killed, With respect to the state of the islands. the last dispatches declared them to be perfectly tranquil; and at that time martial law was about to be removed. This was directly contrary to the description which the hon. member had given of their present situation. As to the feeling in favour of the Greeks, which those people had manifested, it was not at all wonderful. It was not surprising that such a sympathy should exist between those who had one common origin. Indeed, no man who possessed the slightest sensibility could avoid deploring the sufferings which the Greeks endured under the Turkish government. And if there were any thing to diminish, and lower, and dilute their sympathies on this subject, it was to be found in the atrocities that characterized the present warfare. He therefore did not understand the propriety of entertaining an extreme sympathy on this question; and, as sir T. Maitland was directed to hold an attitude of the strictest neutrality, and to exert his best efforts for the preservation of tranquillity, he did not think that gallant officer was blameable in issuing a proclamation, declaring that the property of those who left the island to join the Greeks, and who thus broke the neutrality, should be confiscated. Under all the circumstances, he had great pleasure in stating, that the islands were in a much better situation now than they had been. Their revenue was advancing, their institutions were improving, and year after year their habits were becoming more congenial to the progress of rational liberty. From the improvement in their revenue, it could not be doubted that they would, hereafter, be enabled to defray the expense of the troops which the protecting nation supplied.—There were one or two other points connected with this question, to which he felt it necessary to allude. In the first place, he could not avoid noticing the anxiety which had been manifested by the public press to prejudge this question. The most unfounded and monstrous calumnies had been propagated in the newspaper on this subject. Since January last the most deliberate falsehoods had been constantly asserted in the public papers relative to the government of the Ionian Islands, and some of them had appeared so lately as yesterday. He called the attention of the House particularly to this point, because he wished to show how unfairly the government of those islands had been attacked. An accusation was made in the public papers, that by paying 15 per cent government might take possession of the property of any person trading to those islands. What was the fact? An ad valorem duty was established in the islands, as was the case in England and America; and the whole process was this: if the person importing an article would not pay the ad valorem duty, he was offered 115*l.* for goods which he declared to be worth 100*l.* The reason for this practice was, to prevent fraud on the revenue. If the value set down by the importer was satisfactory, the offer was not made; and if it were not satisfactory, he was not forced to accept the offer, and thus no possible injury could be done. Sir T. Maitland had also been censured for introducing a monopoly of corn. The fact was, that sir T. Maitland had, at one time, removed the monopoly, and he did not renew it until an absolute scarcity prevailed (there being corn sufficient only for a very few days on the islands), which rendered the renewal absolutely necessary. He mentioned these things to show, that there was scarcely a point in the civil government of those islands that had not been made the object of deliberate attack; and no pains had beeen spared in overstating, overcharging, and falsely colouring, all the acts which that government had performed. He, however, was persuaded, that the more the subject was sifted, the more praiseworthy would appear the course of policy that had been adopted. It must not, however, be taken abstractedly: it must be coupled and connected with a view of the circumstances of the time, and more particularly with reference to the situation of the adjoining country. If the hon. member would look to the date of the alleged transaction, relative to a sale of gunpowder with Ali-Pacha, who was not friendly to the Turks, at least latterly, he would find, that his information was wrong. That sir T. Maitland had maintained the strictest neutrality, was evident from this circumstance, that his conduct drew forth remonstrances and complaints both from the Turks and Greeks. The information which he had given would enable the House to decide whether the measures adopted in the Ionian Islands were measures of aggression, or whether they were not thoroughly justified, and the most humane which could, under the circumstances, have been devised. He felt great responsibility attach to himself on this occasion, and regretted that he had not been prepared to do more justice to the question. Upon the whole view of the subject, he thought the motion unnecessary; and when the House considered all the circumstances, he hoped they would consider the measures now enforced as merely continued, and not introduced by the present government. He would therefore move the previous question on the two first resolutions, which were only assertions; and he trusted the House would agree with him in giving a decided negative to the remainder.

Mr. John Williams considered the present question most important as it affected the prosperity of the islands, but more important as it involved the national honour. There was some inconsistency in the argument of the hon. under-secretary. He had charged his hon. friend with having traversed a beaten track—with having furnished no new ground for his motion; and yet the hon. gentleman in the conclusion of his speech had, strange to say, expatiated on the predicament in which he was placed by being brought to the discussion of the subject by surprise. In what manner were these contradictory declarations to be reconciled? But though the hon. gentleman, in a speech of no short duration, had expatiated on many subjects rather inapplicable to the question, he had left the main body of the subject wholly unanswered. Neither on the gross amount of the expenditure incurred in the Ionian Islands, nor on the details of the civil government, the staff, &c. had the hon. gentleman condescended to give any thing in the shape of an answer. The question, then, of expenditure, remained, as stated by his hon. friend, untouched and unshaken. The hon. gentleman had, indeed, given an interpretation to the charter, which its provisions would not bear. These provisions particularly specified, that the whole military expenditure of these islands should be borne by the insular treasury to the amount of 3,000 men; but that the commander-in-chief was, on the existence of a competent necessity, authorized to increase the amount of military force. That arrangement was, however, followed up by another provision, which specified, that the whole military expense should be defrayed out of the general treasury of the island. It was, then, upon the policy pursued at home, as well as in the islands, that his hon. friend rested his position. He complained, and he complained justly, of the expense which was entailed upon this country in opposition to the provisions of the charter, and continued at a time when the extent of the national distresses required every alleviation. But then the hon. gentleman had asked, under what new pressure did the Ionian Islands labour, to render necessary a renewed discussion? The only object of such questions was, to withdraw the House from the immediate subject before it, to a distant consideration of topics altogether immaterial. Of that character was what had fallen from the hon. gentleman relative to the ecclesiastical arrangements of the islands, the regulations of abbeys and abbesses, when under the control of a gallant military officer. He did not know the peculiar state of the religious impressions of the inhabitants of these islands; but, constituted as human nature was, he must still believe that they must have contemplated with dismay an arrangement, which, if not shocking to their piety, was at least so to their prejudices, and in consequence of which the control over their religion was transferred to a military foreigner, who, however distinguished for feats of arms, had, at least, acquired no honours in the science of divinity. But the hon. gentleman had tauntingly asked, where were the proofs of discontent and disaffection in these islands? Where were the remonstrances? He knew well that on the very character of the oppression practised these rested. There were no remonstrances—there were no fresh complaints, because none dare to complain. Even that consolation to misfortune was denied. Here was a gratuitous assumption to solve the difficulty—the very assumption constituting, as it did, the ground of complaint. Instead of meeting the charge with a refutation, or if undeniable, with a candid admission, the whole of the answer of the hon. gentleman was a petitio principii, from beginning to end. But, when the hon. gentleman asked, what new measures had arisen, what peculiar exigency had called now for the discussion, he would answer—many. The hon. gentleman had said, that until the golden era of the arrival of the gallant British general, the Greeks of these islands, notwithstanding their name and parentage, were wholly incapable of enjoying rational liberty: they were, forsooth, so used to military law, that military law was no grievance—they might be skinned, because they had been skinned so frequently before. Martial law had no horrors—it was exercised in a most tolerant manner, as only 50 lashes were inflicted! But the hon. member held forth a speedy relief. There was now a chance of that great boon of British protection to the Ionians, namely the expectancy of a reversionary freedom. Martial law was to cease. Why had it ever been inflicted? It was inflicted, because the Ionians, recollecting the country from which they sprung, and the people with whom they were allied, had felt an interest in that glorious struggle, which their brethren were supporting against their infidel oppressor. It was the unwelcome, the reluctant duty of the gallant Englishman who garrisoned those islands, to be the gaolers of those freemen—freemen he could not call them, but men struggling to be free. Was that no novel effect since the last discussion? Was it no matter of complaint, that England was inflicting martial law on her Ionian protegées, because those protegées naturally connected themselves with the struggles of their Christian countrymen, against the Turks, the infidels of Europe? Was such a policy no new ground for renewing discussion, and repeating our regrets at the lamentable change in our character?

" Pudet hæc opprobria nobis,
" Et dici potuisse; et non potuisse refelli."

Who would have supposed, from our ancient history, that the freemen of England were destined for the avocation of repressing the liberties of struggling nations. Finding that the first statement was admitted, and that no refutation was given to the second, he, with all his heart, gave his support to the motion of his hon. friend.

The previous question, "That the question be now put," was then put and negatived on the two first resolutions. The third resolution was negatived. On the fourth, the House divided: Ayes, 67; Noes, 152.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, May 15.

TITHES ON POTATOES IN IRELAND.] Mr. S. Cooper presented a petition from the high sheriff and land proprietors of Sligo, complaining of a claim recently set up in the county of Connaught to tithe upon potatoes; no such claim having ever before been asserted in that quarter of Ireland. The calamity of which it complained was likely to be a terrible one; and all parties were interested in alleviating it, if possible. A great portion of the disturbances in Ireland might be traced to the imposition of a tithe upon the potatoe; and the attempt to introduce that system into a province not yet afflicted with it, would extend that which now was a partial state of tumult, over the entire face of the country. The dispute, out of which the present petition arose, would have been amicably settled, if the bishop had not set his face against it.

Mr. Abercromby thought that the subject must recommend itself to every man of feeling and humanity. He believed that the assertion of the claim complained of would be likely to extend the evil now operating in the south of Ireland. He trusted that the House would refuse to sanction the tithe now asserted, unless compelled to do so by the irresistible force of law; and, if the claim was really founded in law, he hoped that government would instantly interpose between the clergy and the petitioners. The Irish peasant, paying 6*l.* or 7*l.* for his acre of potatoe-land, derived already very slender return for the labour which he bestowed upon it. He was compelled, at any rent, to have the land, for his very means of existence were to come out of it. Neither wisdom, perhaps, nor providence, was the distinguishing feature of his character; but persons more wise, more careful, and more provident, might find themselves embarrassed, when compelled for very life to endure extortion. It was upon his potatoe-garden that the Irish peasant depended absolutely for food. The raiment, wretched as it was, which he bestowed upon himself and upon his family, used to come out of the wheat; but, in the present state of the provision market, that resource was annihilated. The hon. gentleman then adverted to some proceedings which had taken place under the insurrection act of Ireland. In the county of Cork, a boy had been tried for resisting a driving for tithes; when the lad was aware that, at the very moment of seizure, his master was gone to meet the clergyman at the market-town. That same clergyman, in the course of 15 years, had issued no less than 6,000 processes to enforce payment of his tithes. He did not state those facts with any view to prejudice the clergy, but merely for the information of the House.

Sir J. Newport looked upon the potatoe-tithe as a dreadful scourge, and firmly believed that those who attempted to inforce it, would have to combat tumult and insurrection. The demand of that tithe was accompanied with circumstances unlike those attending the exaction of any other. The potatoe was the daily food of the peasant. Very early in the season he was frequently compelled to resort to it for subsistence. But, if he took only a part of his early potatoes for the daily sustenance of himself and his family, that taking was in law held a severance, and he was that moment at the mercy of the clergyman or of the lay impropriator. If the House could imagine one half the calamities which the demand of this tithe would cast upon a part of Ireland not yet afflicted by it, it could not for a moment hesitate to interfere. Let compensation, if necessary, be made for the claim; but let it be abandoned, never to be revived. He had no terms to express his abhorrence of that man's conduct who could introduce it.

Mr. Goulburn rose to explain some circumstances connected with this petition. He would say nothing as to the general discretion of urging the claim of potatoe tithe at the present moment in the province of Connaught; but much might be said in palliation and in justification of the individual whose act had given rise to the petition. The facts of the case were these. A gentleman in the county of Sligo, who for some years worked a farm of 200 acres, having other lands in the same parish occupied by under tenants, agreed with the clergyman to pay a compensation of 8*l.* or 10*l.* per annum for the tithes of wool and lambs. In the course of years, this gentleman, thinking it advisable to take a larger portion of his land into his own hands, increased his own farm from 200 acres to 1,000; but he still declared that he would only pay the clergyman the 8*l.* or 10*l.* annually for the wool and lambs. All appeal to the gentleman's candour proving vain, the clergyman was compelled to institute a suit for the recovery of his right; and, very unfortunately, he was advised by his counsel to include the claim for potatoe-tithe for one special purpose; namely, to reimburse himself in the costs to which he would be subjected by process at law, even if his suit were successful. Such a proceeding had naturally excited some alarm; but he appealed to the House whether the clergyman was to blame. The cause, however, did not go at once to issue. The gentleman finding that his refusal was not tenable, offered to pay the wool and lamb tithe. But then, the clergyman naturally said—"I am entitled to the costs you have put me to; give me my costs, I will give up my suit, and I ask no more." The clergyman's claim for costs had been resisted, and therefore the suit for the potatoes continued. Now, if the clergyman had been indiscreet in enforcing such a demand, he had been driven to the measure by the fault of his opponent. But he (Mr. G.) denied that the bishop had in any way recommended the enforcement of the claim. He stated, upon the authority of the bishop himself, that he had been no party either to the institution or to the continuance of the suit. He understood that a negotiation for amicable arrangement was going on between the parties; and he wished to avoid any observations by which the existing differences might be inflamed. Because a clergyman instituted a variety of suits, it did not therefore follow that he should be chargeable with a litigious spirit. Every man who knew the state of Ireland, knew the difficulty which existed in getting tithes at all. The land was generally let at a rent exceeding its value. The leases were so framed with clauses for duties performed and articles furnished, that the landlord had the first opportunity of claiming his due. Then came the clergyman after the land was stripped, to lose his right altogether, or to take process at law as the last hope of obtaining it.

Mr. Hume said, that at the request of the right hon. gentleman, he had postponed his motion respecting Irish tithes. He feared, however, that if the matter was left to the gentlemen opposite, the session would pass over without any thing being done in it; and he therefore gave notice that, in the first week of June, he would himself bring the subject fairly before the House.

Mr. Spring Rice said, that this was a petition, not from one individual but from the county of Sligo, complaining of the existence of a suit at law tending to establish in that part of Ireland, the potatoe-tithe system, which did not before exist there. From the statement of both sides of the House, they learned that there was a practice in Ireland, of taxing the material article of potatoes betwixt the hand and the lip; that the tithe proctor interposed betwixt the hand and lip of the grower and consumer. They had also learnt that this practice was not universal in that country, and it remained for the House to determine whether it would allow so odious a system to be spread throughout the whole of Ireland. It was not from remissness that himself and his hon. friends had omitted to call the attention of the House to this important subject; but, in fact, they had been waiting in daily expectation of hearing ministers come forward with some proposition on the subject. He assured them that he would rather that the tithe for potatoes was inflicted on the Protestant landlord than on the Catholic population.

Mr. Denis Browne thought, that the House must see the necessity of relieving the petitioners. If nothing were done by the legislature on the subject of this petition, he would himself renew the question in some shape or another.

Mr. Goulburn said, he had a measure to submit to the House on the subject of the Irish tithe system, which he hoped to be able to bring forward in time to anticipate the motion of the hon. member for Aberdeen.

Mr. Plunkett said, he should deal uncandidly with the House, if he did not take that opportunity of stating, that after all the reflexion which he had given this question, he was unable to see his way clearly through all the difficulties which surrounded the subject. With respect to this tithe on potatoes, what might be the rights of the clergy to it in some districts, and not in others—how to distinguish the one from the other—appeared to him to be no easy task. On the subject of the commutation which had been talked of, he could not see how it could be entertained without infringing upon the general rights of property. If the property of the clergy could be so regulated, why not that of the landlords? Whether any particular remedies could be devised to meet particular evils, he was most anxious to discover; at all events, he thought the House must feel how unsuitable it was, on the presentation of a petition, to embark in a discussion so large and so important. Whether any thing could or could not be done to remedy the evil, was a question well worth their attention; but it was one which ought to be approached with the greatest caution, and legislated upon in the total absence of all angry and vindictive feeling. With respect to the potatoe-tithe to which an hon. gentleman meant to call the attention of the House, he would only ask whether the hon. gentleman had made up his mind to extend that tithe generally under some modifications, in the parts where it was not claimed before, or whether his object was to abolish the claim altogether? It had been said, that the pressure upon the Irish peasantry, had not arisen from a demand for heavy rents, but from tithes. Now there, again, he should not deal fairly with the House, if he did not declare his opinion, that much of the evil arose from the heavy exaction of rent, and not of tithes. If the landlords of Ireland were not prepared to lower their rents, in vain would any relief be sought through a commutation of tithes. The situation of the clergy was in many places peculiarly distressing in Ireland. After the landlord had levied every thing for his rent, the clergyman came in to deal with an insolvent tenant, and had either to give up his claim, or proceed in a hostile manner for his payment.

Sir N. Colthurst hoped, that the great question of tithes in Ireland would be submitted to the consideration of parliament. Of one thing he was convinced, namely, that the landlords of Ireland would be found ready to co-operate in any measure which should appear calculated to relieve the people.

Mr. Dawson said, that whenever the question of tithes came under the consideration of parliament, it would be found that the clergy had acted with the greatest forbearance and moderation; and, that much of the misery complained of was attributable to the rapacity of landlords.

Mr. Becher said, that this description did not apply to the character of the landlords in the south of Ireland. He knew them to be as ready as any set of men could be, to reduce their claims to meet the necessities of the times. He did not complain of the clergy; for they never received their tenth. It was the acts of the tithe-proctor that inflicted oppression upon the people; and the sooner the House investigated the whole question the better. The people of England were not generally aware of the arduous duties which were thrown on the Irish landlords. They were obliged, in their capacity of magistrates, to act the part of police officers for the maintenance of tranquillity; and he knew them in many instances to forego their rents altogether. In the district with which he was immediately connected, the conduct of both clergy and landlords was exemplary.

Sir H. Parnell denied, that the distress was imputable to the exaction of the Irish landlords. He would undertake to say, when the compact between the landlord and tenant was fully investigated, that his right hon. friend's observation would be utterly disproved.

Col. Trench said, he had heard with regret, that the attorney-general for Ireland, was not prepared to propose such a commutation of tithes as would sustain the just rights of the church, and effect the general tranquillity of the country.

Mr. Martin, of Galway, said, he could see no excuse for any clergyman who exacted his tithe in the manner mentioned in the petition. This tithe on potatoe-ground was a great hardship, and the claim was new. The tenant in his bargain with his landlord could always calculate upon the other tithes, and consider them in his terms; but he could not guard against the potatoe-tithe; for of the existence of such a claim he was unapprised when he made his bargain. Certainly there ought to be no tithe on potatoes, where such a claim was not pre-existing.

Colonel Butler defended the Irish landlords, and maintained that they did not deserve the imputations which had been cast upon them. Many of them did not get a shilling in rent.

Mr. Curteis said, that if a relaxation in tithes was adopted in Ireland, he must put in the claim of the people of England for an extension of the same indulgence, seeing that they wanted it quite as much.

Mr. Grattan denied, that there was any similarity whatever in the condition of the peasantry of the two countries, and protested against the doctrine, that the clergy of Ireland were poor, and the landlords extortioners. On the contrary, the clergy were very rich; and the landlords were every year losing a large share of their property. The collection of tithes was in Ireland the never-ending source of conflict; and the sooner the subject was considered the better. The tithe on potatoes ought unquestionably to be done away with.

Mr. Hutchinson also denied, that there was any similarity, as to the question of tithes, between England and Ireland. He had visited different countries, in and out of Europe: he had often seen distressed and oppressed communities; but, in the course of his life, he had never seen any thing half so deplorable, as the distress that now existed in the southern and western parts of Ireland. One grievance was the tithe question; and there were thousands of poor Irish who each held an acre or half an acre in potatoes, and were liable to this intolerable tax. A peasant, with a wife and six children, even if employed every working day in the year, could only hope to obtain potatoes and water for his family—rarely a little milk—and as to animal food, it was totally out of the question. After this scanty and wretched produce of his labour, and after the landlord and the clergyman took their share, nothing hardly remained for clothing or education—no depth of privation could leave a surplus for such purposes. Where in England could such a state of misery be found? He agreed that in looking at the condition of Ireland, no small part of the misery prevailing there might be traced, not only to absentee proprietors, but also to resident holders of land. He was very sorry to hear the right hon. gent. (Mr. Plunkett) hold out so hopeless a prospect of relief; for until this important question was thoroughly examined and settled, there could be no permanent peace or tranquillity in Ireland.

Sir J. Newport denied, that all these distresses, and the consequent insurrections, originated in the exactions of the Irish landlords. The great cause of the insubordination which the demand for tithes so frequently called forth, was the system itself. So far back as George 2nd. the legislature had found it necessary to guard the people of Ireland against excessive demands for tithe on articles theretofore not deemed titheable. It was now the duty of the legislature, to prevent the calamities to which the existing state of things must lead. He was the last man in the world, to deprive the clergy of any thing to which they were justly entitled; but he would tell his right hon. friend, that a commutation of tithes implied the abolition of such as had not been clearly and lawfully sanctioned. The great root of the evil was to be traced to the manner in which the tithe system, especially as regarded potatoes, was carried on.

Civil List—Diplomatic Expenditure.] Mr. Lennard rose, for the purpose of proposing to the House to appoint a committee to inquire into the Expenses of the Third Class of the Civil List. In considering the subject, his propositions were—that the present time was admitted to be one of overwhelming distress; that economy was called for, with no feeble voice, by every class, from the throne to the peasant; that without the most rigid economy, public credit could not be maintained; it could not, as had been said by Mr. Burke, exist under the arm of necessity; "necessity and credit are natural enemies, and cannot long be reconciled in any situation." This being admitted, it must, he thought, be as easily admitted, that in the different departments of the expenditure of the taxes, there was no one which embraced so much useless expenditure as the civil list. These two positions being admitted, there was no difficulty in arriving at the third—that when economy was demanded imperiously by our distresses, there was no department in which it could be more safely adopted, than in severely searching into this department of the civil list. Since he had first given notice of his motion, a partial reduction had taken place of the private expenditure of his majesty, in his privy purse, his household, and in the salaries of the ambassadors. That reduction had induced him to confine his motion to the reduction of the third class of the civil list, including the expenses of our embassies; and he thought he should have little difficulty in showing, that whatever might once have been thought proper to be expended in state splendor and pomp, nothing should now be called for, but what absolute necessity required. He must confess he had been grievously disappointed, that the retrenchments should not have been more extensive; he thought he should satisfy the House that much more might have been done, without diminishing the proper dignity of the Crown: or what was so much talked of now, the influence of the Crown. In the observations which he would make, he should take an opportunity of taking a short general view of the funds applicable to the payment of the civil list, and of their application. He would not allow himself for a moment to suppose that it was possible but his majesty's heart must indeed feel deeply for the distresses of his subjects. Indeed, there had not lately been one Speech delivered from the throne, in which his majesty had not declared that he sincerely sympathized with his people. It would be for him (Mr. L.) to show, that the expenses of this department were excessive; and that the main point he had in view was their diminution. It was hardly necessary that he should recall to the recollection of members, his majesty's gracious speech, delivered at the opening of the session, in which he had recommended to that House, in the most decided terms, the adoption of economical measures. He was sorry to say, that that Speech had been followed up, by its very penners coming down to the House, and, in defiance of their own proposition, contending that no practical good would result from the adoption of retrenchments. The country would see by the vote of that night, whether, after the recommendation contained in the Speech from the throne, it was the will and pleasure of those who framed that speech, or his majesty's gracious disposition, so expressed, that was to be the rule by which that House was to be governed. Seeing what were the distresses of the country, every reduction which could be effected, ought to be adopted; and there were many members who were equally surprised with himself, that amongst the many expedients for relief suggested by ministers, and after all their promises of economy, no reduction had been made in the salaries of the great officers of state, and ambassadors, except the trifling one of 10 per cent. Another argument which ought to avail in the consideration of this subject was, that the civil list had been at various times augmented, because the value of money had fallen in this country. It was upon this ground that an augmentation took place in 1804. Mr. Pitt on that occasion said, that "his proposition had for its object the support of that increased expense of the Crown, which arose not from any disposition to prodigality or extravagance, but from that enhancement in all the necessary articles of life which had taken place since the revenue of the civil list was last fixed, and of which every individual in private life must be sensible. The arrangement he proposed had no view to any advance in the quantum of magnificence, or the indulgences which should belong to the royal family, as the only intention was, to enable that illustrious family to maintain the rank, which, according to the grant of 1786, it was admitted they ought to hold."* Now, he should contend, that the great alteration which had, within the last three or four years, occurred in the value of money, although it might not essentially affect the salaries of our ambassadors abroad, did essentially affect our means of paying those salaries. He took the implied condition of this, and of every other public grant to be, that such salaries were not to be paid, it they were likely to reduce to beggary and distress, many of those classes by whom the means of payment were to be furnished. It must be very plain to all who heard him, that the taxes out of which those means were to be provided, many classes were now no longer able to pay. They had ceased to be rich. The question, therefore, was, not merely what it was fitting that the Crown should pay to its ambassadors abroad, but what it was possible for us to pay? But, independently of that powerful argument, the necessity of the case, there was still another reason why this class of the civil list should be reduced. Many gentlemen would concur with him in thinking, that the vast expenses incurred by this class were in no way conducive to the proper representation of the sovereign, or to the advancement or distinction of any body else; but that they were merely a means by which ministers were enabled to purchase those venal services, which otherwise they would be unable to procure. He might, possibly, be met with the argument, that compared to the total of expense, the savings he should propose would be but as a drop of water in the ocean—that they would come within that description of savings of which the chancellor of the exchequer had said that they could effect no real relief to the people. But, he would say, that the moral effect of adopting them would be beneficial to the country, by giving the people reason to believe that there was some sincerity in those professions of sympathy for their sufferings which the House had so repeatedly made. It was not requisite that he should go into the details of the several branches of the civil list: but he would observe, that at different periods that list had been augmented in three different ways —by progressive advances; by being relieved at different times from charges to the amount of 3 or 400,000*l.*; and by the suppression of several offices. He would allude briefly to the first class, in which there had been a reduction of 10 per cent. But it was necessary to bear in mind that besides what here appeared to be received by the Crown, it possessed other large sources of revenue in the Duchies of Cornwall and Lancaster, and in the droits of Admiralty. All ought, in his opinion, to be put under one head, that it might be known what was applicable to the private and personal expenses of the sovereign. As to the second class, containing the bills of the royal household, no man could take the most cursory glance at it without being convinced that it was utterly impossible to expend the money charged under that head, unless it was wasted in perquisites of office, or applied in the most gross and infamous manner. The pension list ought also to be essentially reduced. However fit the selection in some cases might be, it could not be denied that there were many persons in it not of that class of life to make it necessary that they should continue to take such large sums from the pockets of the people.—He now came to the third class. It was most fertile in expense, and he hoped to persuade the House, that very great reductions might be made in it, without lowering the dignity or importance of the country in the eyes of foreign nations. Independently of the ambassadors at the great courts of Europe, there were a variety of charges for second and even for third rate courts, which could only be viewed as poor dependents and satellites on the grand holy alliance. Where formerly there was only a charge d'affaires, there was now an envoy extraordinary, at the cost of about twenty times the sum originally paid. The mission to Switzerland was a most striking instance in point. That appointment was one of a recent and peculiar character, and it was impossible it should escape the vigilance of parliament. If he succeeded in his motion for a committee, he hoped to be able to show that that extravagant charge was unnecessary. In proportion as Switzerland had fallen in the scale of Europe, had the emoluments of the ambassador been increased, until they were actually twenty times the amount formerly paid [Hear.] This job had most properly been made the object of a separate motion. On this account he would studiously avoid further remarks upon it. It was so odious in itself, that he wished to disclaim such a reference to it in his proposition: it was an anomaly even among the many unwarrantable transactions regarding foreign missions disclosed by the papers upon the table. If, therefore, he could not lay sufficient ground for his motion, without including the appointment to Switzerland, he was willing to relinquish it altogether.—His objections to the third class of the civil list were various. He first looked at the establishments of this kind in 1792, and compared them with the amount charged for them upon the public in 1822, taking into consideration the state of the country at each period, the price of different articles, and the rank Great Britain then held among the states of Europe. He found that since 1792 the grand total of expense had been augmented to 150,000*l.* Merely the salaries of ambassadors, putting out of view extraordinary missions the emoluments of secretaries, and other items, increasing from year to year, had been augmented 60,000*l.* Was it that the country could now better afford to pay these extravagant demands? He had yet to learn that the rank of this country in Europe was higher now than in 1792. The truth was, that charges d'affaires were not suited to the present extravagant scale of expense, and what was formerly known by the economical term of a resident was now wholly unknown. Notwithstanding the new-fangled doctrines on the alterations recently made in the kingdoms of Europe, the noble marquis would find it difficult to persuade the House that in the impotent states of Italy, groaning under the iron sway of Austria, it was necessary to maintain an ambassador.

Comparing 1792 with the present period it would be found that all the minor states of the continent were made dependent upon one or other of the members of the grand quintuple alliance. Nevertheless the most costly embassies were kept up at these inferior courts. In 1792, the whole expense of ambassadors in Italy was 9,000*l.*, yet now it approached to 14,000*l.* In 1792 the embassy to the United States of America cost 3,670*l.*, it was now 7,426*l.* The British minister there was paid 6,000*l.*; and this fact was most remarkable, since it was actually more by 500*l.* a year than the salary allowed to the president. The only pretence for paying so largely in Europe was, that our ministers might live upon a scale suited to the court in which they resided; but in America our ambassador enjoyed an allowance beyond the salary of the chief magistrate of the republic. With reference to the increase in the grand total of 150,000*l.*, it might be said, perhaps, that we had now ambassadors at certain courts where there were none in 1792. The envoy to Turin received 2,000*l.* a year; to the German Diet, 6,500*l.* a year; and to the Brazils 6,000*l.* a year. In 1792, however, and he mentioned it with pain and grief, Great Britain had an ambassador at Venice and in Poland, before that fine country was devoured by the detestable policy of Russia and Germany. In 1794, we had an ambassador also at Genoa at a very considerable expense. He mentioned these facts as an answer to the assertion that might be made, that we had more ambassadors now than at any former period. It was impossible to look at this ascending series of expense without supposing from thence that the situation of the kingdom must have been greatly improved—that its means of paying were increased, or that its interests were insufficiently guarded abroad in 1792. If such were not the case, ministers were in this dilemma—either our ambassadors in 1792 were inadequately rewarded, or they were paid too extravagantly in 1822.—There was another point well worthy of attention. He had alluded to the increase in the amount of pensions; and the country had been told in 1812, that it might anticipate a great diminution in this branch of the expenditure by retired ministers being sent out on active employments, and their pensions thus saved. The year 1815 had been well called the annus mirabilis of expense, and the pensions were then 49,000*l.* At the present moment they had risen to 51,000. As to our ambassadors at the greater courts, he was quite willing that they should be attended by all due splendor; but he did not think that this kingdom would gain much in the estimation of foreign powers, by seeing its ambassadors on a scale of the utmost extravagance, while every post brought advices of new and augmented distresses at home. There was not a single instance of an ambassador whose salary since 1792 had not been most enormously increased: some had been doubled, some trebled, and in Russia it had been even quadrupled. In addition to their salaries, there were the heavy expenses of outfit, allowances for secretaries, messengers, chaplains, private secretary, general secretary, and a vast accumulation of charge. They were paid, too, without the slightest deduction: they were studiously guarded against losses by the exchanges, which sometimes were made to amount to 30 per cent; and it was not a little curious, that though in every case of loss the country was made to pay to the uttermost farthing, there was not a single instance of any ambassador making a deduction from his emoluments because the exchange had been in our favour. He was not one who thought that, even in France, it was necessary to maintain a large establishment for the entertainment of English travellers. In this respect, perhaps, an exception might be made in favour of sir Charles Stewart, at Paris, who was visited by so many English. The country at large, however, was not deeply interested in the number of dinners he gave, or in the magnificence of his entrées, excepting as far as it was required to pay for them. But admitting the case of sir C. Stewart to be peculiar, was it necessary to keep an ambassador at the same expense in Russia? If both must be alike, he should be disposed rather to reduce the embassy to Paris to what that of Russia ought to be, than to raise that of Russia to the extravagant scale of the French mission. In considering this subject, it was impossible not to turn the eye to the practice of the United States; and, with all regard to our rank in Europe, he could not help hoping that ere long ministers would see the necessity of imitating the wise and economical policy of that great and flourishing republic. The people of this country had long shown what the noble marquis had once termed "an ignorant impatience of taxation;" and that impatience should compel him, under the existing distresses, to listen to and adopt plans of effectual economy. He trusted he should not be told, that it was necessary to maintain these establishments for the purpose of supporting the just influence of the Crown. Vast sources of patronage were in the hands of ministers. They had the army, the navy, the church, India, and the colonies, and here they might adequately provide for their friends and supporters. That argument had very recently been used and had failed; and if it should again be employed to-night, he trusted the House would again show its sense of its unconstitutional nature. It might be said, that a compact had been made with the Crown, and that that compact could not now be altered. Such a reply could have no application to this third class of the civil list. It hardly applied to the other classes. Such an agreement to be binding must be reciprocal; and the king on his part must take the evil with the good. Yet, had not a demand been over and over again made to parliament to pay the debts of the civil list; and had they been paid without reference to the finances of the country, or to the poverty of the people? He would not trouble the House further than by submitting his motion, trusting, that he had said enough to show that great reductions ought without delay to be made in the civil list, but especially in the third class. The charge was much heavier than the station of the country required, or than the poverty of the people could pay. He then moved, "That a committee be appointed to take into consideration the Expenses of the Third Class of the Civil List, and to report their opinion as to whether any and what savings may be made in the expenses of that class, with a view that any such savings may be carried to the account of the consolidated fund, according to the provision of the 56th Geo. III., c. 46, sec. 5."

The Marquis of Londonderry said, that in giving, as he felt himself bound to do, a negative to the motion, he should offer as shortly as he could the explanations which made it necessary for him to give that vote. He regretted that while the hon. member had confined his motion to the third class, he had entered into a general censure of the administration of his majesty's civil list revenue, as to which, by a singular mode of arriving at a conclusion, the hon. member seemed to take it for granted, that a general conviction of want of economy existed. Now he would take directly the contrary position, and say, that there was not a department of the state managed with more regularity or greater attention to economy. The hon. member had very properly alluded to his majesty's munificent sacrifice of a portion of his revenue; which his majesty, feeling, as the hon. member had stated it, the distress of the country, had made. But the hon. member was in error if he supposed that that sacrifice was made without placing under considerable difficulties the administration of the civil list, or without rendering the strictest economy scarcely sufficient to keep the expenditure within the prescribed limits. As to the third class, the hon. member had taken a distinction; and whereas he had admitted that on the other branches of the civil list no reduction could be attempted by the House, without a message from the Crown, yet as to the third class, he maintained it was competent for the House to make any reduction they might think proper. Now, he (lord L.) admitted the distinction to a certain extent; but in order to shew how far it was admissible, it was necessary that he should explain the nature of the contract between parliament and the Crown. The inconvenience which had been formerly felt as to the arrangement of the civil list was, that the civil list, with a fixed revenue, had been made to comprehend such a variety of expenditure, so uncertain and fluctuating in its amount, that the revenue was rather taken as equal to the minimum of expenditure than to the fair average: there was consequently a general disposition in the expenditure to exceed the income. But if the hon. member examined the working of the bargain in the long reign of the last king, comparing the amount of the civil list expenditure with the produce, not merely of the hereditary revenues, but of the taxes which parliament had been accustomed to grant in aid of the hereditary revenues of the sovereign, it would be found, that the country had gained many millions beyond the debts on the civil list which parliament had paid. In the late arrangement it was deemed desirable by parliament to confine the contract with the Crown to articles so far fixed in their nature, that the expenditure could, with a reasonable certainty, be calculated. On the other branches it was deemed fit that the expenditure should be annually submitted to the control of parliament, in the ordinary way of estimates and votes. The same principle of distinction was carried into the third class itself. Those heads were distinguished on which a reasonable average could be framed, and a fixed sum was voted to meet them, while the two others were to be provided for from year to year. Three out of five heads of expenditure, were deemed sufficiently fixed in their amount, to admit of a permanent provision; while the two others were deemed so fluctuating, that while an estimate was presented of their probable amount, they could not form a part of the permanent bargain with the sovereign. The salaries for foreign ministers, the salaries of consuls, and the pensions, were capable of being fixed on the average of years. The extraordinaries and the outfit, including presents, could not be fixed, though an estimate of their probable amount had been presented, viz. 50,000*l.* for extraordinaries, 10,000*l.* for outfit, and 15,000*l.* for presents. The salaries of foreign ministers, including house rent, had been taken at an average of 144,000*l.*

Now, in the motion which the hon. gentleman had made, he of course only could have intended to subject to a committee up stairs those parts of the expenditure which did not annually come under the view of parliament; for nothing could be less rational than to subject to a committee a branch of expenditure which yearly, in its minutest details, was examined by the House. No doubt, the hon. member for Aberdeen would deem it a great improvement that the expenditure, army, navy, ordnance and all, should be submitted to committees upstairs [Hear!]; but so long as this government remained a monarchy, he trusted the House would not, after the model of the Cortes, which was said to work so well, deliver over the whole executive power to committees above stairs. It was wisely provided by parliament, that the saving of the three heads which had been fixed, when any were made, should be carried to the consolidated fund. He was prepared to contend that this class of expenditure stood in the same position, as the other branches of the civil list; with this exception, that whatever savings were made under these three heads belonged to the public, and were subject to the control of parliament. But to suppose that an intention ever existed to submit to that House, or to a committee of that House, the necessity of sending envoys to particular places—to imagine that it was ever meant that the House of Commons should consider of, and decide on, the propriety of despatching a mission to this state, or the policy of sending one to that, was contrary to all precedent and practice. Was it ever intended that they should declare whether a mission should be of a higher or a lower rank—whether it should be sent to a great court or a small one—whether missions were or were not admissible to minor states? Was the committee now moved for to take upon itself the functions of the executive government, and to call upon the secretary of state for his attendance to discuss and explain all sorts of questions respecting the connexion of this country with foreign powers? He would ask of the House, how it was possible for them to agree to such a motion, unless they meant to open the door to an inquiry of this nature? Could his sense of duty, or his oath of office, allow a secretary of state, without the express sanction of his majesty, to give such information? He never knew an instance in which parliament did not run before the ministers of the Crown, when asked questions of this description, to forbid the disclosure. Indeed, he never recollected an instance when such a preposterous demand was made. But he demanded where that cabinet was to be found, which would advise his majesty to send his ministers to a committee up stairs, to explain all the foreign policy, to detail all the foreign relations, of the country? If such a monstrous principle were adopted, it would be better at once to withdraw all our embassies from the continent. Nothing could be more dangerous than a disclosure of all the circumstances connected with the foreign policy of the country: nothing was more likely to disturb the peace of governments, than to have secrets of great moment to the welfare of the state, brought forward to gratify the curiosity of any member of such a committee. If a mission were suspended for a certain time, doubtless an inquiry would be made what the reason of that suspension was, and whether it was an adequate one; and if the suspension lasted for six weeks, ministers would be called on to state why it should not continue for six years. In short, all the questions of war and peace, would be decided by gentlemen sitting in an executive committee up stairs. And if they had an executive committee this year, they would, he supposed, have a committee of public safety the next. [Hear!]

Much of the discussion which had taken place on subjects of this nature seemed to be introduced for the purpose of preparing their minds for the adoption of the principle on which the government of the United States of America acted, with respect to their missions. But he protested against the application of that principle, to a government which was essentially different from that of the United States. He would contend, that those who were constantly introducing those topics, were endeavouring gradually to prepare the moral feeling and political sentiments of the country for the adoption of that principle to which he had alluded. Profiting by the present moment of distress, they were endeavouring to create a belief that this country was brought to such a state of poverty, that we were obliged to abandon all those great principles of policy—all those exalted sentiments of dignity—all those proud marks of distinction, which heretofore characterized the monarchy of England; and, instead of adhering to these, that we were compelled to show ourselves on the continent in forma pauperis, without those indications of greatness that were worthy of a commanding nation. He perfectly admitted, that whatever savings were made in this class, it was the right and duty of parliament to examine them, and to take care that they were justly appropriated. But he must at the same time contend, that there was a preclusion, which forbad their travelling into the reasons which induced the expenditure of the sums charged in the estimate for this service. If there were any one service which parliament should refrain from investigating with too minute an eye, it was this express service, on account of its peculiar character, embracing as it did circumstances that could not be divulged without manifest danger. But, above all others, this branch of the public service was the least fitted for the examination of a committee. If there were any necessity for such a discretion as parliament gave to the Crown with respect to the civil list, surely this was the portion of that list which more than any other demanded it. Feelings of personal delicacy towards the sovereign might operate against a scrutiny of the civil list generally, as it related to the domestic concerns of the monarch, and the House had been sufficiently disgusted when the subject was formerly introduced; but, in this case, a sense of danger operated: the question was not of a private nature, it was of vital importance to the state; and he would say, that if this inquiry into the diplomacy of the country were allowed, the foreign relations of the country could not go on for a single day. He was not disposed to shrink from a fair investigation of what had been intrusted to his majesty's government, and of the spirit in which the powers placed in their hands with reference to this question had been administered; and he would add, that he would be bound by as strict and fair a system of economy as belonged to the circumstances of the times. Even if the expenditure of the civil list came under general observation, he trusted that ministers would show to parliament that nothing unfair or improvident could be laid to their charge. He believed he could prove to the House, that economy in this particular branch of the civil list had been constantly kept in view by ministers; and he could assure the House, that they would not lose sight of the reduction of expense, always, however, duly considering what the public service demanded.

The hon. member had said, there was a perpetual increase of the civil list—decrease, he asserted, there was none. In stating this, the hon. member had not displayed much research. This class might be divided under three heads—pensions, consular salaries, and salaries and extraordinaries connected with foreign ministers. The hon. member had stated, that the pension list was 52,000*l.* this year, which was as high as it had been for a considerable period; and he could not not discover any diminution that had taken place in this charge since the war. In the first place, the hon. member was not quite accurate in stating the amount of the pension list at the close of the war. In 1815, it amounted to 58,413*l.*; in 1816, to 56,673*l.* The last war was, sui generis—it was of a peculiar character—it had lasted above 20 years. Of course, ministers, who were advanced in life when the war broke out, could not fairly be expected to go abroad, and undertake active public service at the conclusion of peace. It was, he knew, of late, very common to quote the names of individuals, and to argue from their names as to their fitness or unfitness to hold particular situations. Now, he called on gentlemen to look at the list which lay on the table, and to say, whether it afforded any fair presumption, that an improper patronage was exercised, when the individuals there mentioned were placed on that list. With respect to consuls, he was unwilling to occupy the time of the House on that subject, because it was at present under the consideration of the board of trade. He would, therefore, come at once to that which appeared to him to be the gist of the motion; namely, the salaries of foreign ministers, the rank of the different missions, the general scale of expenditure, and how far it was justifiable. The hon. member had treated lightly the reduction of 10 per cent, which had been made in the salaries of foreign ministers; but if he were to read to the hon. member the letters he had received from individuals who were abroad in diplomatic capacities, he would see that that deduction of 10 per cent, was not so mere a trifle as he seemed to suppose. Those who wished to bring the government of this country to adopt the policy of the United States, would, he knew, find no difficulty in disposing of this question; but men who took a just view of the dignity of their country were not quite so easily satisfied. The salaries of our foreign ministers, according to their various ranks, had undergone no alteration from the reign of queen Anne down to 1804. In 1804, an estimate was laid before parliament; but the limited increase which then took place left so many charges in the nature of extraordinaries, as rendered a revision of the system necessary. An arrangement was made for paying those extraordinaries; but they had swelled to such an enormous amount, as struck every person who considered the subject with the necessity of introducing a salutary economy. It was quite clear, that if extraordinaries were not paid, many individuals, who were actively employed in the service of their country, would be ruined in their private affairs. It was, therefore, considered the best system of economy that could be adopted, to give to our ministers more liberal salaries, but to withhold any allowance for extraordinaries, except the ground of claim was of a peculiarly equitable nature. It was agreed to allow them larger salaries; but extraordinaries were not to be granted, except in five or six instances. Acting on this principle, the parliament of 1815 took up the subject, and recommended a certain scale of salaries. The scale then proposed was considerably larger than that which now existed. Putting the house-rent aside for the present moment, the salaries of 1815 were 151,650*l.*, whereas the estimate of 1816 was 135,000*l.*, making a saving of 16,650*l.* An event took place at that period, which certainly added to the salary. He alluded to the repeal of the property tax, in 1815. This measure gave them a nett income, and relieved them from the necessity of paying very large charges out of a narrow salary. They, however, would not now stand in the same situation, since 10 per cent would be deducted from the salaries of foreign ministers; and he could assure the hon. member, that the effect of that reduction would be most serious to those gentlemen who had no private and exclusive funds of their own. The duty of 10 per cent on the salaries of foreign ministers would, in this year, produce a saving of 14,700*l.*, which, added to the reduction of 16,650*l.*, on the estimate of 1815, as compared with that of 1816, would give a saving of upwards of 31,000*l.* in the present year over 1815. After this, he did not think it was very fair in the hon. member to say that no reduction had been made in the civil list.—But this was not the only saving which ministers had made. A very large reduction had taken place in the extraordinaries. When the three branches of the civil list were last before the House, the extraordinaries were taken at 50,000*l.*: by a very close attention to this branch of the expenditure it was reduced to 27,000*l.*: consequently a saving of 23,000*l.* had been made in the extraordinaries. In the arrangement of 1815, the expense of consuls was estimated at 40,000*l.*; in 1816, it was reduced to 30,000*l.*, being a saving as compared with 1815, of 10,000*l.* In the present year, a very small saving had been made under this head, but circumstances had rendered it unnecessary to employ a greater number of consuls than we formerly did. If they added together the preceding sums, it would give a total reduction of upwards of 64,000*l.* in the expense of a department which the hon. member alleged was always on the increase, and never on the decrease.

He hoped he had said enough to show that there was not such a lavish expenditure as the hon. member had stated—such an expenditure as called on them to break the solemn contract that had been entered into with the Crown. He was sure the hon. member must bring forward a better case than that which he had offered, before he could induce the House to break the faith of parliament with the monarch. He never could consent to lower, in the eyes of the world, the foreign service of the country; nor could he agree with the gentlemen opposite (or rather with some of them, for he believed they did not all approve of the measure), in the propriety of assimilating our practice to that of the United States. He could not approve of a committee which was to investigate all the foreign relations of the country. He could not advise his majesty to send his ministers for examination before such a body. If such a system were ever countenanced, he hoped his majesty would secure a set of ministers ready to act under the control of the gentlemen opposite, or to walk in the leading-strings of a committee above stairs. If such a principle were adopted, it would, he repeated, be high time for his majesty to look out for another set of ministers. [Cheers.] He would as far he was concerned, save the Crown and the House from the distress to which such a system must inevitably give rise; and he would also save the committee from the grave constitutional responsibility which they must necessarily incur. But, though he never would consent to explain any part of this subject to gentlemen above stairs, he felt no unwillingness to give every explanation, consistently with his duty, to gentlemen below stairs.

The hon. member had asked how it happened that there were so many missions, and why their appointments were so expensive? It was rather late in the day for that question. It would have been better had those points been considered when the subject of our foreign alliances was before the House—before this country had entered into bargains which could not now be got rid of. He would, however, contend, that the most economical arrangements had been made, under all the circumstances of the time and of the country. With respect to the number of missions, he denied that there was any thing that entitled the hon. member to question the policy on which the government had acted. Taking that annus mirabilis of comparison, the year 1792, the hon. member proceeded to argue, that the country at that time was satisfied with diplomatists of lower rank than were now employed, but that, instead of plenipotentiaries, envoys, and chargé d'affaires, ambassadors were now sent to different courts. It did so happen, however, that with the single addition of one court, this country had not at the present day a greater number of ministers of high rank abroad than were employed in 1792. Let the House look to the missions that stood on the scale of ambassadorial allowances in 1793. These were France, Spain, Holland, and Constantinople. In 1822, there was an ambassador at the court of France, but there was not an ambassador at the court of Spain. This showed that it was not necessary to form a committee for the purpose of inducing the Crown to modify our diplomatic proceedings according to circumstances. Gentlemen opposite might say that this was done because Spain had set us the example. But they must have their committee, they must be acquainted with the facts, they must have all the necessary information before he could allow that their opinion was worth asking or hearing on this point. There were, then, ambassadors to France, Holland, Constantinople, Russia, and Austria. Surely the hon. gentleman must see the necessity of sending ambassadors to those powers who had assisted England in bringing the war to a glorious conclusion, and who with England formed the safeguard of Europe—the quintuple alliance. [Hear, hear! from the Opposition, and a laugh.] Could gentlemen see nothing in the change of circumstances which explained and enforced the necessity of sending an ambassador to Russia and to Austria? He should wish to know whether Russia had not taken a very different situation from that which she formerly maintained? [Cheering from the Opposition benches.] He understood the meaning of the gentlemen opposite, but their opinion on this point must be taken, cum grano salis. It was hardly fair to argue with them on the question of Russia, as their minds were not merely tinctured, but were wholly impressed, with the idea of an anti-holy-alliance, under the influence of that power.—To return to the immediate point under consideration. There was, at present, it appeared, but one new minister, and that minister was accredited to a royal court, which accounted for it. With respect to ministers plenipotentiary, the number of that class of diplomatists varied very little from the scale of 1792. In the first place, he would mention the plenipotentiary to America; and certainly there was no country in the world with which it was more important for this country to live on terms of amity and mutual good feeling. There were also ministers plenipotentiary to Prussia, the two Sicilies, Sweden, Bavaria (which had grown up to be a power of great importance to England, and was, in size, fourfold the extent which she formerly was), Wirtemberg, and Sardinia; at all of these courts, with the exception of Wirtemberg, England had ministers plenipotentiary, in 1792, and nearly on the same scale as at the present day. Tuscany, Saxony, and Switzerland, were visited by envoys extraordinary. He had formerly urged the necessity of sending a plenipotentiary to the Hans Towns; but, as the individual, who was then a charge d'affaires, was a clever and respectable man, it was thought better to make an addition to his salary, which was originally 500*l.* a year, and to engage him to perform the duties which were usually executed by a plenipotentiary. It therefore appeared, that with very little exception, the number of our foreign ministers at present and in 1792 was the same. And here the hon. member had fallen into an error very natural to him upon this subject, not knowing the peculiar circumstances of many of the missions. The hon. member had stated that the expenses had been increased to 60,000*l.* instead of to 50,000*l.* A part of the expense of our mission to Constantinople had formerly been paid, not by the Crown, but by the Levant Company, and had been in fact the produce of a sale of protections. This was now paid by the Crown, and amounted to 10,000*l.* a year, which had formerly been levied by the public. Therefore they must reason upon the sum not as 60,000*l.*, as the hon. member had represented it, but as 50,000*l.*

He would now proceed to examine and explain each class; and the House would judge whether the present establishments were such as this country ought to maintain or not. The six higher missions were in 1793, 50,360*l.* The corresponding missions in the year 1822 were, including the change of rank, 74,000*l.*, making an increase of 23,640*l.* This increase gave one-fourth more of salary on an average to the great diplomatic officers, and added about one-sixth to the whole expense. Nine minor missions, including Wirtemberg, in 1793, were 6,295*l.*, and in 1822, 29,000*l.*; making an increase of 22,705*l.* Now in Italy, on which great expenses were supposed to be thrown away by maintaining a minister at Tuscany, he could inform the House, that in 1793, the salary for that mission had been 3,600*l.*, and was now only 3,900*l.*; so that in fact, after deducting 20 per cent, it was 60*l.* less than in 1792. But why have a minister at Tuscany, it was asked—Why have a minister at Saxony? Why have a minister at Wirtemburg? It was pretty strong proof that it was necessary to have a minister at Tuscany, that we had never been without a minister there. It was not, too, a very mean argument to prove the propriety of having a minister there, though it might not be intelligible to gentlemen on the other side, that every other power had a minister in Tuscany. Spain, Portugal, and powers who could not be imagined to have any communication with that place, were there represented, as this country had always been. It was a perfectly sufficient proof that our minister was not there merely for idle purposes, that all other powers who wished to know what was doing in the world of which they formed a part were there represented. But it was a fact, that hardly any diplomatic circle was more full than the court of the grand duke of Tuscany. He now came to a mission which the hon. gentleman had dwelt upon with particular pressure, and which was to form the subject of particular discussion. He looked forward to the debate of to-morrow evening without any alarm, and he had no doubt the hope of the hon. member would prove as illusory as many similar hopes entertained on his side; they only required the breath of a little discussion to destroy them. With respect to what the hon. gentleman had said of the unimportance of Switzerland, the whole policy of this government at all times denied his doctrine. We had respected Switzerland from a moral feeling, as well as from a political one; for we had always admired that innocent and brave people for their conduct upon every trying occasion. They had resisted all attacks upon their country, and particularly that of France, with exemplary determination. But, independently of this moral obligation, it had always been the policy of this country to send a representative to the Swiss Can-tons. With the exception of two instances, we always had a minister there. One of those instances was very surprising, and he was quite unable to explain it. The other was the period of the last war, when the states of Switzerland were occupied in war, and our missions were itinerant and changed with the circumstances. This, with the other very limited exception, to which he would advert, was the only time when there was not a mission from this country in Switzerland. From 1750 to 1793, there had been four ministers plenipotentiary. There had been a gentleman there — what diplomatic crimes he had committed, he was not wise enough to discover—a Mr. Braun who had but 250*l*. a-year. Unless they were to abandon the whole stream of general policy, they must support this mission so far as our ancestors had done. Switzerland was the great intervening country between Italy, France, and Germany, and was exposed to be disturbed by any disturbance in those countries. It was the key stone which held them all together. It had, therefore, been particularly attended to by the congress at Vienna. After the confederacy of Buonaparte had been destroyed, it became a subject of anxious consideration how to estabish the relations which had been involved in it, consistently with the liberty, security, and happiness of Europe. It was agreed that Switzerland should have ministers accredited by all the great powers, and it was a distinct understanding, that they should accredit their ministers to that country, with the express desire of sustaining and completing the arrangement which had occupied so much of their time. It formed no small proof of the importance attached to the preservation of the neutrality of Switzerland, and by that means the tranquillity of Europe, that persons of the highest consideration and importance had been appointed to that mission. The secretary of state of Russia, count Capo D'Istria, was now minister in that country. Though he held the highest station in the government of Russia, yet he was now delivering his credentials for that mission. There, too, the nephew of prince Talleyrand had been minister. These facts he mentioned, because they proved that the great powers of Europe watched anxiously over the policy of the Cantons of Switzerland. Why, Spain, with all her economy, had a minister there, Portugal had a minister there. There was a feeling in every country to hold that important connexion with Switzerland, and if that feeling should not be supported in this country, our best feelings must be dissolved, and we must be prepared to see it inquired who would go abroad with the least salary. He was astonished at the calumnies, insinuated for party purposes, he must say, and representing that the salary had been augmented for the advantage of a particular individual; or that the office was revived with the view of reconciling political differences. These insinuations were all founded on misapprehension or falsehood. They contained not a particle of truth. Mr. Stratford Canning, when he quitted that mission, had had direction from the king to give assurance, that no time would be lost in sending a person of superior rank to occupy the same place. He dared to say that the hon. gentleman would wish to hear all the anecdotes which would explain the cause of the interval in sending a successor to Mr. Canning. He (lord L.) could indulge the appetite of the hon. gentleman, if he were not afraid that this appetite would grow with indulgence. If the hon. member were to ask him twenty questions, he was prepared to answer them. A gentleman was immediately sent as secretary of legation, and was soon succeeded by Mr. Disbrowe, who repaired at once as chargé d'affaires. Thus he had destroyed the beautiful illusion which had so much pleased the hon. member, and which had persuaded him that the mission had been revived for a politcial purpose. Another insinuation had been, that the salary had been increased for the indulgence of the person who was appointed. Now the salary stood the same as with Mr. Wynn's predecessor, with a difference of 10 per cent less against Mr. Wynn. Mr. Wynn had indeed a pension, but the arrangement could not be more advantageous for the public, than by selecting one who had a pension. Not that he (lord L.) held himself bound always to select persons having pensions; but how could a selection be more acceptable, than that of a person of family, rank, and consideration? How could the arrangement be more economical, than by selecting such a person, having previously a pension? The salary was 3,900*l*., from which the pension of 1,500*l*. as well as the 10 per cent were to be deducted, and it was thus cut down considerably; though certainly not so low as the salary of Mr. Braun.

He would now give the fair grounds of the increase of expense for missions. Although the obligation to continue that increase might be evaded by granting a commission of inquiry, yet he should ill discharge his duty to the king and to the country, if he did not consider the arrangement as a final engagement between parliament and the missions, and that there was great propriety in adhering to it as an economical and just arrangement. It had the recommendation of having entirely removed the chapter of extraordinaries from this department. The increase was about 50 per cent on the scale of the missions. How that was expended he would now state. It had on former occasions been admitted on the other side, that the scale had been infinitely too low for the various demands to which missions were exposed. We were acquainted with the growth of expenses in this country. Since the last two or three years expenses had fallen lower, but had they returned to the level of 1792? or could we have the same articles for double the expense? He put it to gentlemen who had been abroad, whether the growth of expenses on the continent had not increased more largely and more rapidly than in this country. Those expenses had very greatly increased by the increase of our own incomes. We carried with us habits of profusion, which added much to the expense of our missions. The number of our countrymen abroad was so great, that we formed a great part of the population at Brussels and other places. With the true spirit of a modern stoic, the hon. member asked, why should English gentlemen be received by the ambassadors? But he (lord L.) doubted whether the hon. member, if on the continent, would not hold the obligation rather high. But instead of giving a degraded hospitality to the crowds of countrymen who might invade it, it was for the credit of the country that they should exercise their hospitality with a dignity suited to their station. Another cause of increased expense was occasioned by the mode in which business was now conducted. There was a regulation which charged ministers with certain expenses when they were absent for their private convenience. Formerly, they could enjoy all their emoluments when absent, and the officers who supplied their place were paid by the public. Now, it was not so. A secretary of embassy or of legation, according to the degree of the minister, was required to conduct the business, and receive 5*l*. a-day from his absent principal, if a minister plenipotentiary, and 3*l*. if a secretary of legation. This was found a counteracting motive, and often prevented ministers from desiring leave of absence where there was not a particular reason for it. The hon. member had asked, what had this country to do with the continent, or with the holy alliance? He would answer, that we had more connexion with the existing governments of Europe than at any former period, and particularly with those through whom we looked for the preservation of peace. The scale of business had increased tenfold, too; and this increase was very much growing out of those relations which now connected the several nations. There were arrangements established, by which the views and course of each nation were communicated to others fully and without reserve. It was their pride that no secret or indirect views were cherished and prosecuted by any one power. This state of things created a mass of business which it was quite impossible to conduct in the foreign offices as formerly. Formerly, the minister or his secretary, with his own manual labour, transacted all the business: but at this moment, if he did not employ four or five persons in the office, it was quite impossible to perform the business of the department. This produced a considerable benefit, and it taught a great portion of the diplomatic experience and skill which distinguished the present class of diplomatists. He might be partial to those with whom he was so much connected—he might feel the influence of gratitude for the services of those who corresponded with him in his official duties—but he did not believe that at any former period so great a mass of talent had been employed in this service. In the offices of the various ambassadors there were, he believed, no less than twenty-one young men of rank, education, and talent, who were serving without fee or reward. They were improving themselves, and qualifying themselves, for the more eminent duties; and all that they received in return the privilege of living in the ambassador's house. This occasioned a great increased charge to the several ambassadors; but he trusted the House would not think that this was a waste of the public money, especially as it was to be borne in mind that the secrets of the offices were of the most important nature, and could not be safely entrusted to any but those who, from their situation in society, were likely to prove deserving of this confidence.

He now came again to statements which he made with regret, because it was painful to bring forward private transactions, which a spirit of pride, independence, and a regard to the sacredness of character, would make every gentleman in those high offices anxious to conceal; but, when so much spirit of slander was abroad, it was necessary to expose its injustice. Those whose diplomatic services had been long known, and who had recommended themselves to all parties—who had risen through many inferior offices to the eminent stations which they now held—had done services to their country of the highest benefit, and ought, therefore, to be most liberally rewarded. If they were not provided for on such a scale that persons of high ambition could be induced to engage in the same service, justice would not be done to the talent of the country, nor to the country itself. He had now to state to the House what this reward was, and how the highest merit had been paid by the country; he had this to state on the authority of the ambassador at St. Petersburgh, the ambassador at the court of the Netherlands, and the late ambassador to Spain. Our ambassador at St. Petersburgh had written to him (lord L.) when the reduction lately made was communicated, that he would submit; but he added, that he did not know how, with such "frightful expenses," he could keep free from embarrassment. The House in which this distinguished person lived was rented at 1,500*l.* a year. This was testimony above all suspicion; for this eminent person had advanced himself to this station by his success in his former appointment, and because he was acceptable to the emperor. This clearly showed that he had not been selected for any political purposes. He was of eminent character, of high birth but inconsiderable means, being a younger brother of a numerous family. Lord Clancarty supplied evidence to the same effect. It would be considered that he (lord L.) was referring to persons of sober and staid character, of great moderation and love of order, who, though they would preserve the dignity belonging to their rank and office, yet would try every call for expenses by the test of reasonableness and propriety. Now, lord Cathcart, in the seven years during which he had been engaged in his mission at St. Petersburgh, had spent out of his own private fortune a sum, which, if it had been sunk in an annuity for his life, would have produced him 2,000*l.* a year. The embassy to the Netherlands was not so expensive as that to St. Petersburgh; and yet lord Clancarty, in the first year which he held it, had been obliged to spend 16,000*l.* a year, and had never spent less than 13,000*l.* a year since. These facts were sufficient to convince any unprejudiced man that embassies were not offices of that very advantageous nature which some persons described them to be; and he therefore trusted that the House would never consent to such reductions in the salaries attached to them, as would either drive those to ruin who held them, or force them to leave the service. He could also state, upon the authority of sir H. Wellesley, that he had spent 7,000*l.* more than the salary allowed him in the seven years during which he acted as ambassador at the court of Spain. The same had been done by sir W. A'Court, at Naples, and by his own brother (lord Stewart) at Vienna.

Having said thus much upon the European missions, he would now say a few words upon the other topics which the hon. member had pressed upon the attention of the House. The hon. member had said, that the president of the United States did not receive more than 6,000*l.* a year, and had therefore argued, that Mr. Stratford Canning must be making money by his mission to America. Now, there was a friend of his in the House (Mr. Antrobus), who, during the absence of Mr. Bagot, had discharged all the duties of that mission for a year and a half, and who, therefore, could explain the expenses attached to it. That gentleman, in all probability, would address them in the course of the evening, and from him they would learn that the mission to America was attended with very considerable expense. As he had forgotten to mention the fact whilst he was more particularly engaged with that part of the subject, he would step back for a moment to observe, that Mr. Hamilton, whose salary of 6,000*l.* a year had been reduced 600*l.* by the reduction of 10 per cent, had not been able to obtain suitable lodgings at Naples for less than 850*l.* a year. And yet there were some individuals to be found who could wish to diminish the salaries which public functionaries of this class received! The cool, unfeeling stoicism with which those individuals advised reductions, which were certain of bringing ruin upon the country, and degradation upon the Crown, was really astonishing; but it would be still more astonishing, if the House of Commons did not, upon the present occasion, turn a deaf ear to their suggestions, as it had formerly done upon similar occasions.

The noble marquis, after recapitulating his former arguments, stated that the policy of England was of a pacific nature. The knowledge that peace was our policy, inspired the nations of Europe with amity and good will towards us, and caused us to have greater influence over them than we had ever enjoyed at any former period. That influence would be most effectually sustained by having high-minded ministers at the courts of the different sovereigns of Europe. Now, it would be impossible for those ministers to do justice to their country, if they were compelled to slink into corners at the courts at which they resided, for the sake of saving the public money. [Cheers.] To preserve the influence of their own country, they ought to show themselves often to the public of that country to which they were sent. Their houses ought to be the centre of information to all who were able to assist or to grace their mission. [Hear, hear! from the Opposition.] He did not mean that they should be the resort of those perturbed and agitated spirits who were anxious to plunge the world once more into confusion, but of those honest and honourable persons who took a fair and candid view of the present state of Europe. He was certain that a vast majority of the nation would always be opposed to any scheme that would make not only the representative of England, but England herself grovel in the manner which the hon. member recommended; and with that impression upon his mind, and also with a strong conviction that the maintenance of the dignity of the Crown was intimately connected with the maintenance of the national strength, he would never allow it to be lessened whilst he held a place in his majesty's councils. The due maintenance of that dignity was our best remedy against ulterior war; and he therefore implored the House not to deprive the country of the moral and physical resource which it thus obtained. If the House were to agree to the present motion, and were to appoint a committee to take into its hands the detailed service of those funds which were usually intrusted to the care of the secretary of state for the foreign department, he should feel himself degraded to the dust if he submitted for a moment to continue in office under such a system. [Loud cheering.] If he were to place himself in such leading-strings, he should be so ashamed of himself, that not only should he feel that he was unworthy to show his face in public, but also that he was unworthy to transact the slightest portion of the public business. [Cheers.] He trusted, however, that the House would pursue a very different course from that proposed by the hon. gentleman—he trusted they would not allow him to accomplish that object indirectly, which he seemed loath to attempt directly—he trusted that, if they had not confidence in the individual to whom the administration of foreign affairs was intrusted, they would say so at once, and deprive him of those functions which they deemed him inadequate to discharge. He would also call upon the gentlemen on the opposite side of the House not to assent to this motion. If they wanted a new secretary of state for foreign affairs, let them look out for one among their own body. [Hear, hear!]. He did not think so unfavourably of their talents as to suppose that an individual fitted for the station was not to be found amongst them; and with the ability and integrity that abounded on their benches, they would find no difficulty in discovering a person fitted to control and check that part of the public expenditure. Let them place that control and check in responsible hands; but let them not commit it to the care and vigilance of a committee of either House of Parliament. If they did commit it to the care of such a committee, from that moment they excluded the secretary of state for foreign affairs from all political influence, and placed him in a species of leading-strings which no man of spirit could tolerate for a moment. So strongly did he feel the impolicy and danger of such a course, that he should meet the motion by a direct negative; for if it was adopted, the constitution was as at an end.—The noble marquis sat down amidst loud cheers.

Sir James Mackintosh said, he should have contented himself with giving a silent vote on this motion, if the discussion had taken the course which it was natural to expect from the clear and temperate statement of his hon. friend the member for Ipswich. His hon. friend, however, by way of reward for the discretion and temperance which he had displayed, had been accused of a wish to lay his country grovelling in the dust, of an intention to degrade her in the eyes of all Europe, and of a desire to deprive her of that influence which it was only by ministers she was supposed to possess. The noble marquis had told the House, that if it agreed to his hon. friend's motion, it would be usurping a branch of the executive government. That any man should venture to make such an assertion of a motion calling upon the House of Commons to institute an inquiry into a branch of the public expenditure, was one of those extraordinary novelties which sprung up in every debate that involved either the conduct or character of the present ministry. The motion, according to the noble marquis, was likewise a motion subversive of all the glorious privileges ensured to us by the constitution. When such language was used to the House of Commons, it was not unworthy its consideration to reflect upon the state to which it was reduced. To what state, then, was the House of Commons, once the master both of kings and ministers, reduced at present? It was reduced to such a point, that it was obliged to regulate its votes by the pleasure of the ministers; in other words, it was reduced so low in spirit, that it dared not to come to any vote that would give so much displeasure to ministers as to cause them to resign. He wished to call the earnest attention of parliament to this shameful, this serious, this dangerous state of things. They had that night heard what had been often styled the ultima ratio of ministers: they had heard them introduce into the debate a threat of resignation, which had been so often made, that it now created no alarm among their warmest adherents—which, from its repetition, had become a subject of ridicule to all parties in that House—and which was now so well understood throughout the country, that it was laughed and jeered at, by the lowest politicians in the lowest clubs of the metropolis. [Cheers.] That threat, heretofore either dexterously whispered in the ears of ministerial circles, or rumoured in unofficial statements industriously circulated, or thrown out in that House in a sort of convenient ambiguity that most cautiously did not shut out retreat, had at length assumed a more palpable form, and been threatened by the noble marquis, in a tone of pretended confidence, but of real and undeniable apprehension [Hear, hear!]. He must implore them to reflect on the situation on which they would place the House, if they timidly gave heed to such a threat from such a quarter. The House of Commons had, during the course of its existence, performed greater things than any assembly which had ever existed at any time or in any nation. The House of Commons had sometimes abused its powers—it had changed the religion of the state—it had deprived a sovereign of his Crown—it had sent a dynasty into exile—and it had hurled from his pride of place many an imperious and despotic minister. It was now, however, reduced to hear the present ministers, who overrated their own merits far beyond any of their predecessors, and who underrated the House of Commons even further than it had ever been underrated in any of the libels published against it—it was now reduced to hear the present ministers addressing it in a tone of defiance, and saying "If you vote against us, we will throw up our places; and we deem it right to tell you, that we think our places of much higher importance than any decision which you, the majority of the House of Commons, may arrive at, with all the depth and profundity of your wisdom." So distinct a declaration on the part of ministers, he was certain, would never have been made, if they had not had a firm conviction that a great portion of those who usually supported them would differ from them on the present occasion. It was a deep game that they were now playing—it was a great stake for which they were now throwing. He could not, however, bring himself to think that the House of Commons would endure a repetition of the threat that had been used that evening. It was a card that could not be often played, and he was certain that it would not have been played that evening had the minister been able to lay down any other. He would therefore, in the name of the ancient fame of that House—in the recollection of its many great and illustrious services to the country and to the world—in the hope of cementing the body of the nation to it in that confidence which at present it did not enjoy—he would, by all these associations, conjure hon. gentlemen to recollect the disgrace which they would entail upon themselves, if, by their vote of that night, they preferred the pleasure of ministers to the gratifications of conscience, and thought it better to bear their yoke than alleviate in the slightest degree the burthens of their fellow countrymen. Could they be regardless of the character with which they would return to their constituents, in case they voted that evening with ministers? Would they allow it to be publicly said of them, that they had listened patiently to language from a minister, which, if uttered in better days by the monarch, would have hurled him speedily from his throne? The noble marquis, however, not contented with menacing his audience, proceeded to address them in language of the most outrageous and contumelious nature that had ever been uttered in parliament. He has told you, that he, the pacificator of Europe; he, the presiding genius of congress, the associate of kings, and emperors, and autocrats, disdained to be placed in the leading-strings of a committee of the House of Commons. And yet, what were the measures which must be taken to place him in those leading-strings? Must there not be a majority of the votes of that House? By no other means could the measure be effected. So that the leading strings, which the noble marquis, full of Prussian and Russian notions, took upon him so heartily to despise, were the votes of the knights, citizens, and burgesses of the House of Commons—those votes, which, in former times, had kept in awe the most daring and profligate ministers. He called upon hon. gentlemen to look closely to this declaration, of the noble marquis,

"— nec enim levia aut ludicra petuntur
"Præmia, sed Turni de vita ac sanguine certant."

The very being of the House of Commons, as an independent body, appeared in jeopardy—its existence, to all useful purposes, was in danger, from the threats of the noble marquis; which, though they had excited no fear formerly, could not be heard at present without exciting the warmest indignation in the breast of every man who loved the freedom and cherished the institutions of England and Englishmen. Let them mark, however, the inconsistency into which the noble marquis, in the warmth of his argument, and the pride of his nature, had shortly afterwards unconsciously involved himself. The noble marquis, after telling them, that nothing could be so absurd and so unconstitutional as to refer the expenditure of our different missions to a committee, and after declaring that if such reference were made, nothing would ever induce him to continue in the department which he then had the honour of filling—the noble marquis, after much idle declaration on that point, founded all the arguments which he had used upon the report of a committee which had usurped the duties of the executive government, and had determined the nature, extent, and salary of every mission that had been sent from the country since 1815. Now, he would ask the noble marquis to explain to him by what process of logic it happened, that our missions could be referred to a committee constitutionally in 1815, and that they could not be referred to it in 1822, without introducing changes into the state utterly subversive of its laws and constitution?—There was another part of the noble lord's harangue which struck him with great astonishment. He alluded to that part of it in which the noble marquis, after indulging for some time in his stale and hacknied sneers against those whom he denominated the disturbers and agitators of mankind, asserted, that at no former period of our history had the influence of England over foreign countries been so predominating. The noble marquis had then talked much of the glories achieved by the quintuple alliance—a subject so very wide of that which the House was called upon to discuss, that he was at a loss to conceive why it had been introduced. If they had any thing to do at present with the glories of that alliance, it was, not with the brave and gallant deeds of those heroes who struck down the colossal power of France in 1814 and 1815, but with the feats which they had recently achieved, the victories which they had lately gained, to the ruin of the expanding liberties of an injured nation. The noble marquis, in wandering from one subject of complaint to another, had thought fit to charge it as a crime upon gentlemen on his (sir J. M.'s) side of the House, that they were opponents of the holy alliance. The charge came with exquisite grace from the noble marquis—from the man who, in January, 1821, published, in the name of his sovereign, to all Europe, a strong and indignant reprobation of the principles avowed by the holy alliance. The noble marquis paid hon. gentlemen on his (sir J. M.'s) side of the House, a compliment which they did not deserve, when he charged them with being the earliest detractors from the merits of the holy alliance. They were not so: they had no claim to originality: they were mere plagiarists, feeble and humble imitators of the spirited eloquence of the noble marquis on the same subject. They had never said, that the governments of Austria, Prussia, and Russia were engaged in an unholy conspiracy against the laws of nations and the rights of man. They had never said, that their conduct was subversive of every thing like honour and principle between nation and nation. They had not charged those governments (at least not more than the noble marquis had), with being enemies to the interests of all sovereigns. The noble marquis, however, had charged the Austrian, Prussian, and Russian governments, with all the crimes which nations can commit: he had accused them of sinning against humanity, of sinning against justice, of sinning against honour, of sinning against every thing that was dear and valuable in the law of nations and the rights of mankind. [Cheers.] He defied the noble marquis, or any of his friends, to point out any language used on his (sir J. M.'s) side of the House that was—he would not say stronger, but—so strong as that in which the charges against them were couched, and which the noble marquis had dispatched in the form of a circular to every court of Europe with which we had any connexion. If such were the case, he would ask hon. gentlemen what they ought to think of the influence which it was pretended that we were at this moment exercising all over Europe? Either the noble marquis was or was not sincere in the paper to which he had subscribed his name; and upon either supposition, he would argue the point of our influence in Europe. If the noble marquis was sincere in the protest which he made in January, 1821, it was quite evident that we had protested in vain against as gross an act of rapine, injustice, and oppression as ever disgraced the annals of history. Now, how was the little attention that that state paper met with from foreign powers to be reconciled with any idea of our great influence over them? When was it before that Italy could be transformed into an Austrian province without the interference of England? When was it before, that the German stalked as a conqueror through Italy in spite of the efforts of Great Britain and France—the one the greatest power by sea, and the other by land? Was it by instances like that he had just quoted, that the noble marquis intended to convince the country of its increased influence among foreign nations? If considerations of general interest, and a wish not to injure pending negotiations, did not prevent him from touching on certain recent events, he could make out even a still stronger case of our want of influence, or, in case of our possessing it, of a most wanton abuse of it. The noble marquis had told them that Switzerland was an important power. He scarcely knew what the noble marquis meant by stating that there was a strong moral reason for our having an ambassador in that country. He should not have been surprised at hearing that there was a political reason for such a mission; but he had always been given to understand that a political reason was as distinct from morality as one thing possibly could be from another. What, then, was the moral reason of which the noble marquis talked so greatly? It was this—that it was greatly for the interest of Europe that the neutrality of Switzerland should be observed, and that we were called upon most particularly to protect it. He would here confess that there were three good acts of the holy alliance, on which too much praise could not be bestowed: the first was the neutrality of Switzerland, the next the abolition of the Slave trade, and the last their declaration in favour of civil and religious liberty. Now, allowing it to be so material that the neutrality of Switzerland should be religiously protected, in what, he wished to know, did that neutrality consist more than in the inviolability of the asylum it afforded to the refugees from the political and religious discords of their own countries? Switzerland had formerly been celebrated as the secure retreat of every martyr to the cause of liberty—of every man whose only crime was to be found in his defeat. Was it not essential to its neutrality that the character which it had held through so many years should still be maintained free from suspicion? Was it not essential that as a place of refuge it should retain its pristine inviolability? Was it not destructive of all those good consequences arising from it, on which the noble marquis had descanted so largely—was it not destructive of those good consequences, that the ministers of the holy alliance should have assumed the right of entering its territories, and delivering up into the hands of their persecutors those whom they thought proper to call criminals, merely because they loved liberty, and hated oppression? The ministers of the unholy alliance had committed this nefarious deed—had perpetrated this violation of every principle deemed most holy by all the writers on the law of nations—had turned the hospitality of Switzerland to its disgrace in every canton of that hospitable country. The refugees from Piedmont—and here he must stop to congratulate the noble lord on his geographical discovery that Turin was not in Italy. [Hear and a laugh.] Other geographers generally reckoned Piedmont in Italy, and he thought that the noble marquis, when he again looked at the map, might perhaps become a convert to their opinions; especially as the Austrians had now divided Italy into three distinct provinces for their own convenience. The first was Piedmont, over which the descendant of the ancient dukes of Savoy, or the Tetrarch of Sardinia, as Mr. Burke had called him, reigned, subject, however, to the paternal control of the House of Austria; the next was Tuscany, over which a member of the reigning family of Austria presided; and last of all came Naples, once an independent kingdom, now a mere province of Austria—held, indeed under a king who had once sworn to a constitution, but who had preferred to be the viceroy of a foreign power to being the head of a free though limited monarchy. Refugees from all these three different provinces found their way into Switzerland; but there, in spite of its neutrality—there, in spite of the inviolability that ought to have belonged to it as an asylum—there, in spite of the sacred rights, which, from the most barbarous ages downwards, have been considered to belong to the miserable and suppliant refugees—even there it was attempted to make captives of those whose only crime was, their abomination of oppression. Why were those individuals to be seized? For offences they had committed in Switzerland? No; but for their desire to obtain liberty for their fellow-men—for their anxiety to bestow the blessings of a constitution upon those who knew them only by name—for a wish to open to all the road to knowledge, to which he alone among our civilized princes was a fierce and inveterate enemy. Information, however, by some means or other, was given to the Italian refugees before the warrant for their arrest was issued, and they contrived, one and all, to make their escape. Probably the ministers of Switzerland, actuated by a spark of the ancient virtue which had so often crowned their barren hills with all the verdure of plenty, had been ashamed of betraying their guests into the hands of those who had no other right to demand them but the right of the sword. Within the last three or four weeks the city of Geneva, which was now reckoned one of the cantons of Switzerland, had entertained under its protection several Italian refugees of property, who were in possession of distinction of every sort, no matter whether it arose from wealth, talent, character, or accomplishment. The protection they received at Geneva, they were not allowed to enjoy long. The ministers of the three powers repaired to Geneva, and required that they should be given up to their incensed masters. The magistracy of the town gave them warning, and they also escaped. But at present they had no asylum. In the Netherlands, where they now were, they had no chance of security. In England, formerly the asylum where every friend of freedom, every man who had suffered in her cause, found himself immediately naturalized, the case was now decidedly altered. Foreigners saw on our cliffs—not the genius of liberty beckoning them to approach to our shores, but—a minister with a threatened alien bill in his hand driving them away, or consigning them, if they approached, to the cells and dungeons of a foreign land. [Loud Cheers.] He would ask the hon. and learned member for Guildford, who smiled with so much complacency at the fate of so many good and virtuous men—who by his silent smiles more than by his honied words, showed that he had studied all the expenses of our diplomacy, which his high rank and constant occupation at the bar almost rendered it impossible for him to do;—he would ask that hon. and learned member what inference he drew from these facts? If England had greater influence with foreign nations now than she ever had, and did not use it to prevent the nefarious transactions he had described, she was a party to them. If, on the contrary, she had attempted to prevent it and failed, then it must be confessed that her influence had altogether failed. Either the noble lord had approved of all these transactions, and was in that case fairly subjected to the reproach and the disgrace which they had brought upon their authors, or he had disapproved of them in vain, and the British government had no longer its boasted influence with the courts of Europe. He would not waste the time of the House in farther illustrating a truth that was self-evident. He should not have been induced at all to address it, but for the extraordinary doctrines of the noble lord. A most singular moment, too, had been chosen for the avowal of such doctrines. A moment when the people were besieging their doors, and when their table was loaded with petitions, imploring that House to relieve their present distresses, and to save them from impending ruin, was the time selected by the noble lord to make his appeal with stoical sternness, an appeal in which he charged those members who, in the discharge of their duty, wished to inquire whether some diminution was not practicable in this branch of our expenditure. No improvement could be suggested, without exposing the individual who pointed it out, to insinuations and taunts from the other side; and it was his indignation at discovering this to be the case, that had excited him to take a part in the present discussion. Far was it from his intention to deny the propriety of adequate salaries for our foreign ambassadors, of emoluments suited to the dignity of their functions, and to the character of a body of gentlemen living in honourable exile, and engaged in performing useful services to their country. But he did not see the necessity of imposing on them the obligation of extending their hospitality to the crowds of idle Englishmen who now resorted to foreign courts. He did not think the House would be disposed to countenance a scale of expenditure enlarged to an unnecessary degree by circumstances like these. The noble lord had dexterously avoided entering into particulars except with regard to the few missions which had involved those who filled them, in embarrassment and difficulty in their private affairs. Now, if such was the result at some of the greater courts, and if 10 per cent was, notwithstanding, to be deducted from those appointments, it was more important still that the House should look with jealousy to our diplomatic missions at the minor courts of Europe. In many of them a secretary of legation, or a charge d'affaires, was a minister of rank and competency enough to discharge every duty that could be incumbent on the representative of a foreign state. In times when economy had become indispensable from the throne to the cottage, we ought, by restraining our disbursements in capitals where no business of general or extensive interest was usually transacted, to enable ourselves to support, without exposing individuals to loss, the great and effective missions through which the political system of Europe was maintained. No doubt the embassy at St. Petersburgh had risen very highly in importance, and it was filled by a person of rank. The noble lord had adverted to others which were held by noblemen or gentlemen whose private fortunes sometimes made up the deficiencies of their official salaries. He did not know why more persons of this character were not chosen to fill such employments; but how was it possible for that House to judge of the scale on which their expenses were regulated, without possessing a shadow of evidence on the subject? Many there were who were perfectly ready to exert their talents, and obtain the means of rendering future advantage to their country, whose rate of expense might be governed more by reference to their own property, than to the allowances granted by the public. It was said, that other powers had ministers of a certain rank at the minor courts; and whilst there was a pretender to his majesty's crown, which continued to be the case so lately as the year 1792, it was one of the principal objects of our foreign policy to watch minutely all that passed in the courts of Italy, and at Florence in particular. Even during the life of the cardinal York, it was necessary that a scrutiny should be maintained, as to all that related to the concerns or relations of that family. But that necessity no longer existed. The only plea that could once be urged in defence of large or numerous, or expensive appointments was no more; and he should now request their attention for a few moments to the expenditure of the United States under this head. The House could not have failed indeed to remark the tone of monarchical contempt in which the noble lord had spoken of that power and of its expenses. It could not, however, but sound a little strangely in the ears of a House of Commons, if their character was not entirely altered—if they still were in reality the guardians of the public purse. Were they not themselves understood, and bound to represent the republican part of our constitution; and was it thus the noble lord was inclined to treat America, because her government was a republic? He would maintain that it was a duty of the House of Commons to act in a republican spirit; and he was not afraid either to set his constitutional doctrine against that of the noble marquis, or to compare his zeal and respect for monarchy, with that so anxiously professed on the other side. On behalf of the people, and he spoke of them plainly and without nice or subtile distinctions, he asserted that they usurped no part of the executive government, by instituting an inquiry into the expenses of this branch of public service. They were bound to act with republican jealousy, not with unguarded confidence, at a time when distress was general, and when complaints were loud and universal. Fifty years ago Mr. Burke had observed on the monstrous contrast afforded by a petitioning people, and an addressing House of Commons—by a parliament which, when the country expected from them votes of censure, thought only of thanks and congratulations. But, lamentable as was the fact, such was now the state of things in this country; and beyond all doubt the noble lord would find nothing analogous under that government of which he had spoken with so much real or affected disdain. In spite of the regal contempt evinced by the noble marquis for the United States of America, she was, day by day, spreading her pacific conquests, and blessing with her rule a wider extent of territory than absolute monarchy ever cursed. [Hear, hear.] When he ascribed a feeling of contempt to the noble lord in referring to the American government, he founded his observation as much on tones and gestures as on articulate expressions. The former were frequently not less intelligible; but, in looking generally at diplomatic service, he could assure the House that he did not undervalue the importance of finding so many young men engaged abroad in qualifying themselves, without influence or reward, to undertake missions hereafter. He saw with equal pleasure persons of the same age and character, of rank and distinction in that House, who, though endowed with ample private fortunes, were assiduous in official business, and as eager to distinguish themselves by talent and industry, as professional men engaged in seeking their daily bread. This did not, however, make it less the duty of parliament to be as frugal, under our present circumstances, as was possible, or as the example of America could induce us to be; and he might add, that it would be well if this country were always represented abroad with the same ability, that had always marked the foreign missions of the United States. The allowances and emoluments attached to those missions were, he believed, too small; but this circumstance had never affected the zeal or address with which the duties of them were performed. The noble lord had said, that he did not wish to have the office of ambassador bid for; but he would suggest to the noble lord, that to increase the salary, was not exactly the way to prevent the consequence of which he had expressed his disapprobation; for, whenever the value of a commodity was increased, the number and importunity of its bidders were likely to be increased; and, though it did not become him to make any allusions to the private sacrifices which were often made to procure the appointments to which he was referring, yet it was well known that such sacrifices were made, and that appointments abroad were often repaid—gratefully repaid—by services at home. He feared that he had trespassed too long upon the House, and should conclude by expressing his concurrence in the motion. [Hear, hear!]

Mr. Robinson said, that after listening with unfeigned respect to the hon. and learned gentleman. it was with some surprise that he found, at the conclusion of his speech, that no part of his argument applied to the question before the House; or if it did in a single point, that it was in opposition and not in support of the motion before the House. With regard to the embassy at the court of St. Petersburgh, the hon. and learned gentleman was satisfied that it ought to be of the highest rank; and yet this was the very appointment of which the hon. mover had most bitterly complained. With regard to the motion, the House ought not to vote for it, unless they were also prepared for the result. So signal a proof of their utter want of confidence would undoubtedly convince ministers that they were no longer considered fit to discharge the duties of their respective offices, and that they ought to be succeeded by those in whom the House could repose its trust. The hon. and learned gentleman had travelled out of the question, in order to arraign the whole system of that foreign policy, which had been pursued for years, and had been sanctioned by successive votes of parliament, for the express purpose of calling on the House to support a motion, which they were told unequivocally must, if carried, lead to the downfal of the present administration. If the House did not think the present ministers fit to be trusted, was it any insult to them to announce, that those ministers would bow to their decision? When a ministry was told, day after day, that they had lost the public confidence, it seemed to him most extraordinary that it should be deemed unconstitutional in them to signify that, if it were so, they were ready to withdraw their services. This was the substance of his noble friend's intimation; and he thought it far more constitutional than the doctrine by which it had been condemned. So extraneous were the topics introduced in the speech just delivered, that he knew not how, after the argumentative statement of his noble friend, to enter into any reasoning that would not appear unnecessary. Those who had heard all the details embraced by his noble friend's explanation, and marked how dexterously they had been avoided by the hon. and learned gentleman, must have felt that a more clear or satisfactory defence never was made to a meagre, unsatisfactory, inconclusive and incomplete statement.

Mr. Creevey wished the House to consider, what was the actual state of the case. A motion was made for appointing a committee to inquire into certain heads of the expenditure, and this committee, if appointed, the noble lord informed them of his determination not to attend. He conceived this to be a most daring declaration, only to be surpassed by the statement of another secretary of state, that whatever parliament might resolve, he would not advise the Crown to act in conformity with its resolution; or by the conduct of that minister who had affirmed the impossibility of governing the House of Commons without corruption. These, indeed, were novelties. It was reserved for the present time to see parliament thus degraded and insulted by the ministers of the Crown. Either the House ought to vindicate its character by an assertion of its rights, or to adjourn at once, and no longer pretend to exercise functions that were the subject of ridicule and contempt. It had been contended, that the committee moved for would be a usurpation of the powers of government, and a disfigurement of the monarchy. Yet the whole subject, as now arranged, had grown out of the report of a committee in 1815, appointed on the recommendation of the noble lord himself. It was said, that no case was made out to justify a motion of this nature, although, whilst distress prevailed all over England, and a famine was raging in Ireland, lord Stewart and lord Burghersh were residing in London, with the salaries and appointments of foreign ministers. He could not, for his own part, conceive a stronger case, nor a grosser insult on that House, than to call such a committee as was contemplated by the present motion, a disfigurement of the monarchy of England. If the House did not think proper to inquire into these subjects, and did think proper to submit to such language, it had better make a new declaration of its rights. It would deserve the contempt of the country, if it submitted to the language which had been addressed to it that night.

Mr. Tierney said, that so extraordinary a speech as that of the noble lord would not permit him to give on this occasion a silent vote. All, however, that he proposed to say, would relate strictly to the question; which was, simply, whether any saving, and how much, could be effected in a particular department of the public service? It was matter of alarm, to witness after so temperate a speech as that of the hon. mover, the sort of attack which it had provoked from the noble lord. The smallness of the reduction which was contemplated could not render it an object of indifference; for they had lately seen the House, much to its honour, eager to abolish an office of 2,500*l.*—a sum much less than might obviously be saved by complying with the present motion. But the fact was, that so sore were ministers from the repeated instances of want of confidence, that at length they had resolved to make what they called their stand. Now, though it might be constitutional to declare an intention of throwing up office if a certain proceeding were adopted, it was still unwarrantable to circulate a threat of this kind previous to the discussion of it in parliament. He would remind country gentlemen that they would have a strict account one day to settle with their constituents. With respect to the committee of 1815, he knew that its estimate was founded upon no evidence, except a letter from Mr. Hamilton to Mr. Antrobus, and that it was framed by the noble lord himself. They were informed that retrenchment to the extent of 30,000*l.* was to be carried into that branch of the civil list which was provided to meet tradesmen's bills; and, though the noble lord hinted that his majesty's comforts might be abridged by it, he apprehended that every gentleman who was not too great a statesman to attend to his private affairs, must be sensible that a diminution of from 15 to 20 per cent had taken place since 1818 in this branch of expense. The noble lord thought that when he had introduced estimates lower than those to which a committee had agreed, he had done every thing that was necessary for economy; and that as the committee had fixed upon a certain sum, he was fully justified in paying it. There he agreed with the noble lord; for if the House consented to vote such sums, no doubt they must be paid. But that was not the exact question which they were now considering. The question was, whether he would be considered inimical to the Crown, who, feeling for the distresses which had come upon the country since the period he was speaking of, recollecting also that the House in the last session did consent to an address to the Crown, calling for economy and retrenchment, should now require a committee to inquire into one of the most extravagant branches of our expenditure, and to see whether an address founded on their report, and carried to the foot of the throne, might not be productive of great and necessary reduction? Now, that some reductions might be expected from the examinations of a committee, he was prepared to show. And here he could not but remark, that the noble lord forgot what had occurred since the committee of 1815. In that committee an estimate was proposed and adopted; but the next year the noble lord himself came down with estimates less by 26,000*l.* than those fixed by the committee. In another instance, the House knew there was a minister at Hamburgh, with 4,000*l.* a year, but it was found that a consul with 500*l.* would do all the business there just as well, and one was sent accordingly. If that had been the result of a committee, would it have been any thing the worse? No; but a committee they dreaded above all things, as something unconstitutional. The right hon. gentleman (Mr. Wynn), might smile, but he would defy him to select any committee, pick and choose them as he might, which would not find that considerable savings might be made, or which would uphold the necessity of all our present embassies, with all their enormous expense. He would, for instance, take that embassy to the Swiss Cantons. It was said, he knew, that there were at all times embassies to those Cantons from other powers. That Capo D'Istra was there, and that a nephew of Talleyrand had been there, as if sending the relative of one minister was a justification for employing the relative of another; but he would say, that if M. Talleyrand's nephew was sent to the Swiss Cantons under circumstances similar to those under which a relative of the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Wynn) was recently appointed to the same place, it was as rank a job as had ever been heard of; and that a committee, if appointed to inquire into the subject, would tell the right hon. gentleman the same thing. He said this in the utmost good temper with his right hon. friend (Mr. Wynn); and if he had not used that term before, it was not from any want of friendly feeling, but sitting at different sides of the House as they now did, the term he had used was much more convenient. He did not quarrel with the appointment of Mr. Wynn to this embassy, for if any person was necessary for the office, he thought he would be as likely to fill it well as any other; but he did object to the appointment, because he was convinced that it was not only unnecessary, but extravagant to keep up such an embassy at such an exorbitant expense: and, as he had said, a committee would so pronounce it. Formerly we had a minister at Bavaria, and he also acted as our representative at Frankfort. Now we had one to each. He did not object to our having a minister at Bavaria, but in a committee he would be able to show, that it was not necessary for us to keep one at Frankfort at such an expense as we were now incurring. He trusted he should get credit for being at all times well disposed liberally to remunerate the services of public men; but there were two matters to be considered here—whether we had more than were necessary; and, if not, what was it which could be called liberal remuneration. First with respect to the Swiss Cantons. The House had heard of one person having performed the duties of that office for 250*l.* a year. To be sure, the noble lord had described that individual as a man transported for his time, and he had added, that the sum given him was less than half of what he ought to have received. Now it might be true, that 500*l.* would not be too much, but, was there no difference between that and an income of twelve times the amount? He would not examine the noble lord in the committee to prove this; but he was sure he could easily satisfy a committee of its extravagance. The noble lord had sheltered himself under his official responsibility and the necessity of preserving the secrets of government, and protested against having those secrets submitted to the scrutiny of a committee. Now, the question before the House was, whether there were more public officers employed by this country at foreign courts than were necessary; and, if not, had those persons larger incomes than they ought to draw from the pockets of the people? What had this do with the safety of the state? Where was there any necessity for breaking cabinet secrecy in inquiring into such a subject? But, without putting the noble lord in any situation in which he might risk the violation of his oath, he (Mr. T.) would, if a committee were appointed, prove from the evidence of others, whose lips were not sealed up with the same cabinet secrecy, that we had more consuls abroad than were necessary, and that for the most part they were too highly paid. It was said, that many of the consuls complained that they were underpaid. Not a doubt of it. And at all times, there were the most pathetic complaints from several of our commercial and diplomatic agents abroad, that their services were not adequately rewarded. Still, however, we did not hear of any of them giving up their appointments in consequence. Many of them argued thus with themselves: "My official income is less than my expenses, and I am obliged to make up the deficiency out of my private property, but then I shall get a pension when I retire." And, in fact, it became a question of calculation, how much money they were to expend to acquire that pension. There was, however, this difference between former consuls and those of the present day—they had now a larger salary and also a larger pension on their return. Now, what was there to prevent this being made the subject of examination by a committee, in order to ascertain whether the pay and the pension were not more than circumstances required, and, of course, than the country ought to pay? That all the money taken out of the public purse by those gentlemen was absolutely spent by them abroad, was not the question; but, whether it was necessary that so much should be spent. In Paris, he knew, the sum paid to our ambassador was spent, for he had experienced a proof of it; and there was no one who shared the hospitality or enjoyed the conversation of sir C. Stewart, our ambassador there, who would not be satisfied that his official income was even exceeded. But then what moral effect did it produce to the nation, that sir C. Stewart should entertain every Englishman who visited Paris? What possible increase of influence or importance could it procure for this country, that Englishmen were daily eating their way through its ambassador's income abroad? A gentleman paid two guineas at the secretary of state's office for a passport, which had the effect of a letter of introduction to the ambassador, and then he ate it out in dinners at his table. Where was the moral effect of this to the nation? Now, in Paris, where there was such an influx of his countrymen, sir C. Stewart might give 10*l.* a head to get them back; while Mr. Bagot, at St. Petersburgh, where English society was scarce, might be willing to give 10*l.* to see one. So that, if the necessary entertainment of our countrymen abroad was a ground of keeping up such expensive establishments, it ought to be proportioned to the circumstances of the situation. In the cases he had mentioned, however, there was no such difference observed. He fully concurred with the noble lord in thinking that we should appear respectable in the eyes of foreign nations: but, was this expense necessary to maintain our respectability? He said, no. The character of the English nation was to be kept up abroad by the respectability in which its ministers were held at home, and if they failed in securing that, not an income of 50,000*l.* a year to each of our ambassadors, to be laid out in the most sumptuous entertainments, could procure it. With those gentlemen who looked upon the present motion as tending to overturn the constitution he would not argue; but if there were those who thought that a saving ought to be made in every department where it could be effected without injury to the public service, he would say, why not go to the committee and inquire in what manner this could be done? His own firm opinion was, that without any very close pruning of salaries or fees, 50,000*l*. a year might be saved to the country by the inquiries of a committee. As to the assertion, that economy in our embassies would lessen our respectability with other nations, it was idle and groundless. He believed other nations would be very glad to follow such an economical example. But then, in came the noble lord's argument—the moral effect of rich embassies. The moral effect was the word he still harped on; and as prince Metternich and prince Talleyrand, and count this, and count somebody else, kept up large establishments, for the moral effect, no doubt, we also were to keep up similar extravagance for a similar moral effect.—Another reason why he was anxious for the appointment of this committee was, a consideration of the good effect it would produce out of doors. The people would hence learn, that the declarations about economy and retrenchment were not mere empty sounds, but that a saving would be made wherever it could be effected. They would learn, that the fears of the noble lord about the loss of his place, and the tone he assumed, perhaps from being well informed as to the disposition of his supporters, should be no farther bars to just economy. The question, the noble lord said, was now, whether he should keep his place or not? and this was declared with the view of catching any wavering votes. Now he (Mr. T.) did not care whether that threat was really sincere, or whether it would be possible to find on his (Mr. T's.) side of the House, any man who would venture into office, after the noble lord should have quitted it; but he hoped the country gentlemen, to whom this was held out, would not be frightened by the hacknied threat. The noble lord had talked of a peddling system on his (Mr. T's) side; but, was it not a peddling system of the worst kind to be thus constantly talking of what was never intended? He had no fears at all about the resignation of ministers, and the country gentlemen need by no means to be alarmed on that account. It would, indeed, be a surprise to hear that my lord Londonderry had resigned—that lord Liverpool had retired from office—and he could not imagine any thing more indescribably comical, than the chancellor of the exchequer's face after a resignation. [Hear, and a laugh.] There was, however, no danger of any such disastrous event occurring—no danger of the noble lord and his colleagues being turned out of office; but he would tell the country gentlemen what there was a danger of. There was a danger of their being turned out of their counties—a danger that some gentlemen who made fine speeches out of doors about economy and reduction, which they contradicted by their votes whenever these questions came to be discussed within, might be turned out. He trusted, however, that this would not be caused by their votes on the present occasion. When he considered the peculiar character of the present motion, the obvious mode which it presented of making an efficient saving to the country, the necessities of the people calling so loudly for reduction, he trusted he should be in a majority on the present, as well as on the occasions of the two lords of the Admiralty and one of the postmasters-general. If not, then he would say that the marquis of Salisbury was an injured man. It was dealing very hardly with that venerable nobleman, who had so long served his country, and who was willing to serve it to the end of his life. It would seem as if ministers said, "send off the noble lord, if you please; turn him loose in his native woods, if you will; but touch the Swiss embassy, disturb Mr. Wynn in his new appointment, and then, out we must go; as he is one of our very particular friends, and we cannot stay after him." He trusted, however, that such a threat would be of no avail in the present case. He would not press the subject farther, but would conclude by voting for the motion. [Cheers.]

Mr. Wynn said, he was surprised to hear it maintained, that if ministers could no longer keep the confidence of the House, they would be wrong in announcing their intention to resign. He had always understood it to be constitutional doctrine that the loss of the confidence of parliament ought necessarily to be followed by a resignation of their places by any set of ministers. With respect to the motion he should oppose it, because he thought it would be establishing the dangerous precedent of placing a committee of that House, like a committee of public safety, over the ministry for foreign affairs; for how was it possible to come at the points sought for, if the motion were carried, without an examination of the ministry? His hon. and learned friend had asked, what the House of Commons was for, if not for inquiries of the present description Now he would defy his hon. and learned friend to prove in any one instance, that a committee had ever exercised such a control over a ministry, as this examination would necessarily imply. It was said, that a committee on the same subject was appointed in 1815, but it should be remembered, that that committee was one appointed on the responsibility of ministers, and that it never had, and never was intended to have, the power of inquiring which it was proposed to give to the one now moved for. The constant practice of the constitution was, to place these matters in the discretion of the ministers and if that confidence were abused, the ministers were removed by address to the throne. The right hon. gentleman then went on to contend against the possibility of attempting, with any hope of success, an inquiry which would embrace a detail of the expenses incurred in the several courts of Europe. It would be rather inconvenient, he thought, to bring witnesses from Naples and from Constantinople, to state what were the usual charges of living in those places. It was also necessary to shew a decent splendor at foreign courts; for however unnecessary this might appear in the eye of the philosopher, it made a great impression on the mass of mankind. He recollected that the late Mr. Sheridan once drew a picture of the Speaker going up with an address to the throne, and having no other attendance than the sergeant carrying an umbrella over him, and said he would receive the same respect as if conveyed in a state coach. But he (Mr. W.) was of a different opinion. It was necessary that public functionaries should have those external marks of honour which did not indeed change the man, but enabled him to make a greater impression on the people at large. He then went on to remark upon America, and the affinity of interest between that country and England, and observed, that if the functionaries of America were not even underpaid, their rate of salary ought to be no rule to us, who were in such different internal circumstances. He was convinced that the interests in question could not be properly submitted to a committee, and that if the House agreed to the motion, it would act in a most unprecedented manner.

After a short reply, the House divided: Ayes 147. Noes 274. Majority against the motion 127.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, May 16.

Absentees.] Sir T. Lethbridge said, he had a petition to present signed by 600 respectable inhabitants of the county of Somerset. He hoped the chancellor of the exchequer would not be displeased with him for presenting the petition, as the prayer of it was rather unusual—it prayed the House to lay on additional taxes. From the tax which the petitioners proposed, which was in itself politic and beneficial, an ample fund might be supplied to make up for other taxes which might be repealed for the relief of the country. The petitioners felt for the distress of the country, and they called the attention of the House to a circumstance collateral to that distress, the number of Absentees who were gone to take up their residence in foreign parts. The greater part of these were persons of quality and fortune, not only from England but from the whole empire. The petitioners calculated that in the city of Paris alone, there resided 10,000 families of English, Irish, and Scots: that these families consisted on an average of five individuals each; and the petitioners went the length of saying, that these persons do not spend less than a guinea a day each, or 50,000*l.* per diem, 350,000*l.* a week, and 18 millions a year [laugh]. This calculation, which certainly seemed at first sight enormous, was for Paris alone; while Boulogne, Calais, Tours, Bruges, Brussels, and almost all other cities of the continent were filled with English, who were in the habit of spending large sums. In these statements the petitioners were in part borne out by the noble marquis, who, in the course of his enlightened speech of last night, had said that no one could walk in any of the large towns of the continent without imagining that the British formed a large portion of the inhabitants. The petitioners also stated, that they viewed with alarm, the practice of sending abroad youth for education, a practice prejudicial to morals, and tending to sap our holy faith. The petitioners spoke of the injury to the revenue from the absence of so many persons of fortune, and further prayed the House to impose a tax on the property or income of placemen. They hoped also that the House would prevent money being paid to pensioners, sinecurists, placemen, or public annuitants abroad, except on actual service. He thought the feeling which actuated the persons who resided abroad an extraordinary one; for though the bonus was large, he would rather live in England on 50*l.* a year, subject to all the privations of such an income, than leave the country in an hour of difficulty. The bonus might be pleaded in excuse of the absentees; but it also might be pleaded in justification of the House, if they imposed a tax equal to the share of burthens which the absentees thus contrived to escape. There was another great temptation to reside abroad, from the advantage gained on transferring money to the continent, which on sending 100*l.* to Paris, was about 25 or 26 per cent [a laugh.] If the agricultural distress could be relieved, through the medium of a new tax of this sort, the suggestion of the petitioners might be beneficially adopted.

Mr. Ricardo wished to set the hon. baronet right, as to the state of the exchange, which was now, he could assure him, very nearly at par; and it was impossible it could be far otherwise, because with a metallic circulation in this country and in France, the exchange could never vary more than from ½ to ¾ per cent. As to the petition, he should be sorry to see its prayer granted; because a tax on the property or income of absentees, would hold out a direct encouragement to them to take away their capital, as well as their persons. Now, we had at any rate their capital, which was useful, though not so useful as if they also stayed at home. What most surprised him was, that the hon. baronet should bring such a petition forward, at the very time that he was proposing in the agricultural committee a resolution which might make all the articles of life, and provisions in particular, attainable at the dearest rate. The hon. baronet was for high duties; the imposition of which would be the readiest means of compelling people of small fortunes to quit the kingdom. Of all the evils complained of, he (Mr. R.) was still disposed to think the corn laws the worst. He conceived that were the corn laws once got rid of, and our general policy in these subjects thoroughly revised, this would be the cheapest country in the world; and that, instead of our complaining that capital was withdrawn from us, we should find that capital would come hither from all corners of the civilized world. Indeed, such a result must be certain, if we could once reduce the national debt—a reduction, which, although by many considered to be impracticable, he considered by no means to be so. That great debt might be reduced by a fair contribution of all sorts of property—he meant, that, by the united contribution of the mercantile, the landed, and he would add, the funded interest, the national debt might be certainly got rid of. If this were done, and if the government would pursue a right course of policy as to the corn laws, England would be the cheapest country in which a man could live; and it would rise to a state of prosperity, in regard to population and riches, of which, perhaps, the imaginations of hon. gentlemen could at present form no idea. [Hear, hear.]

Mr. Denis Browne dwelt on the evils suffered in Ireland from the absentee system. All taxes were on consumption; so that they all fell on the resident gentry, while the absentees entirely escaped. One half of the men of property of Ireland were calculated to be absentees. It was disgraceful that in a country of statesmen and philosophers, such an evil as this should exist, and that we should despair of a remedy. He was disposed to apply himself to this practical evil, and not to draw sun-beams out of cucumbers.

Mr. H. Gurney said, he conceived the chancellor of the exchequer would have no small difficulty in assessing the tax, proposed by the petitioners on the income of absentees; though he had always thought the abolition of the property tax, and the thus throwing the weight of the whole taxation on articles of domestic consumption, was the greatest financial error committed since the peace. He entirely distrusted the statement of the petitioners, as to the enormous sums they conceived to be spent by Englishmen abroad; though they would naturally think that these millions, if spent, would be much more conveniently spent at Bath. In fact, the English abroad were, for the most part, either mere travellers, or persons living very economically; whilst, in the case of those who reduced large establishments in this country, and remained on the continent for any length of time, in most instances the chief part of their revenues went to pay off debts and incumbrances previously contracted, and took that direction at home, in which the money would be most usefully applied.—Mr. Gurney stated, that far from supporting the prayer of the petition, he was a friend to free ingress and egress to and from the kingdom [hear!]. There should, however, be no inequality in this respect. If the rich man might go abroad for convenience or amusement, surely the poor man should be allowed to go abroad for subsistence. [hear!]. He alluded to the laws against the emigration of artificers, which had recently been brought to his notice by a paragraph in a newspaper.—The hon. member read the following paragraph which appeared in the Morning Chronicle of Monday last:—"Saturday, Michael Donaghue, George Burgess, John Elliott, and Thomas Checkers, engineers, were brought to Bow-street, charged with attempting to leave the kingdom, for the purpose of conveying a knowledge of their art to foreigners, against the statute. The prisoners, together with a man named Featherstone, were in the employment of Mr. Martineau, an engineer, in White-cross-street. Some weeks ago a man named Craven made his appearance among the workmen there, and by liberal offers seduced them from their master and engaged them to go to Paris, where he had established several manufactories. Mr. Martineau got information of it, and Featherstone was apprehended before he left London. The others were followed to Dover, and apprehended there by Bishop, one of the principal officers. Bishop had a warrant in his pocket against Craven, but he had embarked before the officer reached Dover. The prisoners were committed for want of bail."—He knew the law under which these men were proceeded against was an old one; but whatever justice there might be in proceeding against Craven, as the seducer of artificers to leave the country, it was an extraordinary hardship that the men themselves should be punished for attempting to take their industry to a place where they saw the best choice of gaining a livelihood. He thought it incumbent on him to bring this case before the House, as a conversation had formerly taken place on the subject, between the hon. member for Aberdeen and the president of the board of trade, which led him to hope that this oppressive law might be repealed, and the poor man and the rich placed, as in all common sense, and common fairness they ought to be, on a footing of equal freedom. [Hear! hear!]

Mr. Dickinson thought that his right hon. friend (Mr. D. Brown) had put this question on its right footing: he had fixed the attention of the House to the main point of the petitioners—not to those who were travelling for their health, or to the youth of this country for instruction, for they too well knew the advantages of foreign travel—but to those who had fixed themselves habitually on the continent, and whose object was, to avoid the taxes, and expend their incomes in a foreign country, thereby stimulating the commerce and the agriculture of France with that capital which ought to stimulate the commerce and agriculture of England. What would happen when his hon. friend's (Mr. Ricardo's) project of paying off the national debt was accomplished, he could not pretend to say; but this he knew, that such a payment had been a vision that had inhabited the brain of many a speculative enthusiast, from the institution of that debt up to the present hour. He also knew, from experience and history, that emigrations were dangerous to the countries from which they sprung, and advantageous where they went: Holland, within the last two centuries, was a country almost wholly made by emigrations; and the revocation of the edict of Nantes had, according to historians, furnished 50,000 emigrants, who had increased the prosperity of England, of Belgium, and of Prussia, and inflicted a blow on France from which she had not yet recovered. He doubted the practicability of a tax on emigrants, but he would put it ad verecundiam to the emigrants themselves. He remembered to have read an anecdote of a Persian ambassador at Paris, who brought with him a sod of his native earth, and his first duty in a morning was to reverence it, in order that it might remind him that every act of that day should be something done for the benefit of Persia. If our stationary English emigrants had a sod, it would remind them, that every deed of theirs, while they were expending their incomes in France, would be something done to the detriment of England. In this absence of their patriotism, he would wish to press upon them one of the best maxims of antiquity: "Spartam nactus es; hanc exorna."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer thought the hon. member for Portarlington and other members had sufficiently pointed out the objections to the tax proposed, and the impossibility of carrying their wishes into effect. Of the many modes of taxing absentees, which had been suggested to him, none appeared to him practicable. Among the many absentees from Ireland, there were not a few who resided in England, and who, consequently, did not thereby evade their share of the taxes imposed generally upon the empire. He had taken considerable pains to ascertain the proportion of taxes which might have been borne by the absentees on the continent, had they remained in England, and he found that it did not exceed 5,000*l.* a-year, out of a taxation of between six and seven millions. Many of these absentees had found themselves compelled to go abroad, for the sake, probably, of retrenchment, or with a view to the arrangement of their disordered affairs. With respect to those persons who went abroad for the purpose of laying down a system of economy, who were vegetating rather than living, in different parts of Europe, he believed the most effectual way to bring them home, and to keep them here, would be to make this country as comfortable as possible for them. This would be in some measure effected by the fall of prices, but there were circumstances which must always contribute to make this country a dearer place of residence, than most parts of the continent. However, in proportion as prices became more equalized with those of the continent, the temptation to reside abroad would cease. For he was persuaded that there was not an individual, who possessed the common feelings that belonged to an Englishman, who would not, if he could, prefer living in his own country to a residence on a foreign shore.

Sir I. Coffin said, that the British officers residing abroad were driven there, not by inclination, but by poverty.

Mr. W. Smith expressed a wish, that the chancellor of the exchequer would bring in a bill to remove the restrictions on the lower classes of mechanics, with respect to emigration. There was no law which prevented a man from carrying his capital to any country in Europe, and establishing a manufactory there; but, if one of his workmen attempted to follow him, he was liable to be sent to prison. Such a state of things had been most properly described as harsh and tyrannical. The right hon. gentleman had truly said, that the best way of inducing emigrants to return to this country would be, to make England a cheaper and more comfortable place of residence. This was not to be effected, however, by raising the price of corn, which was one of the objects of the bill now passing through the House. To suppose that the condition of the people could be materially improved by a reduction of the interest of the debt was one of the grossest delusions that had ever been practised on the country. Reduction of taxation might afford some relief; and to that object ought the efforts of parliament to be mainly directed.

Ordered to lie on the table.

Embassy to the Swiss Cantons.] Mr. Warre rose to bring forward the motion, of which he had given notice, relative to the embassy to the Swiss Cantons. He could assure the House, that in return for the favour of their attention, he would confine himself strictly to the subject of his motion, without going into the consideration of the general question, which was discussed last night. The object at which he aimed was a reduction of the expense of our embassies. By the return which had been laid on the table, it appeared, that from the year 1750 to 1783, four ministers had been sent to the Swiss Cantons at a salary of 1,572*l.* From the year 1783 to 1792, an individual named Braun, who had been alluded to last night, discharged the functions of chargé d'affaires in the Swiss Cantons for a salary of only 280*l.* Whether, in the reductions which were made in 1786, Mr. Pitt bore in mind what had taken place at Paris three years before, he could not pretend to say, but he could assure the noble marquis, that if he took the liberty of alluding to the salary of the American ambassador, it was neither with the design of subverting the monarchy, nor from any desire to wage war upon the constitution. If the general sort of charge which had been thrown out by the noble marquis meant any thing, it would operate as a veto against ever naming the salaries of American ambassadors, lest the parallel should have the effect of overturning the existing institutions of Great Britain. He would venture, then, to suggest the possibility, that when Mr. Pitt reduced the salary of the minister to the Swiss Cantons, he recollected the fact of Dr. Franklin, who had been sent by the rising republic of America as ambassador to the court of Paris, and who in point of diplomatic skill completely over-matched our own ambassador, lord Stormont, at a salary of 1,000*l.* a year, including the expenses of his secretary. The noble marquis had become so fastidious that he could not bear to hear any allusion made to the establishments on the other side of the Atlantic; but he (Mr. W.) could not see why it was not quite as justifiable to allude to the institutions of the modern republic of America, either for the purposes of illustration, or with a view of holding them up to the imitation of our own country, as it was to advert to the ancient republics of Greece or Rome.—He now came to the period at which the scale of expenditure, with regard to the Swiss missions, underwent a change, namely, from 1792 to 1798. It was true, that the scale adopted by Mr. Pitt was much higher in point of salary than that received by Mr. Braun; but he begged the House to consider what was the state of Europe at the period when Mr. Wickham began to negociate with the French republic in the year 1796. Buonaparte was at that time victorious in Italy, Belgium was conquered, and, in fact, Switzerland was the single isolated spot in Europe in which we were able to establish a mission. He begged leave to call the attention of the House to a document which proved the importance of this mission, arising out of the peculiar circumstances of Europe at that period.—[Here the hon. member read an extract from a letter addressed by our minister plenipotentiary to the Swiss cantons to the minister of the French republic, desiring to be made acquainted with the disposition of the French republic towards a negotiation for the general pacification of Europe.]—From the year 1799 to 1814, with the exception of a special mission for a short time after the peace of Amiens, the state of Europe rendered it impossible for this country to send any embassy to the Swiss cantons. At the peace of Amiens, lord Liverpool, then lord Hawkesbury, did send a gentleman of the name of Moore on a sort of special mission, who remained out of the country a few months and then returned. The next period was that from 1814 to 1820, when Mr. Stratford Canning was sent as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the Swiss Cantons. The noble lord had stated last night, that the object of Mr. Canning's mission was the organization and restoration of the Swiss territory; and he had referred to the treaty on the table, of April 1815, from which it certainly appeared, that a considerable degree of diplomatic business had been transacted in Switzerland. The declaration of the allied powers, in regard to the Helvetic confederation, was made on the 20th March, 1815; on the 3rd of April in the same year, the diet of Zurich was attended by the different ministers of the allied powers, among whom Mr. Canning was present on the part of this country, and baron Krudener, as chargé d'affaires for the Russian government. The result of their deliberations was, the re-incorporation of the three cantons of Le Valais, Geneva, and Neufchatel. A protocol was also signed by the different ministers relative to certain cessions made by the king of Sardinia to the Swiss Cantons. The object of the allied powers was to restore Switzerland to its former state in point of territory, and to guarantee its neutrality; and he believed the territorial state of Switzerland was now just what it was in 1796. The argument of the noble marquis, therefore, for the necessity of a minister plenipotentiary to the courts of Wirtemburg and Bavaria, on the ground of the territory of those countries having increased, could not apply to Switzerland. The noble marquis had said, that the House was not to estimate the necessity of a mission to any country from the quantity of direct business which might be transacted there. He (Mr. W.) professed himself utterly at a loss to conjecture the nature of the diplomatic intercourse between this country and the Swiss Cantons. If dispatches were sent there with a view of being afterwards forwarded somewhere else, why, he should be glad to know, were they not sent directly to the ministers to whom they were addressed? The avowed object of the mission in 1815 was the maintenance of the neutrality of Switzerland. Now, how could neutrality be violated except by hostile aggression from without? France was sufficiently disposed to violate that neutrality in 1798, and it was possible that she might be disposed to violate it now. But it was not the resident minister in the Swiss Cantons who could first discover such hostile dispositions and make the necessary communications to the secretary of state. It was the minister of the hostile government, who, if he had any eyes or ears, would first be able to observe the increase of military force, the disposition to infringe existing treaties, and other indications of a hostile character, which he would of course communicate to his government at home. There could be no necessity, therefore, for so expensive a mission as that of 1815, for the mere purpose of preserving the neutrality of Switzerland. Neither he nor his friends around him could be charged with inconsistency, on the ground of having formerly supported the establishment of 1815, for it would be recollected, that when the noble lord brought down an amended estimate for that establishment, the right hon. member for Knaresborough (Mr. Tierney), moved for a committee of inquiry, and, subsequently, on the motion for bringing up the report, the same right hon. member made another attempt, by proposing an amendment, to induce the House to pause before it sanctioned that establishment.—It was sometimes urged as an argument in support of diplomatic establishments, that it was necessary to keep them up on a scale of relative intercourse, and that if a foreign power sent an embassy to this country, it was necessary for us to return the compliment. Now, he intreated the House to mark how impossible it was to apply this argument in the case of Switzerland. Let the House mark the conduct of Switzerland with regard to her missions. Fixed missions she had none; whatever embassies she had sent to this country had been special. The last mission which Switzerland sent to this country, was in 1815; so that as soon as her neutrality had been guaranteed, and her thanks recorded in the face of Europe, she recalled this special mission. If he were asked, why he had not objected to the establishment of the Swiss mission in 1816 or 1817, he would answer by an observation which he had often made, and the truth of which he believed was undeniable; namely, that that House, notwithstanding all its collective wisdom and all its united talents, could never attend to more than one thing at a time. As a proof of this, he begged to recall to their recollection the exclusive interest which the discussions relative to the late Queen had excited in that House. During the time that such questions were under discussion, he would ask if the present question would have obtained a hearing? He would bear in mind that during that time the question of parliamentary reform itself could not be brought forward, as there was not even a chance of getting the House to listen to it. Immediately previous to this they had the Manchester business. In 1815, the time when the civil list was discussed, they were engaged, not in settling whether a pacific ambassador should be sent to this or the other court, but whether that military monster which had taken hold of the continental nations, should also take hold of us—whether we should in the time of profound peace, keep up a standing army to the amount of 99,000 men? In 1817, there was the suspension of the Habeas Corpus, and the passing of the Indemnity bills; and, in 1818, there was the immediate prospect of a dissolution of parliament, and the members were more intent upon what was to go on out of doors, than what was going on within. It would be borne in mind, however, that for twenty months previous to the time at which the appointment was made, there had been no minister plenipotentiary sent out. That the present minister had been sent, some might be disposed to call a political arrangement, and others an accommodation granted to a party. He hoped, however, that he should be indulged in what he had to state. He had no objection whatever to the gentleman who held the mission, or to the mode in which he had been appointed. His sole objection was to the mission itself. The noble marquis had said, that the views of ministers had been misunderstood; but he would beg leave to refer the noble lord to what took place when the address of last June was voted. That address to the throne was for economy and retrenchment generally, and particularly for a revision of the civil list. Now, the House would never surely have alluded to that subject in an address to the sovereign, if they had considered all the details of the civil list as permanently settled four or five years ago. He would not have called the attention of the House to the question, unless it had been for the necessity of some alteration in our system of expenditure. An alteration must take place: and if the House would go into no inquiry, and propose no measure to that effect, he knew not how they could appear before the tribunal of the country. If it had been found that during twenty months they had had no mission to the Swiss Cantons it was in vain to appeal to the precedent of count Capo d'Istria, or of any other chargé d'affaires. If we had suffered nothing during these twenty months, he would ask the noble lord why Mr. Disbrowe should not have been continued? It might indeed be said, that the civil-list bill, regulating those missions, had passed. His noble friend the member for Huntingdon had endeavoured to procure a delay in the passing of that bill, by moving a delay in the bringing up of the report. He (Mr. W.) had supported that motion for delay, and therefore there was no inconsistency in his present proposal. The noble lord had, if he rightly understood him, said, that the mission now was put upon the same footing as in 1792. It would be borne in mind, however, that lord Robert Fitzgerald was appointed in 1792, and that being, if not the first year of the war, at least the year immediately previous to its commencement, rendered the case quite different from the present. The noble marquis had indulged, good-humouredly he would allow, in accusations against the proposers of such motions as this; but he hoped the noble marquis would bear in mind that he had encouraged the bringing forward of such proposals. At the very threshold and opening of those discussions with which the House had been occupied, the noble lord had said, and called upon the House to mark his words, that he admitted the general necessity of retrenchment, that he recognised the principle to its full extent, and only wanted to have the particular instances pointed out to him in order that he might agree to them. Now, he would take the noble marquis on his own ground. He would show that Mr. Disbrowe had performed all the duties upon a salary of 1,595*l.* subject to a deduction of 10 per cent, while the new establishment would cost 3,900*l.*, subject, of course, to the same deduction. Comparing the one of these sums with the other, the continuation of Mr. Disbrowe, which had produced no inconvenience during twenty months, would produce a saving of a considerable sum. This was the sum of the saving of which he contended; and he felt that he stood upon strong grounds. It exceeded the salary of either of the lay lords of the Admiralty. or that of the joint-postmaster-general. He had not alluded to this particular case because of any unfitness on the part of the gentleman who held the office, but it ought to be borne in mind that there were others which were in every respect worse. He would have held it unfair to select Mr. Wynn as the sole object against which measures ought to be directed. He was aware that the measures, against which his motion was directed, might be defended, on the ground that they had been settled in the year 1814 or 1815, when the troops of the country had just returned victorious from Waterloo, and the noble marquis had come from his conference with the potentates of Europe. At that time parliament could not refuse the noble marquis any thing which he might choose to ask, but he should doubt whether the noble marquis would hope for such complaisance from the House now. He would like to hear him propose now the building of Dutch fortresses, or the granting of a loan to Prussia. He hoped that he had confined himself to the general question, and that he had so conducted it as not to give unnecessary offence to those against whom it appeared in the particular application to be directed.—The hon. gentleman then moved a series of resolutions, detailing the history of the mission from 1750 down to the present time, to the effect stated in his speech. To the last resolution he begged the particular attention of the House, for it was the only substantial resolution which put the question in issue. It was "That it appears to this House, that without detriment to the public service, the charge of the Mission to the Swiss Cantons might be reduced to a scale of expenditure not exceeding the sum annually received by lord Robert Fitzgerald and Mr. Wickham, from May, 1792 to January, 1798, and for which sum the duties of the said Mission have practically been performed for one year and eight months preceding the recent appointment of Mr. Henry Wynn."

The Marquis of Londonderry said, that having had occasion last night to address some observations to the House upon this subject, and considering the very liberal and certainly very fair manner in which the hon. member brought forward the question, he should not think it necessary to trouble the House at any length. He trusted that if the House last night, would not consent to have the estimates generally submitted to a committee last night, they would not take this particular branch of them for inquiry, unless there appeared to be something very incorrect in it. If this part was as correct as the rest, why should it be selected for inquiry? If the House consented to this proposal, how many more would they put at issue on the same principle. It was the more necessary to take their stand here, because it appeared to be one of a series of motions of the same kind. The hon. gentleman had no objection to the individual who filled the office in question; he admitted his station in the country to have fitted him for the office; he admitted, too, that his having had a pension was an additional recommendation. Under these circumstances the selection of Switzerland must appear surprising. This particular choice seemed to have been made from regard to the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Tierney), who would no longer call the president of the board of control (Mr. Wynn), his right hon. friend, though others continued that courtesy towards him. This was the usual practice of the right hon. gentleman, to withdraw his friendship from those who happened to join his majesty's government. In this way only could he account for the particular attention now given to the mission to Switzerland. But it appeared that no sooner should this motion be disposed of, than another hon. member would come forward with a similar proposition respecting another mission. If, therefore, he last night objected to going before a committee, because, though he had great confidence in committees of that House, he did not think a committee fit for such a purpose, much more must he object to the present proposition. Already Wirtemburg and Bavaria were almost on the notice for addressing the Crown that the missions to them should cease. If, then, it was not the habit of America, that favourite example, to ask such an account of the executive—for a very large sum had been voted that missions might be sent to South America, without inquiring what character of missions, or what scale of expense, was to be adopted, for Buenos Ayres, for Colombia, Chili, or Peru—were we to become less monarchical than America? The present proposition went to establish the practice, that if it could be proved that an individual had ever received less money on any occasion, or if there had been a cessation in any respect in a mission, then the presumption must be against ministers, and the onus must be thrown on them of justifying their conduct not only in the face of parliament, but in the face of the public at large. If he were to submit to such a practice, the House must indeed think him unfit for his office. An argument more strained than the hon. member's through all his details to establish his conclusion, he had never heard. It was founded particularly on the case of Mr. Braun, who had been there from 1782, to 1792. When he had adverted to this case last night, he had supposed that this appointment had been a sentence of degradation—a punishment for diplomatic offences. He had since inquired what had been the fact, and when he stated it, it would perhaps decide the question, whether there ought to be a wish to imitate all the circumstances of this case. He was not sure that it would be thought convenient or more economical by the gentlemen opposite, that all dispatches should be written in the French language. Mr. Braun had been an old Swiss officer on half-pay, attached, it was true, to this country. Mr. Norton, whose secretary he had been, had left him behind him there; but why no change had been made for nine years afterwards, he (lord L.) had not been able to ascertain. It might have been done to mark some displeasure felt towards the Swiss Cantons. It was not known what feeling might then have existed towards Switzerland. It was, however, a common mode of showing a feeling of coldness to appoint a minister of inferior rank, or with inferior salary. Those things had often been done; but if the doctrine now contended for were established, it could not happen in future, without the consideration of all its circumstances on the floor of the House. He believed Mr. Braun had been a very honest man; but he could not trace the influence of his mission in that country. From the period of 1792, when hostilities broke out, he could discover nothing to lead him to believe that any valuable consequences had resulted from Mr. Braun's having resided during those years as our minister in Switzerland. He did not think it safe to adopt the plan of the hon. member, and to withdraw our minister at the conclusion of a negotiation, and then wait till an extraordinary courier should announce that the neutrality had been actually violated. He did not believe, that our minister, when sent back, would find the country in the best spirit to co-operate with him. He could not agree to the proposition, that we should not have a minister, unless there should be active employment for him where he resided. It was his business to ascertain what counsels they were about to adopt, and what other counsels might be suggested to them. Upon considering the facts detailed by the hon. member, he would contend that the whole stream of policy was in favour of the present appointment. Mr. Braun had been there from 1783; but in opening his case the hon. member had forgotten the different circumstances in which Mr. Wickham and lord Robert Fitzgerald had occupied the same station. Lord Fitzgerald had been there for four years, from 1792 to 1796, when he was succeeded by Mr. Wickham who, for a short time, had been chargé d'affaires, but was afterwards minister plenipotentiary till the peace of Amiens. But really he was fatiguing the House by proceeding in this argument, since no objection had been made to the individual. He could not see that any ground had been stated for the motion. Though the hon. member had introduced it in a very fair and liberal manner, still he must say that there appeared in other quarters a very uncharitable desire to run down the character of a private individual. He trusted, however, that the House would oppose itself to that desire, and would protect the characters of public men against dark hints and unfounded insinuations. He should not trouble the House with any further observations at present, as he was confident, from the vote of last night, that gentlemen had made up their minds to travel in the paths of their ancestors, which had conducted the country to greatness, power, and honour, and not to deviate from them into principles which were not admitted to be sound even by such states as acknowledged a democratical form of government.

Lord Normanby said, that though he contemplated no such effect as the resignation of the foreign secretary, he nevertheless indulged the hope of seeing the noble marquis continue in office, without the appendage of a Swiss Envoy, at an expense to the country of 5,000*l.* a year. He disclaimed all personal objections. He did not deny the competency of the gentleman who held that appointment to fulfil the duties, if by any accident duties were imposed on him. But he did resist the extravagant and extraordinary salary which he was to receive. For what was that large salary granted? For nothing that he could fancy, but to allow the hon. Envoy to enjoy the rural romance which Swiss scenery afforded, or to indulge those pleasures of a magnificent hospitality, to which the noble marquis, in his speech of last night, had attached such importance.

The previous question was moved on the first resolutions and carried. On the last resolution the House divided: Ayes, 141; Noes, 247. Majority against the motion, 106.

IRISH POOR EMPLOYMENT BILL.] Mr. Goulburn rose to move for leave to bring in a bill "for the Employment of the Poor in certain districts in Ireland." The chief object of the measure was, he said, to enable the population to earn their subsistence by their own exertions, as the greatest and most substantial benefit that could be conferred upon them. It was well known, that there many large tracts of land in Ireland utterly impervious, where there was little or no communication, and where crimes were frequent from the means afforded of escape. By the present measure, it was proposed to place a certain sum at the disposal of the lord lieutenant, to be by him applied to the construction of new roads, in those districts where the suffering was most severe. The work, it was intended, should be executed, not under local authority, but by officers appointed immediately by government. A want of means had hitherto prevented the counties in question from undertaking this improvement but as soon as the advantages were realized, and the estimates of their expense submitted to the grand juries, no doubt could be entertained of their disposition to repay the sums advanced.

Sir W. De Crespigny felt anxious that the benefits of this measure should be rendered permanent.

Mr. S. Rice warmly approved of the bill, as one of the wisest measures that could be adopted.

Sir E. O'Brien complimented the liberality of the English people for the manner in which they had come forward, and expressed himself favourable to the bill.

Mr. Brougham was willing to give his consent to the bill, provided he did not bind himself by so doing to any approbation of the conduct of government, with respect to the affairs of Ireland.

Leave was given to bring in the bill.

Friday, May 17.

Distress in Ireland.] The Earl of Darnley adverted to what he had said on Wednesday, respecting the distressed state of a part of Ireland, and wished to know whether the noble earl was now prepared to give the date of the first communication from the government of Ireland respecting an apprehended scarcity in that country.

The Earl of Liverpool said, he had no hesitation in giving the information requested. The marquis Wellesley in the course of a few days after he had taken upon him, the government of Ireland, had resorted to measures for the purpose of obtaining information as to the state of Ireland, both politically and with regard to the supply of food. It was found, that at that period there was a great abundance of articles of food, and at low prices, and no apprehensions were entertained of any scarcity. He thought it right here to observe that great delicacy and difficulty were necessarily involved in any question of interfering with regard to the supply of food; as such interference tended to do much mischief by interfering with individual speculations, and enhancing the price of articles of the first necessity. The only measure resorted to in this part of the empire with reference to such a subject, was the measure during the scarcity of 1800, of granting a bounty upon the importation of grain, and he believed all were now agreed that that measure did more harm than good, as the grain would have been sold at a cheaper rate, had the bounty not been given. He was fully aware that such a state of distress, under peculiar circumstances might exist, as to render it absolutely necessary for government to interfere; but still it was highly essential that such interference should only take place when it became unavoidable. It was in this view of the subject that the state of Ireland was looked to; and though it was desirable to avoid all interference on the part of government as long as possible, yet a strict watch was kept as to the state of that part of Ireland where distress was beginning to appear. It was found that only one article of food, that of potatoes, had failed, and that much distress had in consequence arisen in the county of Clare; but it was found at the same time that the oats were used for the purposes of illicit distillation, and that there was actually an exportation of grain going on from that county. The distress, however, was at length found to be of that character and extent, that government interfered at the commencement of April, by cautiously sending a supply of food, and afterwards a supply of potatoes for seed. But whilst he felt that the government could not delay sending a supply for the relief of the distress that existed, he had looked to other sources as a much more eligible mode of relief; and he had with that view encouraged as much as possible the subscription which had been set on foot, and which had been so liberally supported, for the relief of the distress in Ireland.

The Marquis of Lansdown agreed with the noble earl in his general principles, with regard to the inexpediency of the interference of government, in the supply of the markets; [illegible] should be recollected that there was a distinction between the case of a general scarcity, and that of the partial failure of a particular article of food. In the present instance, the distress had arisen, not from any general scarcity, for on the contrary, there was an abundance of grain; but from the failure of one article of food, that of potatoes, and that too in the garden of the peasant, and upon which he depended for subsistence. Though, undoubtedly it would be highly inexpedient to interfere with the markets in the case of a general scarcity, yet under the special circumstance of the partial failure of one article of food, it became absolutely necessary to extend relief; and therefore it was, that he rejoiced in the liberality of those individuals who had so promptly entered into a subscription for the relief of that distress. He highly approved also of the bill brought into the other House, for affording employment to the poor of Ireland. The fact was, that the poor peasants, whose potatoes had failed, had been compelled to resort for subsistence, to the consumption of their pigs and cows, and were left without the means of paying any rent. The landlords, who depended upon their rents, were thus compelled to suspend all the works they were carrying on; the labourers employed in those works were in consequence discharged; and thus the distress was continually increasing. He trusted, that as in the beginning of the session their standing orders had been suspended, for the purpose of passing coercive measures with regard to Ireland, there would be no hesitation in now adopting a similar course with reference to a measure for relieving the poor of that country, by affording them the means of employment.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, May 17.

ROMAN CATHOLIC PEERS BILL.] The bill was read a third time. On the question, that it do pass,

Mr. Secretary Peel said, that as the bill had undergone a full discussion, and as the sense of the House had been fairly taken on the subject of it, he would not persist in what he had no doubt must be an unavailing opposition. He trusted, however, that his not pressing the House to another division, would not be construed into any want of decision, or any diffidence of the opinion he had delivered on this important bill.

Mr. Canning could not do justice to his own feelings, or to the conduct which had been pursued by his right hon. friend, if he did not declare, that the course he had pursued upon this occasion reflected on him the highest credit. Entertaining the strong sentiments which his right hon. friend was known to cherish upon this subject, it was impossible that he could have acted in a more candid, a more liberal, or a more handsome manner. Next to the gratification he should have felt in having his right hon. friend for a supporter, was the satisfaction of having had such an opponent.

Sir T. Lethbridge said, he could not arrest the progress of the bill in that House; but he might at least be allowed to thank God, that there were three estates of this realm—the King, Lords, and Commons.

The bill was then passed.

WEST INDIA AND AMERICAN TRADE BILL.] Mr. Robinson moved the second reading of this bill.

Sir W. Curtis asked, who had called for such a measure? None, but such as acted from motives entirely interested. He should oppose the bill in every stage, on account of its decided interference with those navigation and revenue laws, under which the kingdom had flourished during so long a period. The only advantage that could accrue from it must be to America; since, it would allow her ships to load at ports in our West India colonies, and to sail directly for the United States.

Mr. Serjeant Onslow conceived, that upon every ground of justice, policy, and humanity, the country was bound to thank his right hon. friend for bringing forward this bill. Since the period at which the existing laws were framed, the country had acquired, by the result of two successful wars, a large addition of extensive, valuable, and important colonies: and towards those colonies, the measure was an act of absolute justice.

COLONIAL TRADE BILL.] On the order of the day for the second reading of this bill,

Mr. Fowell Buxton rose to remind the House, that last year the chancellor of the exchequer had stated, that a proposition, as to East India sugars being imported into this country on the same terms that sugars from the West Indies were, might be referred to the committee on foreign trade. That, however, had not yet been done; and as this bill greatly interfered with the question of adopting such a proposition, he wished to ask the right hon. gentleman when it was intended to bring it forward? Certain facts had recently come to his knowledge which attached additional importance to this question. By a very able pamphlet lately written by an intelligent merchant of Liverpool, a Mr. Cropper, it appeared that the tax levied by the West India importers upon the public in profit on their sugars, over and above the profits which the public would have to pay on other sugars, was no less than 1,500,000*l.* per annum. Now, to that pamphlet an answer had been published, under the sanction of the West India merchants; and even there it was admitted, that West India sugars were sold at 5*s.* per cwt. dearer than sugars from the East Indies could be sold at, supposing the rate of duty to be the same. Now, 5*s.* per cwt. was equivalent to 5*l.* per ton; and it being admitted that 200,000 tons were annually imported into this country, here was a tax of 1,000,000*l.* a-year paid by the consumer on West India sugars, in consequence of the West India monopoly, and for the sole benefit of the West India merchants. The East India merchants, as he understood, had prepared a petition to that House, in which they represented, that if an ad valorem duty were imposed upon "all" sugars imported into this country, according to their quality, the price to the consumer would be greatly reduced, and the consumption itself very largely increased. They conceived that sugar, which now fetched 6*d.*, would in that event realize not more than 3*d.* per lb., and that the effect of such a reduction of price would relieve the country, taking into consideration the entire annual importation and the average annual prices, from a tax of not less than 16,000,000*l.* per annum. He did not pledge himself for the accuracy of this calculation; but, taking the result to be only in fact 8,000,000*l.*, nay, if it were only 4,000,000*l.*, the question for the consideration of parliament became one of immense importance. The value of the East India trade had increased in a most extraordinary degree. The cotton sent hither in 1792 was not more than 100lb. In 1813, it had increased to 100,000lb.; and in 1820, to 1,000,000lb. No parliamentary return, subsequently to 1820, had yet been obtained; but he had every reason to think that the importation, which in 1792 was to the amount of 100lb. only, would be found to be, in 1822, 2,000,000lb. There seemed to be, in short, no saying to what extent this trade might increase. He believed he was warranted in saying, that no return was so valuable as sugars. Sugars were in this country always a marketable commodity to the importer; and from their weight and stowage they were almost the best article to the freighters. He thought it would be found that a matter of greater importance could not be brought under its notice.

Mr. Robinson said, he did not happen to be in the House when the discussion to which the hon. member alluded took place. The fact, however, was, that last year an act was passed, imposing a duty upon East India sugars, which act would expire this year. If it should be proposed to parliament to renew that act, the discussion to which the hon. gentleman seemed desirous that the House should now be led, would in due course come on. At the same time, it did not naturally follow the adoption of such a bill as the present, that the duties on East India sugars would be assimilated to those which were paid on sugars imported from the West Indies.

Mr. Bright thought, that the East India question stood on very different and distinct grounds from any upon which the interests of our West India colonies could be imagined to rest. The East Indies by their natural situation could not be made more accessible to the rest of the commercial world than they now were. The nature of our communication with them was liable to very little alteration. But in regard to our intercourse, and the intercourse of other powers, with our West India colonies, we were very differently situated. He, therefore, implored ministers to put the minds of those who were interested in the West India trade at rest, by specifically declaring what were the intentions of government. A very large capital was embarked in this extensive branch of our commerce; and a very strong and painful interest was excited among its principal members, as to the ultimate views of ministers with respect to this [illegible].

Mr. W. Williams said, that the hon. gentleman who had just sat down appeared to be against all monopolies but the monopoly enjoyed by the West India merchants. The great object of the bill was, to allow to our colonies free intercourse and communication with every part of the world; and he apprehended that if the trade in sugar was not thrown open, considerable mischief must ensue to the commerce of Great Britain. Under the present regulations, the consumption was rather declining than increasing. In the short period of three years the quantity of sugars on hand had diminished from 82,000 to 62,000 hogsheads. If sugars were allowed to be exported to every part of Europe, the consumption would be very materially increased.

Mr. C. R. Ellis thought, that the East India merchants had no just claim to such a benefit as the hon. member for Weymouth had put in for them. They were, in effect, asking for the ruin of those who had virtually abolished the slave-trade. The representations of those for whom the hon. gentleman desired to interest the House were confined to a prayer for permission to participate in the monopoly, as it was called, of the West India colonists and merchants. This was the whole claim. It would be necessary to inquire what were the rights of the West India traders; and what would be the expediency of granting the claim of the East India traders? The rights of the former were comprised in this—a compensation for certain restrictions imposed upon them by the mother country, for the general benefit of the state. Was the trade of the East India interest subject to the same restrictions as that of the West India merchants? Was the trade between India and England limited exclusively to British goods? Had parliament imposed, in favour of the West India merchant, any protecting duties, such as those contained in the schedule annexed to the bill now before the House? He considered that our Indian possessions were, in respect of a foreign trade, precisely in the state of an independent empire. Our Indian empire, then, was not to be considered in the light of a mere colony. Its trade was not subject to the restrictions under which the West India trade laboured, and was not therefore entitled to participate in those benefits which had been given to the latter, in compensation for such restrictions. As to the question of expediency, were he to go into the discussion of that, he must open no less a subject than the whole system of our colonial policy. He would therefore conclude, by protesting against any attempt at connecting together the two distinct questions of the East India and West India trades.

Mr. T. Wilson feared, that the bill would do but very little good to the West India trade; and if it did not effect a positive good to that interest, he thought it was likely to be productive of mischief somewhere else.

Mr. Money contended, that the East India merchants had been treated with injustice and partiality by the legislature. It had refused to receive the cotton manufactures of India without a duty amounting to prohibition; while it had compelled the inhabitants of the East Indies to receive our manufactures without the payment of any duty.

Mr. W. Smith said, he did not wonder that gentlemen were anxious to press this subject forward now, because the longer it was postponed the greater would be the opposition to it. This was no other than a question between Great Britain and the West India colonies; but he believed that the measure would be of little advantage to the latter. There had been a mutual monopoly between Great Britain and her West India possessions; and this measure was disadvantageous to the latter; for the gain, whatever it might be, would be made out of the pockets of the consumers. The hon. member censured the mode in which the legislature had long proceeded upon this subject, and adverted to the steps taken by the House in 1753. He was favourable to an equality of advantage between the colonies and the mother country; but he did not understand that kind of liberality which consisted in giving every thing, and receiving nothing; and in this case he certainly saw no reciprocity whatsoever. Was the country in a situation to depart from the system which had so long prevailed with respect to the colonies? That point ought to be considered before they adopted a new code of legislation on so important a subject. If the colonies were likely, in common with the public, to derive benefit from this measure, he of course would not oppose it; but he believed that that which was denominated a boon would not be advantageous either to the one or the other. If the trade were thrown completely open—if the colonies were allowed to send their produce direct to every part of the globe—then the people of this country would say "We must seek our supply from every part of the globe;" and thus the ordinary proceedings of commerce would be completely unhinged. It was urged, by those who were favourable to this measure, that East India sugars were now allowed to be exported to the Mediterranean; and therefore it was argued, that the monopoly had been given up. But, if the agreement between the mother country and the West India colonies were broken to that extent, it was a gratuitous concession on the part of government; and those who called for an extension of the trade had no right to turn about and say, that because a certain point had been given up, the West India colonies were bound to part with all their privileges. Another question was, at what time was this bargain made with the colonies? because, he believed it would be found, on reference to the period, that the population had increased so much since as to create a greatly extended demand for sugars; and if that commodity were sold at a moderate price, there could be no doubt but that much of the stock which the petitioners had on hand would find consumers. How far the general prosperity of the state would be improved by this measure, he did not now consider. He viewed the question, with reference to a particular interest, and he would say, that this monopoly ought either to be kept entire, or to be destroyed altogether.

Mr. Barham said, that his hon. friend in speaking of the monopoly, had said that they ought to possess it entire. Not only did he subscribe to that doctrine, but every man in the colonies assented to it. They considered it as their charter. It was on the faith of that agreement that those who preceded them had formed their great colonial establishments. If it was violated, it would be an act of gross injustice, and the colonial interest would be absolutely annihilated. But, it seemed, there had been an invasion of that monopoly; and that was used as an argument for destroying it altogether. Now, if there had been an invasion of that monopoly, it was not effected for the sake of the West India interest; and if, for the purpose of serving some other interest, the West India proprietors gave up a certain right, it was not fair to turn round on them and say, "Your contract is broken, and the monopoly shall be destroyed." This would be a most violent and a most unjustifiable doctrine. Perhaps this measure might do good. He did not say that it would or would not. But why should a measure be introduced which would deprive the West India proprietor of a privilege which had long been his, on account of some incidental, some contingent benefit? Why should he, for such a speculation, be reduced to a mere nonentity? With respect to the right of trade which had been granted to Demerara and Berbice, it had been asked, why, at the time, some representation was not made on the subject? He had only to answer, that representations were made. At that time there was an abundant supply of colonial produce, and the act of the minister, on that occasion had tended to create the present distress. The West India merchants remonstrated in every way they could; and he was one of a deputation that waited on the minister, and argued the question with him. He (Mr. B.) then foretold what distress would ensue; and unfortunately his view of the consequences was but too correct. The West India proprietors were suffering heavy losses. Their great object was, to find subsistence for the poor creatures on their estates. As to profit, it was quite out of the question. Unless some revulsion took place which should restore the trade, and encourage the use of colonial produce, the West India proprietor could not prosper. And yet in this deplorable state of affairs, they were about to admit the produce of the East Indies into a market which was already glutted. If this system were persisted in, they might as well give up their West India colonies. He was really astonished at the quarter whence this cry of a free trade proceeded. If his hon. friend (Mr. Ricardo) had advanced the doctrine, it would not have surprised him. But, strange to say, the call for a free trade proceeded from a quarter in which, heretofore, there was no freedom at all. It came from the East Indies, an empire with which, until very lately, no private British merchant was allowed to trade—a soil on which, till within the last few years, no British subject had a right to set his foot. The demand came from a portion of the empire which could not, permanently, be connected with the mother country; for no man could suppose, that a force of 25,000 men would be able, for a long series of years, to govern eighty or a hundred millions of native inhabitants. When those possessions should be dissevered from this country, what would be our situation? Having ruined the West Indies, and being unable to procure sugar from that quarter, they would be obliged to apply to a foreign government in the East Indies, which probably would not take any portion of their manufactures, and they would consequently be compelled to pay for every thing they purchased in gold. It was observed, that this measure would have the effect of checking the slave trade. If it could be proved to him that the slave trade was likely, under the existing system, to be renewed in the West India colonies, there was no bill having for its object the annihilation of that trade which he would not support. But he would not legislate for an evil which he did not believe to exist. Let the subject be examined before a committee—let it be shown that there was any chance of the revival of the slave trade—and he would be the first to adopt measures of prevention; but he would not proceed to legislate on the mere fancies and imaginations of men, whose minds had been so long fixed on this subject, that they were likely to be deranged by the slightest occurrence.

Mr. Ellice offered his cordial support to this bill as one of those measures of approximation to free trade, which was the safest, and best, protecting, to a rational extent, existing interests which had grown up under an opposite system, and at the same time offering to the rest of the world a sincere proof of our disposition to carry into effect those liberal principles which we had so loudly professed. He had listened with attention to the speech of his hon. friend the member for Norwich (Mr. Smith) and had heard no argument urged against this measure, which did not equally apply to our whole colonial system. Certainly if we were now called upon to legislate on this important subject for the first time—with the experience and information the last century had given us, he might agree in the impolicy of peopling the West India Islands with slaves, to produce articles, which we could more easily and profitably obtain from other countries in exchange for our manufactures—but the case before the House was, how the restrictions on trade could be gradually and ultimately removed, without entailing absolute ruin on those, who had embarked their property on the faith of existing regulations and the protection of parliament. This bill was, in his opinion, calculated to effect that object, and he therefore supported it. Much matter had been introduced foreign to the subject under discussion, and the attention of the House had been diverted from it, by a kind of by-battle between the East and West Indians, respecting the duties on sugar, which were to be regulated hereafter by another bill. He could not avoid, as this course had been followed, offering a few remarks in answer to some very strange observations of one or two of his hon. friends on this subject. The West India planter was, in his opinion, fairly entitled to a moderate protection for some time to come, in the same manner as he conceived the agriculturist entitled also to a moderate, not to the monstrous, protection, afforded him by the corn bill. One hon. gentleman (Mr. Money) had brought before the House the whole case of the cultivators of India. He complained, and with great reason, that by the policy of this country our manufactures had been imposed upon the people of India, without the least protection to the Indian manufacturer, who had been nearly ruined, and an immense population deprived of profitable employment, from our ability to supply their own manufactures from the improvement in our machinery and superiority of capital, at a cheaper rate: and now, exclaims the hon. member, having diverted the industry of the people from its former employment, you subject their raw productions, which you have compelled them to cultivate, to excessive duties, to protect the West India planter. He entirely concurred with the hon. gentleman that nothing could be more cruel, and nothing could more justly subject us to the imputation of being a nation of shopkeepers looking solely to profit in our dealings with mankind, than this unjust policy. But again, he would ask, whether the West India proprietors were accountable for those measures, or whether they were adopted with a view to the promotion of their interest? Another hon. friend (Mr. Buxton) the advocate of the consumers, had stated, that if the additional protecting duty of 5s. was discontinued, he had no doubt the price of sugar would be current at 3d. per lb. He could not imagine by what process of reasoning, his hon. friend arrived at this conclusion. At all events the additional duty could only increase the price one halfpenny, but the most satisfactory answer to his hon. friend, was, to refer him to the chancellor of the exchequer who raised more than 3d. per lb. duty on West India sugar. Then it was argued by one hon. gentleman, according to some equally strange calculation, that by this difference of duty, a tax was laid of 18 millions on the people of England to support the West India colonies: his hon. friend (Mr. Smith) had reduced this amount to 2 millions, and to this he would answer, the West India interest would be too happy to make a compromise at a much lower rate, and at once give up all their just claim to a moderate protection. The truth however was, those statements were equally erroneous, and although after a certain time he would advocate the gradual equalization of the duty, at present there did appear a fair claim, arising from the utmost distress, for consideration on the one side, and no very violent cause of complaint on the other. All the other markets of the world were open to both classes of producers on the same terms. Another objection to this measure came rather with a bad grace from a portion of the community to whom, from some of those antiquated principles of our commercial policy, which all parties sought now to reform, the West India interest had been long sacrificed—he alluded to the sugar refiners, who were afraid the permission given by the bill, of direct exportation of sugar from the Islands to the continental ports, would injure their manufacture. Their petition had been brought forward and supported by an hon. friend who with singular consistency supported their claims to protection, and still refused, when the Indian interest was concerned, all protection to the colonists. The House should remember, that, to favor this particular trade, the colonists were prohibited by law from refining their sugar in the Islands. They were obliged to pay also the additional freight, expense of transport, and package, the various charges attending a raw material, merely that the profit of manufacture should be secured to the English refiner. Why, when gentlemen talked of the unreasonable claims of the colonist, and of his objection to the principle and practice of free trade, did they not propose to relieve him from this injurious and manifest violation of them? The fact was, as he had stated in the commencement of his observations, our commercial code had rather been formed on a continual departure from, than on any observance of these principles, and the utmost care was necessary in these alterations, to protect, to a moderate extent, the extensive vested interests, which might otherwise be most unjustly sacrificed to our love for improvement. He was as zealous in the cause as any of his hon. friends, but he would proceed with the greatest caution and circumspection.

To return, however, to the bill under discussion, as he thought much matter had been unnecessarily connected with it, there were other branches of the subject more material which had been totally lost sight of, and particularly the enormous charges and taxation under which our colonies and shipping were oppressed, and from which they might easily be relieved, without injury to any party. An hon. baronet (sir W. Curtis) had opposed this and the former bill, as threatening severely to injure our navigation. If he thought they could produce that effect, he would be an equally strenuous opponent of them with his hon. friend. He considered our commercial marine ought to be regarded and protected, beyond any abstract views of profit and loss, which might regulate our policy in other branches of our trade. The safety of the country depended on its prosperity, and every measure should be taken to foster and improve it. He felt satisfied his hon. friend need be under no apprehension of its suffering from the provisions of these bills, but he entreated the co-operation of his hon. friend to improve its condition, by compelling government to take off the tonnage duty, which had been laid during war to pay part of the expense of convoy, and which the chancellor of the exchequer had strangely forgotten to remit, when the cause of its imposition had ceased. It was scarcely possible, beyond direct taxes, to credit the enormous burthens to which our shipping was subjected in all quarters of the world, and especially in our own colonies, to satisfy the rapacity of various agents and extortioners of government. Take one colony for instance, Trinidad; he held an account in his hand of the charges imposed there on a ship of 300 tons. The collector's fee 55 dollars, comptroller 38, searcher 40, treasury 15, island secretary 30, governor's secretary 27, extra officer 19, and various other sums amounting to 132*l.* This was a specimen of the charges in all the colonies. Then, as if the poor ship-owner was the fair subject of plunder every where in countries not under our own government, we had gentlemen exercising the functions of consuls, who performed the office of leeches as successfully as their brethren in official situations in the colonies. The House had heard of the monstrous sums raised in this way in the Brazils—one officer receiving about 11,000*l.* a year. All over Europe, although not quite so bad, it was still oppressive. In Sicily an English vessel could not touch at two ports without paying two consuls, and yet it would be difficult to conceive the necessity for two officers of this description in that island. In America it was equally bad; he had accidentally met the master of an English vessel just arrived from Charleston, who shewed him the account of his expenses in that port, consisting of light and harbour dues, pilotage, Custom-house and government charges, amounting in all to 23 dollars; and the House would scarcely credit it, the British consul's fee for endorsing his register was nearly equal to all the other expenses, amounting to the scandalous exaction of 20 dollars. The expenses in our own ports were now under investigation in the committee up stairs, and as far as the inquiry had proceeded, it was impossible to imagine any thing more iniquitous. The impositions of the Trinity-house were indefensible, and their extortions had already led to the loss of many foreign vessels, with their cargoes and crews, who rather preferred the dangers of the seas in the most violent storms, to the protection of our ports at the price we exacted for it. He had, indeed, been astonished at seeing the merciful return for all this in the American charges on the vessel he had alluded to, and that a remedy had not been obtained by the remonstrance of foreign governments, for evils which our administration, looking to the interests of our own navigation, did not appear to consider as requiring their attention. This was a fine field for the exertion of the influence of the hon. baronet with his friends, and he might be assured he would be conferring a much less doubtful obligation on his constituents in using it, than in opposing the present bill. Then, although he admitted, this measure as far as it went would benefit the colonies, if their situation was examined into, it would be found their distress, severe and almost insupportable as it was, was aggravated by the same causes which oppressed our industry and trade in every quarter, the enormous amount of taxation of all descriptions. In what were known by the name of the conquered and ceded colonies, taxes were levied, and expended by authority, until the late war, unknown in the dependencies of Great Britain, at the absolute will of the governor, exercised according to his caprice, and without consulting the feelings or interests of the inhabitants. Laws of every country and every code, administered in every language, neither understood by those who executed, or whose interests were affected by them, construed differently by every succeeding English lawyer, who was sent out to preside in the island courts, destroyed the credit of the colonies, and in this their hour of need, with the superabundance of capital in this country, there was no confidence to lend or invest it, on the security of property subject to risks, which could neither be understood, or guarded against. English creditors under such circumstances, and in the overwhelming difficulties that otherwise surrounded the planters, instead of feeling any disposition to extend their advances, were pressing to withdraw what they could save. The property in the contention got into what were called courts of justice, and was ultimately the prey of lawyers and officers, to the utter ruin of the contending parties. Such for instance was the actual condition of Trinidad—labouring under all the difficulties which oppressed the old colonies, the planters discontented with the laws and the administration of them, and the merchants having candidly told government, that while such a state of things continued confidence was entirely suspended in all transactions with the island. This case, however, was not singular. To give the House some idea of the extent to which this system was carried, he would state the situation of another wretched colony, St. Lucia. He would not go into a detail of all the complaints and sufferings of the inhabitants, but as he did think animadversions in that place sometimes strengthened the hands of government, and aided the best intentions, in resisting the perpetual claims of the adherents of administration for offices and jobs at the expense of our suffering fellow countrymen in the colonies, he could not resist shortly adverting to the present and past state of that island. It was well known to the House, that it had been twice conquered during the last war, and at last retained as a permanent possession at the peace, not so much from any object of commercial advantage, as from its importance as the key of the naval station in the windward islands, and particularly as commanding Martinique. While under the French government, to encourage the settlement, which laboured under all the disadvantages of a pestilent climate, and being more frequently subject than any other island to the effects of hurricanes, the inhabitants had been carefully exempted from all taxation, 800*l.* only being raised for the salary of the governor. From the moment these poor people were admitted to the blessings of British protection, the rule had been reversed, and they had been subject to every kind of exaction which the ingenuity of their governors could devise. It was true, that when their complaints reached the ears of government, and time had elapsed for an enquiry into them, one governor who it was reported had raised 30,000*l.* for himself and his secretary by his extortions, was dismissed and cashiered. Another succeeded, who also demanded what were called his legitimate perquisites, not to a much smaller amount. The hurricane of 1817 which destroyed all their crops, damaged their buildings, and killed some of their slaves, then came in addition to their previous distress. The government buildings were destroyed. New and grievous taxes were laid by the simple fiat of the governor on the inhabitants who had been already too severely punished by this sad calamity, to repair and rebuild them. The erections made, were unfit for the climate, and, as they alleged, in a most exposed situation. The hurricane of 1819 succeeded and disposed of them. This visitation was in all its circumstances still more calamitous than the previous one, and yet in 1820 and 1821 more oppressive taxes were again laid to rebuild the public works. The House, then, would not fail to observe how all these burthens were proportioned to what one would have imagined could only have justified them—the progressive prosperity of the people. The whole population amounted to about 15,000, of which the slaves exceeded 12,000. The average crop was about 6 or 7,000 hhds. of sugar, which supposing other articles paid the expenses of cultivation might generally in the years preceding 1817 have produced a clear revenue to the planters of from 100,000 to 140,000*l.* Since that year they had lost two entire crops, or at least the expenses incurred in repairs exceeded the value of what had been saved from destruction by the hurricanes —the price had gradually fallen to the present depressed value—and he conscientiously believed the income of the whole island had fallen to less than one fourth of its previous amount—if indeed, and it was a doubtful question, there was now any income beyond their expense. The taxes on the other hand had been more than quadrupled. Last year nearly 12,000*l.* had been exacted, 3,000*l.* to pay the salary of the governor, an officer of the highest character and most distinguished service, but whose claims on the country we had no right to palm off on these wretched people. He believed they were entirely sick of each other, and he entreated government, when some other employment should be found for the gallant general, not to replace him by so expensive a successor. The truth was, we overloaded the colonies with establishments which were in no respect necessary, and then were apt to complain of the cost of maintaining them. The major of a veteran battalion, with an addition of 5 or 600*l.* per annum to his pay, was a person of sufficient importance to fill the office of governor of St. Lucia, under the superintendance of the commander in chief at Barbadoes; and there was no occasion for a host of staff and secretaries, who unfortunately always followed in the suite of the greater personage. He could draw a similar picture of many other colonies, but he was afraid he had already fatigued the House, and would therefore only add a few observations on their general situation. The shipments from all the sugar colonies had usually averaged from 250 to 280,000 hhds., which till 1818 had probably produced a nett revenue after payment of all charges exceeding 7 millions. This now had been reduced by the fall of price to less than 3. The value of sugar was lower than in 1791. The chancellor of the exchequer then took 12*s.* 4*d.* from 61*s.* He now takes 27*s.* from about 58*s.* The settlers and planters, in the new colonies especially, were invariably debtors, and they came in for their share of the gross injustice which had been inflicted on all persons similarly situated, by the alteration of the currency. Their case at all events was exempted from the general rule which Mr. Mushett and some of his hon. friends adduced in support of the justice of the last fraud in this respect. We possessed none of these colonies, or the inhabitants any property in them in 1797, and the loans borrowed of their consignees were all in paper at its greatest depreciation. Luckily in this case there could be no difference of opinion, facts spoke for themselves, and did not require the aid of argument. In 1814 and 1815, in Trinidad, where the same metallic money has always been current at the same value, a bill for 100*l.* sterling could be purchased for 150 or 155*l.* currency. The value of the pound sterling has since gradually risen, and now from 240 to 250*l.* of the same metallic money is required from the defrauded debtor for payment of the altered 100*l.* sterling. His debts, taxes and expenses of all descriptions are increased in the same ratio, and his returns proportionally reduced in price, and yet this was called justice! He had taken the case of Trinidad, having a letter in his hand stating the actual difference, but it was nearly, if not quite as great in Jamaica, and all our other colonies. There was no argument so forcible in reply to the noble lord's sweeping assertion of the general prosperity of all the interests in the country, except the agricultural, as placing before him figures of this description. Let them apply the same test, to the other interest materially affected, or supposed to be so, by this bill. They had a precise account of the quantity of commercial tonnage, and taking the value of it, which no person acquainted with the subject would say was overstated, at 20*l*. a ton in 1814 they would find the capital employed in it 51 millions. At a profit of 15 per cent, the fair average at that period, this yielded a return of between 7 and 8 millions towards the general income of the country. The quantity of tonnage still remained nearly the same, and was now reduced in value to 25 millions. No person acquainted with this business, could state the present profit above 5 per cent, he was almost afraid, there was as much loss as profit generally, but assuming it was otherwise, there was at least a falling-off of between 5 and 6 millions in this branch of the public income. He believed such was the case with all the productive interests of the country, at least that was the general rule, and former prosperity the exception. Certainly all this was not to be ascribed to one cause, and more particularly in this branch of our industry. What he contended for was, that, while we had to meet a great diminution of profit from our productive capital, from the cessation of the monopoly, and the excitement which the events of the war had accidentally given to our trade, it was scarcely possible to believe, that any administration, or any legislature could at the same moment, have subjected persons employing capital, who were generally debtors, and their transactions, to the derangement, and injustice produced by the final alteration of the currency. This was a subject, however, he could not pursue. He approved of the present bill as an improvement and more as a pledge of further improvement in our commercial system. At the same time, he intreated the House while they were reforming the regulations which were called protections to our trade and navigation, to be careful that they placed both on a fair footing, if they could not give the many advantage in the open competition which these measures subjected them. If all burthens and taxes such as he had pointed out in the course of his observations were removed, he did not fear the result, but if we could not tell our merchants we were ready to meet every wish they could express, to adopt every improvement, and to remove all obstacles in the way of a fair competition with their commercial rivals, he should dread the experiments now making, beneficial as he admitted them to be, if accompanied by such protection. He however trusted much to the candid conduct and the avowed principles of the president and vice president of the board of trade, which he had an opportunity of witnessing in the committee above stairs, from which this bill emanated, and he thought himself bound both from a sense of public duty and a perfect confidence in their good intentions, to support to the utmost of his power, their anxious endeavours to improve the general condition of the trade of the country.

Mr. Ricardo rose, in the first instance, to make one observation on the subject of the currency. Though the facts were not known to him, he could not help suspecting the correctness of his hon. friend, respecting the payments in the West Indies. That persons in the West Indies who, in 1815 paid a debt of 100*l*. with 155*l*. of their currency, should now have to pay 227*l*., while that currency was not itself altered in value, seemed to him incredible. He would go on, however, to another subject. If he had wanted an argument in favour of a free trade, he should not have gone farther than the speech of his hon. friend. He had painted the system exactly as it was. He had told them that the ship-owners were burthened with peculiar charges: that to compensate themselves for these charges, the ship-owners were allowed to saddle unnecessary expenses on the West Indians; that the West Indians were not allowed to refine their sugar, but were obliged to send it over with a quantity of mud, in order to employ and encourage our shipping; that they, in their turn, had a monopoly given them of the supply of the home market, where the consumer got his sugar burthened by the cost of all these charges. The system throughout was of the same nature. Vexatious and unnecessary burthens were cast upon one class, and that class was allowed to relieve itself by preying upon some other.

An hon. member had put a very proper question: when he was told that the people of England were taxed for the sake of the West Indians, the hon. member had asked, who got this million and a half, when the West Indians could barely keep their estates in cultivation? No one got it. That was what he (Mr. R.) complained of. The people of England paid grievously for their sugar, without a corresponding benefit to any persons. The sum which they paid was swallowed up in the fruitless waste of human labour. The hon. member for London had said, that they should pay the same price for their sugar, whether they taxed it or not. Now it was not possible this could be the case. The hon. member might as well have said, that if they did not lay a tax on tea, the Chinese would raise the price of it equal to the present price burthened with the tax. The general principle that regulated price where free competition operated was, that a commodity would be sold as cheap as the producers could afford. Unless, therefore, our admission of the East India sugars could add to the cost of producing them, there could be no increase of price. The case of the West Indies was precisely similar to that of the corn laws. As in the latter case we were protecting our poor soil from the competition of the rich soil of other countries, so were we to protect the poor soil of the West Indies from the competition of the rich soil of the East Indies. The mischief in such cases was, that there was much human labour thrown away without any equivalent. He fully agreed, that there would be the greatest possible injustice in sacrificing the vested interests of the West Indies; but it would be cheaper to purchase our sugar from the East Indies, and to pay a tax directly to the West Indies for the liberty of doing so. We should be gainers by the bargain; because there would be no waste of human labour. As he thought a monopoly was a disadvantage on either side, he saw no reason for opposing the present bill, which approached, to a certain degree, to free trade. We could not too soon return to the sound principle; and if we once arrived at it the House would no longer be tormented with these discussions, and with constant solicitations to sacrifice the public good to particular interests.

Mr. Marryat denied the correctness of the statement, that a tax was imposed on the people of England, by the preference given to the West India planter, in the supply of the home market with sugar. He contended, that as the quantity of sugar imported from the British West India colonies exceeded the consumption of the mother country by nearly one-third, and as that surplus must necessarily be sold for exportation, Europe, and not Great Britain alone, was to be considered as the market of the West India planter; and that the price his surplus sugars were worth to be sent abroad, necessarily governed the price of those that were sold to be consumed at home. Great Britain, therefore, was supplied with sugar at as cheap a rate as any nation in Europe; and the only means of lowering the price to the consumer, was by lowering the duty.—It had been said, that the foreign planter could raise sugar cheaper than the British planter, and this was too true; but he (Mr. M.) maintained, that the price of a commodity had no reference to the cost of its production, but was governed by the proportion that the supply bore to the demand: and therefore it did not follow that because foreign planters could cultivate cheaper than British planters, they would sell cheaper. In fact, they all sold at the same price: and the only consequence of the disadvantageous competition to which the British planter was exposed was, his being reduced to very great distress.—For the truth of this doctrine he would appeal to the agricultural gentlemen; and ask them whether the present price of corn was regulated by the cost of its production, or by the proportion which the supply bore to the demand?—The real state of the case was, that from the moment the produce of the British West India colonies exceeded the consumption of the mother country, which was the consequence of the numerous additional colonies that were ceded at the late peace, their monopoly of the home market became nearly nominal, and the mother country was necessarily supplied at the same price as the continent of Europe; while her monopoly of the supply of the colonies with British manufactures, and in British ships, remained in full force. Under these circumstances, occasioned by events over which they had no control, and arising out of the determination of his majesty's ministers, on views of policy, comprehending the general interests of the British empire, they might reasonably claim some relaxation of a system which had reduced them to the greatest distress; and which, if continued, must involve them in utter ruin.

The planters were aware of the objection to increasing the price of their produce, which would be taxing the British consumer for their benefit; and, therefore, had only petitioned for the renewal of their former intercourse with the United States of America, which, though it would not increase their revenue, would at least diminish their expenditure, by enabling them to procure their supplies of provisions and lumber at a cheaper rate, without imposing any additional burthens on their fellow-subjects; and that bill had just been read a second time without meeting with any opposition.

The present bill did not originate with the West India planters or merchants; but was a spontaneous measure on the part of his majesty's ministers, with a view to the relief and encouragement of British shipping. It gave British ship-owners the same advantage with respect to the produce of the West Indies, as had been given them last year as to the produce of the East; the permission to carry it, not to Great Britain only, but to every part of Europe. It was evident that no use would be made of this permission by the West India planter, as to sugars; because of near 300,000 hogsheads that had been imported into Great Britain last year, only 400 had been exported to the continent of Europe; and surely no persons would venture to send an entire cargo to any one port, when all the ports had taken off only so small a quantity. In farther proof of this assertion, he might state that although, by another bill passed many years ago, the planters were permitted to ship their sugars to any port of Europe south of Cape Finisterre, not a single cargo had ever been sent to that destination, from the time the act passed, down to the present moment. If the present bill were to be considered as a plea for admitting East India sugar into British home consumption, on more favourable terms of competition with West India sugar than at present, he should abjure the acceptance of it on such a condition: nor, in fact, was there any ground for the pretension; as the bill by no means placed the West India planters on the same footing as the grower of sugar in the East Indies. The West India planter still remained subject to all those restrictions which pressed so heavily upon his interests. He was prohibited from manufacturing for himself; even from refining his own sugar, without payment of a duty of eight guineas per cwt., a sum far exceeding its value; and intended to operate, as in fact it did operate, as a total prohibition. He was obliged to consume the manufactures of the mother country alone; to ship all his produce in her ships; and thus his industry was rendered subservient to that system, by which Great Britain makes all her colonies marts for the consumption of her manufactures, and the foundations of her naval power. The East Indians were exempted from all these obligations. So far from consuming British manufactures only, they manufactured for themselves; and even sent their manufactures to every part of the world, to rival those of the mother country. Ships under every flag upon the face of the globe had free access to their ports, to bring them commodities of every description, and take away theirs in return. They could buy every thing where they could buy it cheapest, and sell every thing where they could sell it dearest; in short, they had the whole world for their market. Let them forego these advantages, let them put themselves on the same footing as the West India planters, and he for one would agree to their sugars being admitted at the same duties; but those who would not submit to colonial restrictions, had no right to claim colonial privileges.

The hon. member then proceeded to explain the prospective advantages to which he looked forward from the present bill. More than half the rum shipped to London was exported (principally to the north of Europe), and, of course, subject to a double set of charges of every description, amounting to at least one-third of the nett proceeds of the rum; all which would be saved to the West India planter, by shipping it direct to the port of its consumption. He was satisfied, too, that lumber would soon be prepared in the North of Europe, of such dimensions as was suited to the West India market, and be taken back as a return cargo; to the great benefit of the British ship owner, who would thus earn a double freight, as well as of the British planter who would procure his supplies both better and cheaper than if he depended on America alone. Another advantage to which he looked forward in this bill, was that if Russia persisted in her present system of excluding all sugars that were either clayed or refined in Europe, many of the British planters would revert to the practice of claying their sugars; and, by shipping them direct to the ports of Russia, would save the double set of charges that must attach upon them if sent circuitously by way of this country: and he was persuaded that any plan which would enable the British planters to enter into a more successful competition with the planters of Cuba and the Brazils, by whom the slave trade was still carried on, and so far tend to check and discourage that traffic, would meet with the warmest approbation and support of this House.

He should now say a few words on another subject which had been adverted to in the course of the discussion; the case of the British sugar refiners. He felt, in the strongest manner, the importance of that valuable manufactory; and was satisfied that the interests of the sugar refiners and those of the West India planter were bound up together. The petition they had presented, praying for leave to refine East India, and other foreign sugar appeared to him to be both premature and injudicious; premature, because as he had before observed, no Muscovado sugar was likely to be sent to foreign ports of the continent, under the operation of this bill, instead of coming to Great Britain as usual; and injudicious, because the words other sugars, could only apply to the sugars of the Brazils and Cuba (the sugars of all other colonies being shipped to the countries to which they respectively belonged), and therefore to grant this permission would be to open a new source for consumption to the sugars of those slave-trading colonies, and consequently to give an additional stimulus to that traffic; a measure which would be reprobated by the unanimous feelings of the House. The object for which the sugar refiners ought to have petitioned is, the repeal of the transit duties on foreign linens; for the continuance of this duty is the real origin of all the retaliatory measures of Russia against our trade and manufactures, and consequently of the present distress of our sugar refiners, who have lost the export of 40,000 hogsheads of refined sugar, which till of late were annually shipped from this country to Russia. This transit duty, which was properly imposed in time of war, was continued in time of peace, in direct contradiction to all those commercial principles on which we profess to act, and by adhering to which we hope to make this country the emporium of the world. It has led to severe retaliation on the part of Russia. Every new Tariff from that country contains additional duties, and fresh prohibitions of British manufactures. Russia justifies the expediency of opening a direct intercourse with the Brazils, Cuba, and other foreign countries, as furnishing her with that market for her linens, which we refuse to give her by permitting them to pass through our ports, as formerly, free of duty. She has also retaliated upon us in kind, by prohibiting the transit of British woollens through her dominions, to the great fairs of Tartary, which supply both Persia and China, and giving the monopoly of that trade to the woollens of Prussia. The hon. member said, he was aware that an idea was entertained by some gentlemen of the sister island, that foreign linens could not find access to the markets of Asia, Africa, and America, unless we gave them transit through our ports; and therefore that this duty, which had the effect of a prohibition, increased the export of Irish linens. Not less than 570 sail of vessels from Asia, Africa and America, had arrived in different ports of the continent of Europe during the last year; an incontrovertible proof that opportunities abounded of shipping foreign linens to every part of the world, without their passing through the ports of this kingdom. The prejudice of a few individuals on this point, was altogether erroneous; and ought to give way to the general commercial interests of the empire at large. Let this duty be repealed; the good understanding that formerly subsisted between this country and Russia will be restored, and the British sugar refiners as well as other classes of manufacturers be relieved.

As to the distress of the West India planters, he could truly state it to be extreme. He knew it to be the intention of many to make no more Rum, as it did not pay the expense of distillation. The Leeward Island rum of last crop, had sold at 1*s*. 4*d*. per gallon; the freight and charges amounted to 9*d*., the cost of the puncheon was more than 3*d*., so that barely 4*d*. remained to provide stills, worms, and other utensils, and coals to be sent out from England. Not less than 200,000 chaldron of coals were now annually sent to the West Indies; the loss of the usual demand for them would be severely felt by our labourers, and of the freight of them by our ship-owners. He had seen a letter from one planter, expressing his determination, if things continued in their present state, to make neither sugar nor rum: but to divide his land among his negroes, and let them try if they could maintain themselves, as he found it impossible to maintain them by the cultivation of produce. This must be the result of continuing that extremity of distress to which the British planters were at present reduced; and he begged the House to consider, that if they were obliged to discontinue the cultivation of sugar not only would all the great manufacturing, commercial, and maritime interests which depended upon them, be immersed in their ruin, but the deficiency in their crops would be supplied by the planters of Cuba and the Brazils; and thus the Slave trade, instead of being abolished, would be carried on to a greater extent than ever. This it ought to be the object of parliament to prevent; and, therefore, he hoped, efficient measures for relieving the British West India planters would be adopted.

Mr. Wilberforce thought it might be desirable to connect with this bill a provision for registering slaves like that which he had brought under the consideration of the House five or six years ago, but which had not been adopted. In granting the boon now intended to be given by this bill, some security ought to be obtained against the importation of slaves.

Mr. Bernal contended, that this bill was not a boon to the West India colonies, but to the great body of distressed ship-owners. He thought the present measure ought not to be clogged with any enactment with regard to the registration of slaves.

Mr. Manning described the distress in the West Indies to surpass all description, and to exceed that experienced by the agricultural classes here; and therefore he considered it was of the utmost importance to afford relief.

Mr. Brougham said, it could not be denied that great distress existed amongst the West India body of merchants—a distress which was as great, if not greater than that which prevailed amongst our agriculturists at home. Therefore, it was, that he should be glad of this measure for their relief, though it was not called for by themselves; and he hoped that a much larger measure of relief might ere long be afforded. He for one would not clog it with any conditions; but he would appeal to them in return, and express a confident hope, that in their own internal regulations they would listen to the voice of that House, and redeem the pledges they had given, of carrying the measure of abolition and of slave regulation into the fullest effect. As to the encouragement of those colonies, he would say, that if East India sugar were to be imported into this market without restriction, we should have very speedily, the whole of the West Indian Archipelago laid waste. He did not mean to say that the soil would be less fertile, or that the islands would not be peopled with a black peasantry, by whom they might be kept in some sort of cultivation; but he did say, that an entire change of property would ensue—that coffee and sugar estates would no longer be productive to their owners who remained here—and that if they wished not to give them up altogether, they must go to the islands and live upon them as planters. Now this was a state of things for which we were not prepared at present. He did not say that such a state of things might not arrive at some time—that the black population whom our own wretched policy had sent thither might not be the future possessors of the soil. Such a case was highly probable, but we ought not to hasten it by any rash measures of legislation. He had thrown out these remarks as showing the ground of the vote that he should give, and he again begged to express a hope that the colonists would take the advice which they had received, and so improve the condition of their slaves as to fit them for making a gradual and complete emancipation—an event which must sooner or later arrive.

The bill was read a second time.

Employment of the Poor in Ireland.] The House having resolved itself into a committee on the employment of the poor in Ireland, Mr. Goulburn moved, "That, for the Relief and Employment of Poor in certain parts of Ireland, the lord lieutenant shall be authorized to advance out of the consolidated fund, any sum or sums of money not exceeding the amount of any presentments made for the making or Repairing Roads or carrying on the Public Works in Ireland, at the last Spring Assizes; and also, such further sum of money, not exceeding 50,000*l.*, as may be required for making or improving Roads in any part of Ireland."

Sir N. Colthurst expressed his approbation of the grant, and was confident that the noble, generous, and humane manner in which the people of this country had come forward on this occasion would make a lasting impression on Ireland, and inspire the sincerest gratitude.

Mr. Becher said, he was gratified at the introduction of such a measure. It was a source of high gratification, that the liberality of the people of England was now endeavouring to remedy the evil caused by government; but as prevention was better than cure, as employment was preferable to alms-giving, he should have been better pleased if timely measures had been adopted by government, by which much of the present distress might have been avoided.

Mr. J. Smith gave his warm support to the present measure, and thought that thanks were due to the right hon. gentleman by whom it was introduced; though he could not extend these thanks to the government generally; seeing that they might by timely measures have prevented much of the evil. Still he hailed the present plan, because he was satisfied that it would be productive of considerable relief. He had become acquainted, in the committee at the London tavern, with scenes of distress now prevailing in several parts of Ireland, which he almost shuddered to think of, and which he could not detail to the House. But, from all he had learned, he had come to this conclusion, that the want of employment was the great cause of the evil. England was now imperatively called upon to assist the sister island. We owed her a great debt, which we ought now to discharge. We had in our prosperity acted towards her with oppression; and we were bound at this trying time to do every thing for her improvement. It was in evidence before the committee for managing the Irish subscription, that in the barony of Moyarta, in the county of Clare, there were not less than 10,000 individuals without the necessaries of life. A large portion of them were deprived of the assistance which they might have expected from a resident country gentry, and were left to perish from want of food; as he had no doubt many of them had done. Now, he contended, that the hundred of Brixton in Surrey, or of Ossulston in Middlesex, had not a better claim to the sympathy and relief of the country than the barony of which he spoke, and therefore every thing which could be done ought to be done for its relief. There was one point which he wished to press—that no distinction should be made between persons of different religion in that country.

Mr. W. Smith said, he would mention to the House one class of absentee landlords, whose benevolent example he trusted would have many imitators. The parties to whom he alluded were two corporate bodies of London, who possessed estates of considerab' extent in Ireland. The first was the Drapers company. They had on their estates a tenantry of not less than 1,791 families, consisting of 10,740 persons, for whose relief they had done every thing which could be expected. The other company was one to which he had the honour of belonging. They had come to the possession of a considerable estate in Ireland, on the demise of the late king; and since then they had expended seven-eighths of their income in improving the condition of their tenants. He was sorry that the subscription opened for the Irish poor had not the names of many of the Irish absentees.

Mr. Martin, of Galway, expressed his gratitude to ministers for the measure they had proposed. He trusted that no person would exaggerate the distresses which existed in Ireland and play off the calamities of that country to disturb the empire. He felt it his duty to call the attention of the House to the conduct of an hon. member. That hon. member (Mr. Hume) was usually very constant in his attendance in the House, and he had heard him talk of this thing and that thing; but when the present subject came to be discussed, the hon. member yawned, and walked out of the House. The hon. member was soon to treat of the tithe system of Ireland. He would supplicate that hon. member to leave Ireland to other gentlemen, and the legitimate ministers who represented that country in the House. The hon. member, he dared to say, would come down to the House and bewail the sufferings of Ireland—but what was Ireland to him?

"What's Hecuba to him, or he to Hecuba,
"That he should weep for her!"

Mr. Hutchinson thought it was invidious and unjustifiable to allude to any member in the manner the hon. gentleman had done. If the hon. gentleman alluded to the hon.

member for Aberdeen, he would say that a more sincere friend to the interests of Ireland was not to be found in that House. With respect to the question before the House, he certainly felt grateful for the assistance which had been afforded to Ireland, but he at the same time felt humiliated that the state of his country should be such as to require it.

The Marquis of Londonderry said, he could assure the hon. member for Norwich, that the most strenuous efforts were making in various parts of Ireland to raise subscriptions for the relief of the distressed sufferers.

Captain O'Grady regretted the observations which had fallen from the hon. member for Galway. It was exceedingly improper that any gentleman who might originate a measure in that House, should be subjected to the foul imputation of making it a party question.

Mr. Martin said, that his observations were intended to apply exclusively to the hon. member for Aberdeen. He was sorry that the hon. member had not been in his place when he addressed the House. His absence was a bridle in his mouth, and had prevented him from saying a great deal more. He would willingly repeat in his presence all that he had said in his absence.

Mr. G. Lamb thought it would have been better if the hon. member had refrained from alluding to the conduct of an absent member.

The resolution was agreed to.

Saturday, May 18.

IRISH LINEN TRADE.] Sir George Hill rose to move for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the laws which regulated the Linen Trade of Ireland; and to report thereon. He remarked, that nothing was of more importance to the sister kingdom than her linen trade, and more particularly in the province of Ulster, where it was carried on to a great extent. The object of his committee was, to simplify the numerous and complicated acts of parliament which had been passed at different periods respecting this trade. Many difficulties arose respecting the arrangement of the officers, who were, as the law stood, to superintend the different markets in Ireland. The applications which were made on the subject from the counties of Down, Armagh, Londonderry, and Antrim, varied considerably in their nature, and it would be the business of the committee to investigate the several statements, and then consider under what regulations these officers should be appointed. It was his anxious wish to see the linen trade of Ireland extend and increase its branches. Wherever its industry existed, the moral and religious habits of the people were always remarkable; and it was gratifying to know, that the part of the county of Cork in which a linen manufactory was in some degree established was comparatively free from disturbance. He had no hesitation in saying, that the province of Ulster would have largely partaken of the heavy distress which oppressed so large a part of Ireland, were it not for the success with which the linen trade was there conducted, and which enabled the tenants to pay their rents.

Mr. Denis Browne entirely concurred in what had fallen from the right hon. gentleman on the value of the linen trade. He hoped the attention of the committee would be directed generally to the whole linen trade in Ireland, and not to any partial purpose.

Mr. Spring Rice spoke in favour of the Irish linen trade. Whatever measure was calculated to improve it must confer a great national benefit. He would suggest to the right hon. secretary for Ireland, the propriety of encouraging the growth of flax, and thereby opening a source of employment to the people, in the preparation of that article for the linen trade. This was a very favourable moment for giving effect to the report of the commissioners upon that subject.

The committee was then appointed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, May 20.

MARRIAGE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.] The House having resolved itself into a committee on this bill,

Dr. Phillimore proposed to substitute the word "natural" in place of the words "natural and lawful," in the first clause. In many instances the marriage had been invalidated, although the mother had given her consent to it, her daughter being a minor; because it had been afterwards proved that such [illegible] ly, and not the natural and lawful mother. The House, he thought, would not be disposed to sanction such a plea.

Mr. Wetherell was surprised at this clause, which was calculated rather to increase than to diminish the cases of doubt and difficulty which arose under the marriage act. Here was one of the penalties which had been long attached to illicit connexions at once removed. The effect of this first clause would be, that any young man might marry a minor, born out of wedlock, with the consent of her mother as knowing that the mother herself was not in a condition to give it under the present law, and as being willing to take the chance of future legal decisions, whether by the pending bill she would be empowered to consent. The present bill would be a premium on these hypothetical marriages, and might lead to the most mischievous consequences. A young lady might say to a gentleman, or a gentleman to a young lady under age, "Oh, never mind the consent of father, or mother, or guardian; let us marry, and take the chance of our marriage being, if we continue together till after our majority, declared valid, and our children legitimate, or, if we do not, of its being pronounced invalid, and our children illegitimated." In fact, the bill provided, that where parties had married, the one or each of them being a minor, without consent of parents or guardians duly obtained, they should not be allowed to institute any suit for the annulling of such marriage, if they had continued together until the minor was of the age of 21 years. This measure, therefore, which was intended to be amendatory was, in fact, attended with ten times the objections and obscurity that attached to the existing law. Since the case of "Liddiard and Horner," decided in 1799, and the effect of which was to lay down a rule of construction different from that which had previously prevailed every body must know the principle of the existing marriage law. It might be, therefore, imprudent to alter it. He would conclude by moving, as an amendment, that all the words after "be it enacted," be left out.

Sir J. Mackintosh said, he was not prepared to hear an hon. gentleman rise in his place in that House and declare that no alteration was called for in the existing marriage law—a law which he would be bold to say, had encouraged fraud, perjury, and dishonour—had sowed the seeds of dissention in private families—had caused misery and anguish between parties in all situations—and had introduced the most active principles of repulsion into all the elements of social life. The argument of the opponents of the present measure had been this—that some alterations in the marriage law might have been reasonably called for twenty or thirty years ago, but was by no means necessary now; that the case of "Liddiard and Horner," decided in 1799, laid down an entirely new rule of construction, different from that which had been observed from the passing of the marriage act in 1753, down to 1799; that that new rule of construction had been adhered to ever since, and therefore that the case of "Liddiard and Horner" must of necessity be known to all the world. The unquestionable talent of that most weighty authority (lord Stowell), by whom the case of "Liddiard and Horner" was decided, no man could more highly appreciate than he did; and the case was too well known to make it necessary for him now to describe it to the committee. The existing marriage act declared, that all marriages of minors, had without the consent of the natural and lawful father of the minor, if living; or if not, of the natural and lawful mother; or in case of their being both dead, then of the guardian appointed by the court of Chancery, or by testament, should be null and void. In the case, therefore, of a mother's giving consent to the marriage of her daughter if the mother be natural mother only, the marriage would be invalid, and the daughter would be illegitimate; if the daughter was illegitimate, so would her children be; and not only that, but the same illegitimacy would attach to their offspring, and so down to the latest generation. To guard against this cruel liability, a man upon the point of contracting marriage with a young woman would be under the necessity of making the strictest search into all the most secret history of the family with which he was about to ally himself. To what an inquisition would this be to expose the most virtuous individuals! It would be to violate that delicacy, in the observance of which our females were so carefully educated; and to ensure from the virtuous indignation of a woman so insulted, or from the just resentment of her family, the suitor's rejection and dismissal with contempt and scorn. He should assuredly vote against the amendment just proposed, and for this clause as part of the proposed bill.

Dr. Lushington said, that the grievances to which the marriage act gave rise were so numerous and so glaring, that he hoped a measure which tended to correct those evils would receive the approbation of the House. As the law stood, a parent or guardian, on a technical point, might seek to break a marriage, to which in the first instance they had assented.

Dr. Phillimore said, that as the law now stood, all marriages of minors, had without the consent of the natural and lawful parents, or of guardians, were declared to be null and void. The consequence was, that either of the parties contracting marriage under such a disability, might at any period of his or her life, however remote, come forward and set aside the connexion. They might, as the law was now administered, set aside their own oath, after taking the benefit of their own perjury.

The first clause was then agreed to. On the next clause being read,

Mr. Wetherell contended, that it would be an unprecedented deviation from the general rules of jurisprudence, to give this measure a retrospective operation. The general rule of law was, that a party should bear the consequences of their own crimes, faults, and even errors. It was unwarrantable, therefore, if a man became the lawful possessor of property, on account of the invalidity of the marriage of his uncle for example, to step in and deprive him of his right.

Sir J. Mackintosh maintained the propriety of the retrospective part of the bill, and cited several precedents in its favour; especially the statute of limitations, and the act of James 1st, assigning the period within which suits from personal property might be instituted. Thus, the security of a tailor's bill was guarded with all the anxiety of legislation, while the dearest and most solemn ties, as the marriage law now stood, were left without any corresponding protection. Hence might foreigners fairly infer, that the English disregarded every thing that was not immediately connected with pounds, shillings, and pence: that the relations of blood, and affection—the bonds of father, mother, and child,—were postponed on our Statute book to the most insignificant matter of pecuniary arrangement. The object of his amendment would be, to restore the bill in some degree to the shape in which it formerly passed that House. The law, as it now existed, was cruelly, needlessly, and inquisitorially retrospective, and one great object of the measure now under consideration was to remedy a law so unjust and tyrannical. The design of the hon. and learned gentleman who spoke last was, to postpone the operation of it until 90 or 100 years after the passing of the original statute, to which so many objections had been urged. The Scotch marriages, resorted to so frequently, soon after the adoption of the present marriage act, were only clumsy expedients to escape its wanton severity. The hon. member then proceeded to answer the challenge of his hon. and learned friend (Mr. Wetherell) on the subject of retrospective laws, and first referred to the modification and partial repeal of the marriage act ten years after it was passed in 1753. This amendment was retrospective, as well as lord Beauchamp's bill in 1781, which was introduced with the approbation of the then lord chief justice of the court of King's-bench. The further alteration of the law, carried at the suggestion of bishop Horsley, was also of the same character. Retrospective bills were numerous on our Statute book; but he particularly referred to that passed not many years since, in order to put an end to about 300 suits instituted against the clergy for non-residence. His hon. and learned friend had argued the question in a manner that savoured too much of special pleading and technicality, and had employed a sort of reasoning unworthy of him and of the House. The existing law tempted persons to pry into the secrets of families, in hopes of finding something to their advantage: it held out inducements to younger brothers to ascertain the legitimacy of their elder brothers, in order to defeat an entail; or, preserving the knowledge thus obtained until the death of the elder brother, to defraud his children of their natural expectations, and to turn them out into the world helpless and portionless orphans. He did not say that such had been the effect; but such was the tendency of the law. Among Englishmen he firmly believed that it operated rather as an incentive to virtue and generosity, than as a motive to blast the hopes of the innocent. It seemed admitted on all hands, that the amendment must be retrospective, and the question was, therefore, whether it should be so to the disadvantage of guiltless fathers, mothers, and children, or whether it should not rather be designed to disappoint the unhallowed and rapacious hopes of some despicable relation. The present law was opposed alike to the peace of families and to the security of property. Was marriage to be taken out of the rules applicable to all other contracts? In the case of a minor who contracted a debt, he might or he might not, when he came to age of discretion, sanction the contract. With a marriage he could not, for it was void ab initio. The present bill placed a marriage precisely in the situation of another contract. If a minor when he came of age continued in possession of land which he had previously taken, his continued possession made him liable for the arrears of rent. Should not a continued cohabitation with a female, who conceived herself legally married, be equally affirmatory of the marriage contract? The marriage act had originally been intended to settle difficulties and prevent cruel retrospective effects. But, like many precipitate measures, it had created the evil it was intended to prevent. This was its intention; but it had in its progress degenerated into a domineering law, highly injurious to various classes, and repugnant to the structure and general character of English society. It was more like a measure of the grandees of Castile, made to protect their moral and physical imbecility against any correction from the admixture of plebeian blood, than a measure in character with the mild and unoppressive dignity of English nobility. It was a law against marriages of affection, a law for rank and wealth against virtue and nature. The hon. member concluded by moving an amendment, omitting certain words and substituting others, for the purpose of rendering the measure more conformable to the bill of last session.

Mr. D. Gilbert observed, that parliament had, upon various occasions, agreed to bills which had a retrospective effect. In proof of this, he observed, that the ancient mode of executing deeds and wills was by sealing and delivering. In modern times, however, signing was introduced. Now, it had so happened, a few years ago, that property, to the amount of several millions, had been transferred in the ancient mode, without the formality of signing, by which the transfer was vitiated. Under these circumstances, that House had passed a bill, which was in spirit similar to that now before the House, by which those deeds were rendered valid.

The Marquis of Londonderry observed, that a great mass of evil was generated under the existing law, and, as a moral people, it was their duty to endeavour to remedy it. As to the objection which had been made to any retrospective operation of the present measure, he was of opinion, that where a great evil called for redress, no peculiarity of circumstance ought to arrest the omnipotence of parliament. The defects of the marriage act, if not remedied, were likely to disseminate mischief of the most deplorable description amongst families, and would, in many instances, render doubtful the legitimacy of children. He could see no reason whatsoever for withholding the operation of the present measure from those who had already gone into the ecclesiastical courts.

The amendment was agreed to, and the report was ordered to be received tomorrow.

NAVIGATION BILL.] The order of the day was read for going into a committee on this bill. On the question "That the Speaker do now leave the chair,"

Mr. Wallace said, he wished to offer to the House a few observations on the nature and object of the measure which they were about to discuss in committee, and, at the same time, to state the alterations he should propose in the committee, which he hoped would have the effect of obviating the principal objections that had been advanced against certain parts of the bill on a former evening. The measures now immediately before the House, and another, not at present under their consideration, were intended to carry into effect the propositions which he had the honour of laying before the House at the close of the last session, for the purpose of clearing, simplifying, and amending the navigation laws of this country, as well as with a view to the extending and improving our commercial intercourse with foreign nations. Bills were at that period introduced, pro forma, to give gentlemen an opportunity of weighing the subject in their minds. Since that time, various alterations were made in the measures then contemplated; and principally in giving additional simplicity to the bill immediately before them, by detaching from it, and placing in another bill, the repeal of those acts which its adoption would render unnecessary, and reducing it to a bill of enactment, with the reservation of such acts only as were not intended to be affected by it. The bill now before them, and the others to which he had alluded—to both of which he had himself directed the most vigilant attention—would, conjointly, have the effect of clearing and simplifying the existing law. This was proposed to be done by repealing a great variety of acts of parliament, which passed from the reign of Edward 3rd, when the first navigation laws were promulgated, down to the period of Charles 2nd. Those acts were passed under various circumstances, and with different objects; and, as those circumstances ceased to operate, the laws which they had created, fell into disuse; so that the acts from the time of Charles 2nd were universally considered as the navigation laws of the country, the statutes which had been enacted anterior to that period having become obsolete. Observing the contradictions which those acts frequently presented, not merely to statutes of a later date, but with reference to each other, it was deemed necessary to repeal all the laws which had been introduced on this subject before the reign of Charles 2nd. Those laws might be classed under three heads; namely, those which a change of circumstances had rendered obsolete; those which militated against the provisions of the existing navigation law; and those which were no longer necessary, in consequence of subsequent and more efficacious enactments.

With respect to the expediency of rendering the law as plain and intelligible as possible, there could be no doubt. Every one must agree, that it was an object of great importance so to frame the law that it should be subject to as little question or doubt as possible. To the general principle, he believed, there was and could be no objection; but it would be matter of consideration in the committee, whether this or that particular act should be repealed, or whether the description he had given of any of those acts which it was intended to remove was a correct one. Since the present bill was laid before parliament, petitions had been presented with reference to two of those acts—one relative to the export of wool, the other to the import of woollen cloth. With respect to the first, he had merely to observe, that the whole of its provisions were consolidated under the 28th of his late majesty; consequently, the repeal of the act passed previously to the reign of Charles 2nd, could not affect any party whose interests were protected by that statute: they would remain in precisely the same situation in which they stood at present. As to the importation of woollen cloth, there were acts on the Statute book which prohibited any such traffic; but they had been, in fact, all virtually repealed since the period when a duty of 50 per cent was imposed upon such importations, which had now subsisted, and been found a complete protection, for more than 30 years. Indeed, an act was passed some years ago, in the preamble to which it was set forth, that no such prohibition was necessary. These were the only two ancient acts to the repeal of which he believed any objection had been offered. The subject had been thoroughly considered since last session; and some few ancient acts, relative to our system of navigation, but of very little importance, had been discovered, and they were included in the measure now before the House. Of the provisions of the ancient acts, two only had been preserved. The object of the one was, to retain the recognizance by statute staple, a security still in use; the other passed in the time of Edward 3rd, which gave to the foreigner, in every case in which his interest was concerned, the right to demand a jury, half foreigners and half Englishmen. That law was one of the concessions which were made in confirmation of the great charter, and showed the disposition to encourage foreign trade by which that prince, one of the wisest that ever swayed the British sceptre, was actuated. The object of the present measure was confined to the navigation law, as it operated on our intercourse with foreign states; and in deciding on it, two questions were to be considered; first, whether it was necessary to make any alteration in the law; and next, whether the alterations which he was about to propose were wise and expedient? He was aware, that the projected alteration in the navigation law had excited great alarm amongst different classes of persons. They had been told, through the medium of resolutions, petitions, and papers published in various ways, that on an adherence to the principles on which the navigation law proceeded, depended the safety and prosperity of the country; and that those principles could not be surrendered without the greatest danger to the welfare of the state. If by the great principles of the navigation law was meant the preservation of a due preference to British shipping in the trade of the country—if it was meant by those principles, that countries which had no shipping of their own should send their commodities to England in British vessels—if it was intended by those principles to protect the direct trade with our colonies, and to maintain our coasting trade and fisheries—if these points were to be secured by the principles of the navigation law, he cordially and perfectly agreed in their justice and propriety. These were principles from which he would not depart, and which, he conceived, ought to be maintained at all hazards. But, if these principles tolerated and recommended a system of severe exclusion—if they pointed at a system of prohibition—if such were to be understood as what was meant by the principles of the navigation law, then he totally disagreed from those who approved of them; and he thought that many of the laws which were enacted on those principles might be removed with great advantage to the best interests of the country [Hear!]. Those who approved of this harsh and severe system, contended that foreigners had no right to complain of the law. He knew very well, that it was in the power of every country to determine what degree of commerce it would carry on with neighbouring nations, and under what regulations or restrictions it should be done. That was the undoubted right of every state. Whatever those restrictive laws might be, as it was optional with the foreign country to carry on trade under them, or to decline a commercial connexion with the state which imposed them; in that sense, the foreigner had no right to complain. But though he had no right to complain, he certainly had a right to retaliate. He might meet restriction by restriction—he might encounter prohibition by prohibition—he might oppose severity by severity [Hear!]. Doubtless England had a right to declare what her commerce should be; but having made that declaration—having stated how far foreign trade should extend—it was proper that the legislature should examine whether the regulations established for the purpose of maintaining and encouraging that trade were, or were not wise and politic. With a view to this, it would be an object of consideration, how far the feelings of foreign nations were to be conciliated—not as foreigners, but because it was essential to the preservation of that degree of commerce which the interests of the country called upon us to maintain—a concession made on this principle was no sacrifice—it was a wise, a just regard to the national welfare; and if the benefit was not confined to this country alone, but extended itself to other states, it might be more gratifying, but was not, therefore, less consistent with British interests, or he believed with the feelings of those he was then addressing. In this country, arrived at the state in which we saw it, considering all the advantages it possessed in its marine, its manufactures, its experience, its machinery, its capital, it appeared to him most evident that the freest system of trade would be found by far the most advantageous [Hear.] If this were the fact, and if they felt severely the baneful effects of those restrictions which foreign powers opposed to our trade—restrictions which were increasing every day—if, two years ago, the manufacturing interest called out against the restrictions which parliament had imposed on foreign trade, and demanded their removal—if such restrictions were found equally injurious to those against whom they were directed, and those by whom they were inflicted—if they were inimical to the interests of this country, was it not the wisest and soundest system they could adopt to abandon those principles which had produced so much mischief, and to retrace their steps as quickly as possible? He knew that, in consequence of the artificial situation in which the country was placed, under the system which had so long prevailed, any relaxations we could make must be confined to narrow limits; but he thought it would be wise and prudent to go to the utmost verge of them, consistent with the safety and prosperity of those classes of the people whose interests they were especially bound to protect, and to do homage to those principles and that system, which while it was beneficial to others was calculated most eminently to promote the interests of the British empire—which afforded the widest range to commerce—which was the most powerful incentive to enterprize, and the surest nurse of exertion and improvement amongst mankind, on whatever soil, under whatever climate, or in whatever quarter of the globe, their destiny may have placed them. The object of the bill was, to attain this end, or at all events to mark the disposition of Great Britain to effect it.

He was aware of the respect in which the navigation laws were held, and was far from questioning the policy of them at the period and under the circumstances in which they were enacted. What was the situation of the Dutch at that period? They possessed the greatest proportion of the wealth and commerce of the world. The navy of Holland was most formidable, and the alliances which that state had formed were most dangerous to the interests and security of England. It was, therefore, a great object to pull down and weaken the rival power of Holland. It was wise, in a political point of view, to enact laws for that purpose; and whatever was necessary for maintaining any advantage that was acquired by those laws, he was ready to preserve. At that necessity, however, he would stop; because all beyond it was useless severity, calculated only to injure us by exciting in the minds of other states a desire to retaliate. England had already suffered much, in consequence of the desire which other powers felt to retaliate; and if he were not very much mistaken, she was likely to suffer a great deal more. He knew not how far the gentlemen connected with the shipping interest might agree with him, but he could assure them, that they had not their interest at heart more sincerely or more warmly than he had. He wished to protect them through the other interests of the country, but he felt no desire to protect them independently of those interests; neither did he wish to extend to them any thing that could be deemed an unnecessary protection. He would ask, what was the best and truest support of the navy, but a large, extensive, and flourishing commerce? He did not know a country in the world that had a great navy without an extensive commerce; neither did he know any state that had a flourishing commerce, without being at the same time an extensive naval power. He knew there were some cases in which navigation and commerce came in conflict; and in those cases he would prefer the interest of navigation to that of commerce. He would support navigation, because commerce evidently depended on the existence of a great naval force. In that point of view it was, that the acts of Charles 2nd were wise and politic. The legislature of that day preferred navigation to commerce, and it was right that they should do so. That system of policy had answered all the purposes for which it was introduced, the principle of which was to reduce the power and commerce of the Dutch. But that object having been effected, there was no longer any necessity for pursuing the same course. What had been the history of the commerce of Great Britain since that time? Was it marked by an inflexible and strict adherence at all times, and under all circumstances, to this system? Certainly it was not. On the contrary, the whole history of our commerce, from that period, proved that a system of relaxation from those acts was adopted. In fact, the statutes relaxing the navigation law in favour of commerce amounted in number to more than 300. Had, in consequence of those relaxations, the naval power of the country sunk?—far from it—in carrying the commerce of England, to the highest pitch that the commerce of any country had ever reached, it would be found that, during the last twenty-five years, our naval power, had gone hand in hand with our commercial greatness. With respect to the time, there could be none so proper as the present, when every nation was struggling for commerce and establishing her commercial regulations. What did we see but the effects of our own mistaken policy in the conduct of all around us? They might look to France, to Austria, to Holland, to Prussia, to Russia. We had been lately called on to retaliate upon Russia. Retaliate for what? For having practised the lesson and acted upon the principles our example had taught her. We had no right to complain of those measures. A wiser course was, in his opinion, to profit by what we saw, and set the example of a return to more liberal principles and a sounder system.

It now became his duty to explain the provisions of the bill, and the alterations he proposed to introduce. The bill might be divided in its application to the trade of Europe and of the other quarters of the world—to foreigners and to British subjects. He should begin by the way in which it affected the foreigner and the trade of Europe. To the first alteration proposed by the bill he anticipated no objection; it appeared to him to meet the approbation of all parties. It was, to allow foreign ships to bring goods from any port where they happened to be, provided that they belonged to the port in question. This he did not think there was any reason for fearing would generate or encourage an habitual trade. It would, however, remove a great deal of inconvenience. The expenses and other disadvantages incidental to trans-shipments would always prevent any new or irregular practice from receiving encouragement, to the prejudice of a more direct and established trade. Another relaxation to which he had to draw the attention of the House, referred to a particular part of Europe, now in close amity and alliance with us. The act of Charles 2nd, to which he had already adverted, permitted foreign goods to enter our ports either in British vessels, or in ships of that country of which they were the growth and produce. But such at that time was our dread of the rivalry of Holland, that the Dutch were debarred from the benefit of this general rule, and the importation of certain articles was forbidden from Holland and the Netherlands in any ships whatever, under the penalty of the confiscation of the ship and cargo. There was certainly no reason now why Holland should not be placed in the same situation with the rest of Europe. The same rule of policy that applied to other countries was just as applicable to her. In so expressing himself, he was, indeed, fortified by the evidence of the principal and most intelligent merchants who had been examined on this subject. There were some, undoubtedly, who entertained objections of a peculiar nature, and with regard to which he should make a few observations. They referred generally to the probable event of Holland becoming a dépôt for the Mediterranean trade, and to the danger attending our importation of large quantities of goods through this medium. The only advantage Holland could be supposed to possess arose out of the restrictions imposed by our quarantine laws which he trusted would be reconsidered. If a relaxed system was safe to Holland, it was not very easy to understand why it should be dangerous to us. They were also rendered secure by the present state of our own law. The act of the 45th of Geo. 3rd gave power to the king in council of regulating and applying the law of quarantine; and under the application of it all goods and merchandise of the Mediterranean coming through Holland would be subject to the same quarantine on reaching this country, as if brought directly from the ports of the Levant. When gentlemen added to this consideration the charges upon trans-shipment—the hazard of our importations taking place through the course which had been pointed out was reduced to too small a point to excite any apprehension whatsoever.

The next alteration applied to Russia, and Turkey. By the provisions of the Navigation Law, the importation of articles known by the name of enumerated articles was confined either to ships of the country of their produce or British ships, while the importation of other articles was free. This was the case in respect to the nations of Europe generally; but to this rule the countries adverted to were exceptions. From them no goods or produce could come but under that special restriction—for such exception there appears at present no ground, and it is proposed to place those states on the same footing in relation to the commerce with this country as the other nations of Europe. In doing this however, it was his intention to add to the list of those enumerated, (thereby subjecting them to the restriction applicable to such), the articles of tallow, tobacco, and thrown silk. As to the last article, he begged to remind the House that at this moment, under the 22nd of Geo. 3rd, it might be imported from Ostend, or any part of the Austrian Netherlands, and that, in fact, our manufacture was flourishing, and had grown up only under protection of the high duty to which the foreign one was subjected. This he had no intention of touching. What, then, was the ground for all the clamour that had been made, and all the representations that had been, with such indecorous importunity, pressed upon the members of the House, who were beset in the lobby in a way which he had never witnessed on any former occasion. They talked of new facilities being afforded to smuggling. He could not see where such new facilities were to be discovered. Every facility there could be found after the passing of the bill, existed now; and if they were not resorted to now, there was no reason to believe they would be so hereafter. These were the alterations he contemplated in the trade of Europe. Without endangering in any degree the interests of this country, they afforded some convenience to foreigners, and relaxed something of that severity which had long been the reproach of our commercial system. They got rid, too, of that source of confusion and embarrassment which had been found to arise from the construction and application given to the act of Charles 2nd, which, by referring to countries in that division of Europe which existed at the period of passing the law, gave different regulations for almost each respective country, and even for different parts of the same country. This by its reference to the articles to be imported gives one law for the whole, applicable equally to all times and all circumstances under which Europe can be placed.

He next adverted to the trade carried on with other quarters of the world, and stated the principal alteration affecting foreign ships, which he should propose in that branch of commerce that would probably arise out of the events which had occurred in South America. He need not dwell upon the situation in which those events had placed that country, or recall the recent declaration of Mr. Zea. The field which had been thus opened to commerce was most extensive and valuable; and it was most desirable that we should put this country, as far as the law was concerned, in a condition to reap all the advantages of it. The message of the president marked the course likely to be taken by the United States, and it was probable that they had already recognized the independent character of the new republics. He did not mean to prescribe to his majesty's government what line they should adopt with respect to the question of recognition; all he desired to do, and in this he trusted the House would concur with him, was, to put the law in such a state, that, if the recognition of these states should be deemed expedient, no impediment should remain to prevent the country from deriving the full benefit of it, in its commercial interests. He intended, therefore, to propose the introduction of clauses, which should permit a direct trade to the ships of South America with the united kingdom, in the same way, and founded on the same principles, as it had been under different acts, already extended to the United States and the Brazils.

These were all the relaxations of the existing law he had it in contemplation to offer in favour of foreign navigation. The remaining alteration applied to the British ship. It was known that the British ship in Europe could import into this country every thing from every place, with certain exceptions in respect to the Netherlands; but that in the trade with Asia, Africa, and America, it could only bring the produce of each directly from the place of its growth or manufacture. This had appeared to him an inconvenient and useless restriction, and he had intended to put the British ship into possession of the same facilities in respect to the distant quarters of the world, that it already enjoyed in respect to Europe. It had, however, been contended, that such a change might be attended with great injury to the British shipping; that it might lead to the importation of articles into the continent, in the foreign ship, which would be only transported from thence in the British ship; that hence a new course of trade would be established, by which a great and valuable part of the employment of British shipping might be put in hazard. This danger, he said, rested only on the assumed advantages, in point of cheapness, possessed by foreign navigation, which, he contended on various grounds, did not exist in any degree sufficient to counterbalance the expence and inconvenience of a circuitous voyage and trans-shipment in a foreign port. He stated his belief that these advantages were very much exaggerated, and were balanced by others possessed by British shipping. That in our trade with the north of Europe, where the advantages of cheap construction and navigation were the greatest, more than half the tonnage employed was British. That France, Holland, and America were our principal rivals in the distant trade, and that the freights to France and Holland in the last year were higher than to England, and the Americans, from a variety of evidence, appeared to sail their ships at greater expense than we did. On these grounds, he entertained little apprehension of any material danger to the shipping interests of the United Kingdom; but he felt there were circumstances under which some hazard was to be anticipated, and had thought of providing against it by a duty on all goods, the produce of Asia, Africa, and America, coming from a European port. In applying this, however, he had found great difficulties, and had therefore adopted the alteration of permitting goods to be imported into the United Kingdom, in this manner, for exportation only. In making this alteration, he did not consider himself as making any sacrifice of principle. New facilities were still given to the British ship, and it could bring every thing from any place exempt from the danger of seizure and confiscation to which it was now subject. He felt equally with those whose alarms had been excited, that the danger apprehended was to be guarded against. They had differed only in their mode of accomplishing the same object; an object much too important to the most essential interests of the country to be trifled with, and which he was as anxious as any man to put beyond all hazard. This, he trusted, by the proposition he had made, was effectually done. In conclusion, he repeated, that his first purpose was, to simplify and clear the law, and reduce that which had been to be sought through a multitude of acts, to a few simple clauses; his next, to relax the restrictions of the present law, as far as might be done with safety, and to show the disposition of this country to a more enlightened and liberal system of commercial policy than that by which it had been hitherto governed. He implored the House to consider, that the decision it came to on the present bill might have the effect of eventually establishing and securing the unquestionable benefits of such a system to the nations of the world, or fixing upon them all the evils of a contrary one, for centuries to come.—He then moved, That the Speaker should leave the chair.

Mr. Davenport vindicated the proceedings of the deputation from the silk manufacturers. The silk trade was the only flourishing trade in the country at the present moment. He trusted that full time would be allowed to those whose interests were affected to be heard by counsel against the bill.

Sir W. De Crespigny protested against the principle of the bill. It militated against the best interests of the country, and was equally prejudicial to British shipowners and seamen.

Sir M. W. Ridley defended the shipping interest against the animadversions thrown out against them. It might be said that they were a body who felt anxiously alive to their own exclusive interests; but so ought all bodies of men to feel. It was their opinion, that where a competition existed an advantage should not be taken from one party which would result to the benefit of the other. But the difference of expense in navigating an English ship of 500 tons, and a foreign ship of the same burden, was upwards of 1,700 against the English ship; therefore the foreign ship ought not to be placed in the same condition with the English ship. At all events, the parties should have time to consider the subject before it passed into a law.

The House having resolved itself into the committee,

Mr. Davenport moved, that thrown silk be withdrawn from the articles enumerated in the first clause.

Mr. Bastard hoped an opportunity would be afforded to the silk manufacturers to be heard by counsel.

Mr. T. Wilson did not think that the measure would be productive of the good anticipated from it.

Mr. Ellice suggested the propriety of giving time for the fullest consideration of the subject. He hoped the right hon. gentleman would give members an opportunity of discussing the subject at some future stage.

Mr. Wallace said, he had no wish to refuse the fullest opportunity to parties concerned to defend their interests.

Mr. M. A. Taylor would oppose the bill in every stage, and was for inserting any article by which the bill might be likely to be thrown out. If passed into a law, it would transfer the trade of England to the opposite shores.

Mr. Ricardo considered it a happy omen that so many gentlemen were now of opinion that our system admitted of improvement. The only complaint he had against the bill was, that it did not go far enough.

Mr. Brougham said, he recognised in this bill a portion, though a very minute portion, of the improvements in our commercial system which had often been recommended from his side of the House. A few years since, he had occasion to call their attention to the state of the manufacturers of this country, who had been then almost as much distressed as the agriculturists were now. He then alluded to the improvement of the navigation laws as a remedy, and had remarked, that they had indeed been once beneficial, but that their character had since changed. On that occasion the very person who now brought forward the present measure, had moved the passing to the order of the day. He (Mr. B.) rejoiced that in this improving age the measure which had been so treated five years ago was now brought forward under auspices which made success almost certain. As relaxation had begun on a point where it was not natural to have expected it, he had no doubt that farther relaxations would take place on those points where a liberal policy was more manifestly the interest of the merchant. He hoped that the principle of this bill would be made more effectual, by being applied to the criminal law and the system of taxation, as well as to the commercial policy of the country; and he trusted that when similar propositions should again emanate from his side of the House they would meet with more liberal treatment than they were accustomed to receive.

The amendment was withdrawn, and the clause agreed to. The other clauses were then agreed to, and the House resumed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, May 21.

IRISH PAYMENT OF RENT BILL.] Sir J. Newport rose to move for leave to bring in a bill "to authorize occupying tenants in Ireland to tender in part payment of rent receipts for grand jury and parochial assessments, subject to certain exceptions." This bill materially concerned the interests of a large portion of the people of Ireland, whose distresses it was calculated to relieve, as well as to place them in a greater degree of certainty as to the payments which they had to incur with their rent. The grand jury presentments in Ireland were peculiarly extensive and severely pressing in their nature upon the occupying tenant. Soon after the Union, the Irish presentments did not exceed 400,000*l*., and they amounted to 1,200,000*l*., a sum always paid by the occupying tenant, one variable in its nature, and against which the tenant had no means of providing at the time he made his bargain with the landlord. It would be material to consider whether the latter ought not to bear some portion of this expense. He did not mean to meddle with existing contracts. The object of his bill was prospective, and only to affect future bargains. He thought the disbursements, though made in the first instance by the tenant, should be repayable to him by the landlord on the settlement for rent. It was most desirable in Ireland that the tenant should be placed in such a situation as to know exactly what sum he had to pay, and not be responsible for local payments of the kind he alluded to, in addition to his rent.

IRISH CIVIL LIST.] Mr. Hume, in moving for a return of all pensions, allowances and other expenses paid out of the Civil List of Ireland, observed, that he was extremely desirous of ascertaining how they had been augmented to so large an amount. The civil list of Ireland amounted in the first year to, 214,877*l*. and the permanent charges on the consolidated fund, were 402,339*l*.—He was aware that many compensations and allowances had been granted at the time of the Union, with little attention to economy, or consideration of the services for which such pensions were granted. It was necessary that the whole subject should be revised, and he could point out a mode by which an immediate, though a small, saving might be made to make a beginning with. In the list of pensions, and he should state that as an example of the little attention paid by the government to the expenditure in Ireland. He saw that 200*l*. was annually given to two individuals since 1726, on the conditions that the annuity should be continued until the principal sum of 2,000*l*. were paid to them at once. Now, at 3 per cent the interest of 2,000*l*. would be 60*l*., and at five per cent 100*l*., so that at least half the sum every year charged upon the public might be spared by paying the sum of 2,000*l*. at once. Pensions in Ireland had been obtained in a very doubtful manner, and he thought that many of them would not bear inquiry. It might also be found, that a number of individuals held offices and at the same time received retired allowances for offices they had lost, or for others from which they had retired on superannuation. When the exchequers of England and Ireland were consolidated, pensions and allowances to the amount of nearly 7,000*l*. were granted to individuals whose services were no longer wanted in that office. A Mr. Crofton obtained an allowance of 1,000*l*. a year, and now filled, as reported to him, (Mr. H.) some employment or place in the vice treasurer's office, with pensions for himself and other branches of his family amounting to near 1,000*l*. a year more. A Mr. Mitchell was in the same predicament; he had three offices and retiring pensions which with his emoluments, were about 1,150*l*. Out of eighteen individuals, there might be others who either ought to give up their places, or their allowances; if they filled official situations their pensions might be relinquished, and the money saved to the public. He begged leave, while upon the subject of the Irish civil list, to notice an opinion promulgated by the noble marquis on a former night with so much confidence, that it was calculated, although contrary to all experience and sound policy, to produce a false impression out of doors. It was, that the civil list, being a contract with the Crown, for the king's life was not under the cognizance of the House. If so, why had the noble marquis himself come down in the year 1815, to the House, to claim and obtain and additional allowance for the civil list? If it were a contract, it must be equally binding on both parties. In the first year of the late reign the civil list was fixed at 800,000*l.* but by the 17th Geo. III. c. 21 it was increased to 900,000*l.* in 23rd Geo. 3rd 950,000*l.*; in 44th Geo. 3rd. 1,010,000*l.*; in 50th Geo. 3rd. 1,020,000*l.* in 52nd Geo. 3. c. 2 to 1,090,000*l.* In fact, whenever the civil list was in difficulties and that more money was wanted, it was held not to be a binding contract, at least on the part of the sovereign. But he would submit to the noble marquis, and appeal to the House that such proceedings were not fair. As the parliament had the power, and in its liberality, had from time to time added to the allowances of the civil list, he (Mr. H.) thought it altogether unreasonable in the noble marquis to deny the power of the House to reduce the civil list, if they should think them too high. Besides the augmentations he had noticed, the pensions to the royal family, formerly paid out of the civil list, were now carried to the account of the consolidated fund: and in the course of the late reign the ministers had obtained from the House additional grants to the extent of 3,747,774*l. The Crown had besides about one million from the droits of Admiralty, and near a million from other resources; and, on the whole, the Crown had obtained during the last reign between 5 and 6 millions beyond the amount specified in the supposed contract. It was his intention also to move for a return of the pensions and allowances in Ireland, not paid out of the civil list, as well as for a return of the manner in which 20,000*l.* voted by the House for civil contingencies in Ireland had been expended as there were some rather extraordinary charges under that head. He saw that 637*l.* 7*s.* 11*d.* had been paid to sir C. Flint, for transmitting the public acts of the session, and 1,602*l.* for prosecutions of the Bank of Ireland. These matters deserved inquiry, as well as the application, in 1819, of 10,000*l.* as secret service money; and in 1820 and 1821, of still larger sums under the same head, of which no account had been rendered. He also found, that out of the civil contingencies, 2,910*l.* and 660*l.* were paid to the secretaries of the lord lieutenant; whether for salaries or on what account he did not know, but he saw no reason why any such payments should be made to them from that source.

The Marquis of Londonderry was surprised, after it had been intimated to the hon. gentleman, that no opposition would be made to his motion, that he should have brought forward such a variety of details, which no man could be prepared to answer on the sudden, which were calculated to produce false and painful impressions—and which could answer no practical purpose. With reference to the question the hon. gentleman had again raised on the contract of the civil list, he (lord L.) contended, that it was a contract of the strictest kind, under the sanction of the law. It was true, that like all contracts, it could be avoided by consent of the parties; and whenever the Crown came to parliament, the whole question was thus opened to revision. But the Crown had never said—"give me back my hereditary duties;" and the public had been a gainer during the whole of the late reign, by an arrangement made at the beginning of it, to the extent of eight or ten millions.

Mr. Bennet said, that constitutional authorities were decidedly against the position of the noble marquis. As to the Crown having been a loser by the contract, if the public had not been saddled with many of the burthens formerly borne by the Crown, it might have been a gainer. As it was, the Crown had had the advantage.

Mr. Goulbourn was confident, that the hon. member for Aberdeen was mistaken in several of the statements he had made.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer rose to do justice to Mr. Crofton, who had indeed a retired allowance of 1,000*l.* a year, and who on the consolidation of the two exchequers (having served in that of Ireland for 30 or 40 years), requested to be allowed to fill the office of Irish secretary to the chancellor of the exchequer, without any salary. He had done so, and had received nothing for his most useful and valuable services; thereby saving the public 400*l.* a year.

Sir J. Newport felt himself bound to bear testimony to the talents of Mr. Crofton in the department to which he had so long belonged.

Mr. Peel had been for six years connected by official ties with Mr. Crofton, and assured the hon. member for Montrose, that he was completely mistaken in his assertions. He was also misinformed regarding the secretaries of the lord lieutenant, who received nothing from the civil contingencies.

Mr. Hume said, he had spoken of Mr. Crofton, only as one out of eighteen; and if he was mistaken, the return, when produced, would set him right. If the secretaries of the lord lieutenant did not receive the sums he had mentioned from the civil contingencies, he apprehended it would be found that they did obtain them from the civil list, or from the consolidated fund.

The motion was agreed to.

Thursday, May 23.

IRISH POOR EMPLOYMENT BILL.] The bill having been read a first time,

The Marquis of Lansdown said, he was not friendly to the suspension of the standing orders of the House for the purpose of accelerating the progress of bills, but under the special circumstances of the present bill, having for its object, the immediate relief of a considerable portion of the population of Ireland now labouring under the most severe distress, and recollecting also that at the commencement of the session the standing orders were suspended for the purpose of passing with greater rapidity measures for their coercion, he thought this was a case in which their lordships might be fairly called upon to suspend these orders, for the purpose of enabling this bill to be passed at once through its different stages.

Lord King had no doubt that their lordships would willingly give their consent to this measure, tardy and inefficient as it was. In the distressed districts of Ireland, a million of people were said to be in a state of absolute starvation; and this bill proposed to lay out 50,000*l.* in giving them employment. That was a sum which, if fairly distributed, would only be a shilling a piece for each distressed individual. But it was not too much to suppose that a considerable part of the sum would be intercepted in its progress, and be lost in jobs. There was nothing done in Ireland without a job. Much offence had been taken in another place at a learned person's declaration, that the landlords of Ireland were rapacious; but it was not merely of the landlords that the people of Ireland had to complain. The learned person might have spoken also of the rapacity of the church of Ireland, and of the government of Ireland.

The Earl of Limerick was surprised that the noble lord should choose such a moment for repeating any exasperating language, which might have been used in another place. For his part, he would assert that, whoever had cast on the landlords of Ireland the charge of rapacity, such charge was not founded in fact. There were, undoubtedly, some rapacious landlords in Ireland, and so there were in England. As to jobbing, it was most unfair to apply it exclusively to Ireland; for if the public money was to be laid out in England some of it would find its way into the pockets of those who were not intitled to it. What had been done in this country for the relief of Ireland was most generous, and would, he doubted not, have a powerful influence in the work of conciliation.

Lord King protested that he had not held exasperating language. The whole object of what he had stated, was to show that all had not been done which ought to be done in so pressing a case. Those who had caused the evil ought to be more liberal in relieving it. The sum given by the bill was too little to afford any substantial relief to the suffering people of Ireland.

The Earl of Blesington denied that there was any foundation for the charge of rapacity, as applied generally to the landlords of Ireland. With regard to the bill, it was a measure highly satisfactory to him, though he trusted that it would be followed by other measures for the relief of the suffering people of Ireland.

The Earl of Liverpool said, that under the special circumstances of the case, he was induced to support the bill; it being, in his opinion, objectionable in principle. The general principle acted upon in England was, to leave public works, such as roads, canals, &c. to individual or joint speculation, it being well understood, that under such a system, individuals were induced, for the sake of their own interest, to a careful superintendance, and a more economical expenditure of money in consequence took place. As to the objection, that the relief was of small amount, it was only necessary for him to say, that it was considered enough for the present exigency, and that there would be ample time to apply a further sum for the same purpose if the present should be found insufficient.

The Marquis of Downshire regarded the measure as merely temporary, and trusted that government would look a little deeper into the state of Ireland. The great cause of the discontents in that country he considered to be the state of the law respecting tithes. He concurred in every thing that had been said on that subject by a noble duke (Devonshire) previous to the recess. The revision of the tithe system was indispensable, for nothing could be worse adapted to the situation of the country. He was himself a great proprietor of tithes, but he was willing to make almost any sacrifice to get rid of a system fraught with such injurious consequences to agriculture, and productive of so much discontent.

The Earl of Darnley was sensible of the hardships of the tithe system, but considered the want of employment to be the great cause of the present distress in Ireland. He wished that what was now done had been done sooner, and thought that it would have been more gracious to vote as much for the suffering people of Ireland as parliament had done for the Russians, Spaniards, and Portuguese. With respect to landlords in Ireland, he disclaimed any thing like a system of oppression on their part.

The Marquis of Lansdown gave notice, that if no measure of a more permanent nature should be brought forward, he would shortly call their lordships attention to the situation of Ireland, with the view of proposing some measure having for its object to promote the happiness and secure the conciliation of the people.

The bill went through all its stages, and was passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, May 23.

WELCH JUDICATURE.] Mr. Allen prefaced his motion upon this subject by a variety of observations upon the state of the courts of justice in Wales. He complained generally of the want of responsible officers, and of the inefficacy of process issuing from the courts of equity. The courts of common law were, perhaps, in even a worse condition. The allowing judges to practise as barristers between the sessions was highly objectionable. It opened a door to connexions between judges and attorneys, which might be highly prejudicial to the ends of justice. The hon. gentleman further complained of that law which permitted the trying of a Welsh cause in the nearest English county. When the House heard that the cost of such a removal was 300*l.*, they would at once see that the power was useless to the poor, and capable of being converted into an engine of oppression in the hands of the rich. In fact, in any dispute between a rich man and a poor one, the threat to try at Hereford commonly put an end to the suit. In proportion to the inexperience of the judges, the number of offences might be fairly presumed to have increased. Under the present system, strong political objections might be urged to the Welsh judgeships. These judges were now capable of holding offices at pleasure, and of retaining their seats in that House. The public opinion of their integrity must be weakened by the knowledge that they were selected from a different class of men from that out of which judges in England were chosen. The defective state of the judicature had a tendency to increase the number of attornies in Wales; yet, notwithstanding the multitude of these gentlemen, either their inexperience or incapacity was very great under the existing arrangement, or they had not time to do justice to their clients. Sometimes issue was not joined for three days together after the plea had been put in. It might be supposed that he was prepared with some outline of the system which he proposed to substitute in lieu of the present Welsh judicature. In the first place, he should propose to make such an arrangement as might render two judges adequate to the whole of the duties; and secondly, he should suggest a plan by which employment might be found for these two judges in London, between the terms. He should propose to divide the Oxford circuit, and to appoint, as assize towns, four places for South Wales; namely, Worcester, Glocester, Monmouth, and Hereford; and four for North Wales —Shrewsbury, Chester, and two others. It was his purpose that these judges should form, as it were, an additional Court of King's-bench; that they should have equal rank, salaries, and honours, with the judges of the King's-bench in England. They might be occupied in the discharge of insolvent debtors, in hearing cases after term, and in relieving the Court of King's-bench in London from a portion of their criminal proceedings, particularly in revenue cases. Of the necessity of such relief a very strong instance had occurred only a few days ago. Some libellers were brought up in the Court of King's-bench to receive judgment for defaming the late Queen. Judgment in that case was obliged to be postponed, because the court was not full. Now, the measure which he had to propose would keep the court always full, and prevent these inconveniences from occurring. He had prepared some resolutions, which he should move in the committee, if the House would allow the measure to proceed so far. He was disposed to think that the whole of this plan might be effected by appointing two more judges of the Court of King's-bench, in the room of the chief justice of Chester, and the seven other Welsh judges. Such a plan as he had now opened would greatly shorten those sittings after term, which now left to the judges of the Court of King's-bench little or no vacation. Only a fortnight ago he was informed that there would remain for these sittings more than 40 cases in the Court at Westminster, and 100 in the Court at Guildhall. The hon. gentleman concluded by moving, "That this House do resolve itself into a committee of the whole House, to take into consideration the reports of committees upon Welsh Judicature in the years 1817, 1820, and 1821."

Mr. Barham said, that on fairly viewing this subject, any one would naturally ask what reason could be assigned for supporting a separate judicature for so small a part of the united kingdom? Reasons, cogent enough, might have existed in the time of Henry 8th; but what was there now in the state of Wales, so different from that of any other part of the empire, as to make such a judicature necessary? He might be answered, that the language of the country was different. But to this he should rejoin, that the proceedings, the barristers, the judges, were all English. The country was mountainous; but many parts of England were equally so. He believed the present Welsh judges to be men of learning, integrity, and honour, but he must be allowed to observe, that the judges in Wales were not looked upon by the people with the same respect that was shown to the judges in this country. The Welsh people could not but be aware that their judges were chosen, sometimes, rather for their parliamentary services, than for their professional qualification. The best evidence of the opinions of the people was to be found in their own conduct; and certain it was, that they removed every thing they possibly could do —and that at a great charge—to another judicature. Without meaning any reflection on an hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Jones), he did think that the motion would do a great good, if it should reduce the number of Welsh attornies in some proportion to the remainder of the population.

Mr. Jones expressed his decided disapprobation of the motion. Admitting for the argument that the court of equity could not enforce it's decrees, it was in the option of the plaintiff to proceed either there or in the superior court of England; but he was prepared to show, in opposition to what had been stated, that it could enforce its decrees. Having gone through the whole of the evidence annexed to the two reports, he felt satisfied that it was strongly against the change now proposed. The hon. gentleman entered into some details in order to support this opinion. He particularly dwelt upon the point, that law was both cheaper and more expeditious in Wales than in England, and to this effect he quoted the words of the report of the committee of 1819. He also adverted to the testimony in favour of the alteration, and mentioned in succession the names of the judges who had formerly presided in Wales, and of the more eminent barristers who had practised there. He had never been more astonished than by the attack upon the mode in which the criminal law was administered in the principality, and was willing to give up the whole subject, if it could be satisfactorily proved that injustice had been done in a single instance. He agreed that the Welsh judges should not have seats in that House, and that the appointments ought to be made by the lord chancellor, and not by the Treasury, so that the office might not be conferred from any political motives. He was himself ready, if the present motion were rejected, to bring in a bill to remedy existing defects and abuses, such as were found by the committee to prevail; and which bill had had the sanction of the first legal authorities.

Sir J. Mackintosh said, he should be curious to see in what manner the hon. gentleman would word his clause to prevent the appointment of Welsh judges from political motives, and to deprive the Treasury of the power which it possessed at present by law, in order to transfer it to the lord chancellor. The old mode of appointment by the minister of the day, was, of itself, a most abominable evil; and he put it to those who heard him, whether the inhabitants of the principality of Wales were not entitled to the same pure administration of justice as the people of England. It was puerile to bring forward the names of respectable persons who had taken Welsh judgeships only as a stage in their professional advancement. He might just as fitly quote the names of lord Bacon and lord Coke, in favour of the continuance of the court of star chamber. Would any man say that the principle of selection was the same with the Welsh judges as with the other judges of the land? It was not to be denied, that the former had been chosen for their parliamentary influence; and if this was the fact, what more was it necessary to state in support of the present motion? He was not at all sure that the exclusion of Welsh judges from seats in the House would be effectual. They might still be named from parliamentary considerations; and, though the mode and form might thus be changed, the effect would be the same, while the responsibility of the advisers of the Crown in this respect might be lessened. The details given in the course of the debate, showed that the tribunals in Wales were incompetent and inefficient. As to the question whether the inhabitants of the principality were in favour of the amendment suggested, that it was a matter peculiarly for the consideration of the legislature, and upon which popular opinion could be least of all valuable. The proposers of this committee, in his opinion, deserved respect and gratitude for not having excited clamour upon a subject of so much nicety and difficulty. The inclination of his mind was always against increasing the number of the judges, without a manifest necessity. He was fully aware of the advantage of having a small number of superior judges. It was only when the number was small, that the highest point of honour was placed in the judicial integrity and propriety of their conduct, for any number of years. Where the number was great, there would be many instances of failure both in point of ability and in point of propriety; and the more numerous such instances became, the more general would be the fall of tone and feeling on the subject of judicial honour. Such a fall of tone, he should regard as the greatest public misfortune. He had always thought, that two circumstances, which were most happy, were to be found in the judicial administration of this country. The first was, that the great secret had been discovered of making the superior judges small in number, and giving them an ample income; but not so large as to lead to improper appointments. The second circumstance was, the giving of dignity to gentlemen of wealth and character by the only means by which it could be given to them, that was, by making the duty of magistracy gratuitous in their hands. They enjoyed a rank above their fellow-citizens only by the faithful discharge of the most important duties. This state of judicature might be called the wisest and the happiest that ever existed, according to the views taken of its origin and history; for he would not take it upon him to say whether it was the result of human contrivance, or the happy effect of time and circumstances. But he was jealous of giving the title of judge, high and venerable as it was, to persons of inferior authority and qualifications. There was the highest propriety in keeping the function, station, the very name of judge, as high as they could be kept, and they could be kept high only by keeping the denomination itself high and limited. He had no prejudice for a particular number—he felt no Pythagorean affection for the number of judges now in our courts—he was effected by no superstitious abhorrence of an increase of judges, if the increase should be necessary. He thought, indeed, that the time was come when an increase of the judges became necessary, both from the increase of business and to spare the time and the health of those whose mental energies were so much tasked and so highly valuable. There were learned friends of his who thought that by a different distribution of duties the object desired might be attained. He did not pretend to oppose his judgment to theirs, after he had so long ceased to practise in courts of law; but he was convinced that the greatest business would always flow to that court where the most decided superiority of talent and character was to be found; and the highest reputation for talents and character would always be found where the greatest and most important business was done. The court of King's-Bench would, therefore, always have most business from its general consideration, its high character, the distinguished part it acted, and the conspicuous place it occupied. He would, then, rather add two judges to the courts of common law than appoint inferior judges.

Mr. Scarlett perfectly concurred with his hon. and learned friend, that rather than the respectability of the administration of justice should be lowered by an inequality among the judges, the number of the superior judges ought to be increased; but he did not think the necessity existed. He had no partial attachment to the number of twelve, nor did he think there was any extraordinary virtue in that of four; but he thought that if at present an alteration of the judicature of our courts was necessary, the number of judges ought rather to be diminished than increased. He was opinion that one of the judges of the King's Bench might be detached in term time to do the inferior criminal business, while the higher duties might be performed by three. There was a great deal of minor business which came before this court, and which he thought might be disposed of as he proposed. As to the present system of Welsh judicature, it was undoubtedly very defective, It was difficult to suppose that gentlemen at the English bar, who were in any thing like eminent practice, would accept of the appointment of a Welsh judge, the total income of which did not exceed 1,100*l.* a year. It appeared also from the evidence of a Welsh judge before the committee, that a very small number of causes on each circuit were tried in Wales. It would appear that many were tried elsewhere and many compromised; and he could not think that the best system of justice from which men fled by compromise rather than trust to the justness of the decision. This system had been said to be ancient because it had been instituted by Henry the 8th; but he did not think the Welsh would be obliged to any one that said so. He knew something of the Welsh notions of antiquity; and as the reign of Henry the 8th was modern in English history, in Wales it was but of yesterday.

Colonel Wood thought, that the great increase of property which had taken place in Wales since the time of Henry the 8th, entitled them to a change in their judicature more suited to their present state. The honourable colonel said he had changed his mind on this subject; and he had done so from conviction.

The Attorney General could not agree to the plan of abolition, or of increasing the number of English judges. The present system of Welsh judicature was defective, and ought to be amended; but the hon. member for Carnarvon was about to bring in a bill to remedy those defects, and the House was not at present in a condition to come to a decision on the question. Besides, the opinions of two previous committees were in favour of amendment, and not of abolition.

Mr. C. Wilson bore testimony to the respectability and integrity of the Welsh judges; but said, that any measure which would have the effect of assimilating the jurisdictions in Wales with those of England should have his support.

Mr. Wynn said, that he should, as a general principle, have no objection to the jurisdictions in Wales being assimilated to those in England; but he did not think that such a measure could be carried into effect without considerable inconvenience. He had no objection to discuss a bill on the subject; but he could not give his assent to the whole of the resolutions before the House. He would suggest to the hon. member to withdraw his motion now, and if he should not be satisfied with the plan to be proposed by the member for Carnarvon, he might renew it at a future day.

Mr. M. A. Taylor supported the motion, but was unwilling that a question of such importance should be disposed of in so thin a House. He therefore moved as an amendment, that the debate be adjourned to that day fortnight.

The gallery was cleared for a division; when there being only 34 members present, the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMOS.
Friday, May 24.

ALEHOUSES LICENSING BILL.] Mr. Bennet presented a petition from the licensed victuallers of the metropolis complaining of the present mode of Licensing Public-houses.

Mr. Carew felt many objections to the bill which the hon. member for Shrewsbury had introduced.

Mr. Bernal observed, that the interests of those brewers who were freeholders of public-houses would be very materially injured by that clause of the bill which provided that a magistrate should grant a license to any individual who possessed the qualifications necessary to enable him to open a public-house. The clause would also hold out greater temptations to drinking.

Mr Alderman Smith expressed himself inimical to the bill.

Mr. Littleton suggested, that it was expedient to introduce a clause into the bill for encouraging the sale of beer of a diminished strength.

Colonel Trench thought, that the brewers of London had too long enjoyed the monopoly of their trade.

Mr. Marryat believed that the proposed measure would operate injuriously upon the vested interest of the brewers.

Mr. Hume could see no reason why the trade in beer should not be thrown open.

Mr. Brougham considered it a measure of the first necessity, to break down the present system of licensing public houses, although in doing so, care should be taken to injure as little as possible the vested capital of the brewers. He did not think that if the number of public houses were larger than at present, the amount of tippling would be increased. As well might it be contended, that, in a private party, the quantity of liquor that would be drank would depend upon the number of glasses placed on the table. He could see no objection to throwing open at once the retail trade in beer. At present, no persons without a license could sell any quantity under five gallons, or two dozen bottles. There might, perhaps, be some doubt as to the propriety of increasing or decreasing the number of public houses, but there could be no doubt about allowing the poor man to procure his pot of beer with the same facility that he purchased his loaf. He therefore gave notice that, in the event of any misadventure happening to his hon. friend's bill, he would bring forward a measure, making it imperative on the magistrates to grant a license to any person wishing to enter into the retail trade.

Mr. Bennet said, that, in looking to the abuses which had so long existed in the licensing system, he felt that those abuses could not be fully remedied, or the monopoly broken up, without injuring the private properties of certain individuals. Therefore, his object, when he first brought the question forward was, with a view to have it discussed, and understood both in and out of doors. If the magistrates in the country, generally, would adopt the system practised in Wiltshire, there would be little fear of a monopoly of licenses. The magistrates of those counties, whenever they found that the brewers had a monopoly in any one district, instantly granted a new license, by which means all monopoly was destroyed. He begged the attention of the House, while he stated a few instances of the extent to which the monopoly of the beer trade had been carried in some parts of the country. In Portsmouth there were 231 public houses; of these 168 were in the hands of brewers, 34 in the hands of spirit-merchants, and 29 were free houses. In King's Lynn there were 68 public houses, all in the hands of the corporation or of brewers. In Brighton there were 66 of which 55 were in the hands of the brewers. In Watford, St. Alban's, and Reading, all the public houses were in the hands of the brewers. In other counties, such as Staffordshire and Shropshire, where beer was brewed at home, there was another description of monopolists — he meant the malsters of those counties. In one district near London there were 180 public houses, all of which were in the hands of brewers except 12. In the eighteen excise districts there were 8,859 public houses in the hands of brewers, being a proportion of five to one of the whole number. Having thus pointed out the evil, he now came to the remedy. He had intended to open the beer trade farther. To that measure opposition had been made: and he did not wonder at it. Persons who knew any thing of borough towns, would know, that the brewers there were no small persons. Next to his majesty's government there was scarcely an interest more formidable than the interest of the brewers. In fact, he found that if he attempted to carry his bill through in its original shape, he should have no support but from a few of his friends. He therefore intended to strike out the clause which made it compulsory upon magistrates to grant licenses when demanded. He admitted the force of the proposition suggested by the hon. member for Winchelsea, but he feared that that measure would be as prejudicial to the publicans and brewers as the clause which he himself had but then given up. His objects at present were two-fold; first, to bring public houses under a certain discipline, and secondly to give a security to that sort of property, which it did not at present possess.

Mr. Hume thought it would be expedient to adopt the licensing system practised in Scotland, under which no monopoly existed.

Mr. F. Palmer thought, if the hon. member abandoned the clause making it compulsory on magistrates to grant a license, he might as well give up the bill altogether.

Ordered to lie on the table.

NAVAL AND MILITARY PENSIONS.] The House having resolved itself into a committee on this subject,

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that he would call to the recollection of the House, as briefly as possible, the principle of the resolutions on this subject already agreed to by the House. The resolutions to which the House had agreed [see p. 284], recognized the military and naval pensions granted during the late war, and also the civil superannuations granted by consent of parliament, as a charge on the public, and as forming part of the public debt. These pensions were granted for the services which brave and meritorious persons had rendered their country. Without attempting to carry the analogy farther, he would say, that the House having recognised the principle that these pensions formed part of the public debt, had also recognised the propriety of this principle—that where a large public debt pressed upon the country, in order to relieve the country as much as possible from the pressure of that debt, it was expedient to throw the weight of a portion of it over a certain number of years, by which means the payment would appear more easy, and less irksome. The number of years, in the case before the House, was limited to 45, because the allowances now made to naval and military officers and other persons, would, before the expiration of that period, be nearly extinguished. After the resolutions had been passed, measures were taken to carry the object of parliament into execution. The wish of government was, to leave the matter, after full and fair notice, open to the competition of all parties; and after certain proceedings had taken place—proceedings which were marked with the utmost candour on the part of those who took part in them—attempts were made by the Treasury to conclude negotiations with some of the leading capitalists in the city. In point of fact, there had been much communication on this subject with various individuals, and the particulars of those communications were in part before the public. But, as the negotiations had had no effect, it became his duty to submit another mode in which the wishes of parliament could be accomplished, always concluding that the plan would be finally sanctioned by the approbation of the House. In forming a contract of the nature which he had proposed with individuals or corporations, there was a possibility, and even a probability that there would be great loss or extreme advantage to the parties contracting, and it seemed that the fear of grievous burthen had operated to prevent contractors from making any offers. On this account it was probably more expedient that the plan which he now proposed should be adopted, which was, to place the annuities which were to be granted in lieu of the decreasing payments in the hands of trustees accountable to parliament. In this case the risk would fall where it was proper it should fall—on the public. If there was a profit, it would go to defray the public charges; and if there was a loss, it would fall upon the public, as it would have done if no such plan had been adopted. He hoped, therefore, that without any variation of the principle which had been sanctioned by the House, the plan which he proposed for the execution of it would be found just and beneficial. He should state the nature of the resolu tions which he should propose to the committee. It was his intention to propose as his first resolution:—

"That, for the purpose of apportioning, conformably to the resolutions of this House of the 3rd of May, 1822, the burthen occasioned by the Military and Naval pensions and Civil Superannuations, it is expedient, that an equal annuity of 2,800,000*l.* terminable at the end of 45 years, should, from the 5th of April, 1822, be vested in trustees to be named by parliament; and that the said Annuity should be charged upon the Consolidated fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland."

This resolution, it would be observed, was the same as the one first proposed; but as the whole of the loss or gain would fall on the public, the object in view would be effected in the most economical manner, as it depended on no calculation of chances, and thus avoided the necessity of giving any pecuniary inducement to the parties who undertook the risk. The sum of 2,800,000*l.* had been assumed as the amount of the annuities; though it was lower than that which would have been necessary, if the contract had been entered into with any contractors. This sum would make the calculation just, if the interest of money was taken at 3½ per cent which would give the 3 per cents at 82. His noble friend, when he had first opened the plan to the House, had very properly, in the course of his illustrations, taken a sum which could give no clue to the parties intending to contract. But now that the plan was not to be managed by contract, it was immaterial what sum was taken, except as the purpose of making the produce of the annuities sold meet as nearly as possible the actual charge. He had stated that the sum of 2,800,000*l.* annuities, for 45 years, was taken on the calculation of 3½ per cent for the interest of money, or of the 3 per cents at 82. Taking the 3 per cents at 75, which was equal to 4 per cent interest on money, the amount of annuities necessary would have been 2,862,000*l.* At 4¼ per cent the sum necessary would be 2,902,000*l.*; and as 4¼ per cent was the rate of interest on which the 5 per cents had been reduced, that would have been about the rate at which the money could probably be obtained from any contractors. He had, therefore, taken about 100,000*l.* of annuities less than any contractors could have taken. This was a circumstance which it was material to bear in mind when they came to speak of the reduction of taxes; for though he assumed this as the amount of annuity sufficient, it was necessary that they should bear in mind that it was the very smallest sum which could be adequate to meet the charge.

The remainder of the plan was very simple. Though the time was not yet come for the nomination of the trustees, it would be well that he should mention the sort of persons whom it was his intention to propose in that character. The trustees he should propose would be the great officers of the departments in which the payments would be made—the first lord of the Treasury, the chancellor of the exchequer, the treasurer of the navy, the paymaster of the forces, the master-general of the Ordnance, to whom would be added, the governor and deputy governor of the Bank, as the payments would be made through the Bank, and as it would be convenient to keep up a confidential and free communication with that corporation. The next resolution was, that the trustees should be chargeable with the quarterly payments of the annual sums, which had been calculated as sufficient to meet the decreasing charge of the pensions and half pay. The third resolution stated the mode in which the sums necessary to make these payments should be realised, viz. by the successive sales of the annuities placed at their disposal, by the dividends on the unsold annuities, or by the power which would be reserved to the trustees of issuing Exchequer bills, when it was thought that the annuities could not be brought to sale to advantage; and, finally, a power would be given to the departments to apply other sums which might be at their disposal, to be afterwards replaced by the trustees from the produce of the annuities or of the Exchequer bills before mentioned. By thus investing the trustees with the power, at their discretion, of raising the money in more ways than one, a considerable economy might be the result. He should take, for instance, the operation in the first year. The first half year's dividend on the long annuities created would be payable on the 20th October next, and the first quarterly instalment would at the same time be to be paid by the trustees. The dividend which they would have to receive on the annuities would be 1,400,000*l.* and the payment which they would have to make would be only 1,225,000*l*. (1-4th of 4,900,000*l*.) therefore without selling any annuities their first payment would be provided for, and a surplus of 175,000*l*. would remain in their hands till the ensuing 15th of January. At that time, by the sale of annuities, or by the issue of Exchequer bills, it would be necessary for them to make up the sum of 1,225,000*l*. The annuities being for 45 years, were for seven years more than the existing long annuities, and would therefore, at the rate at which the existing long annuities sold, be worth something more than 21 years purchase. On the 15th of April 1823, another half-yearly dividend would be payable on the annuities, and the trustees would be then able to make their quarterly payment without any further sale. On the 15th of July they would again have to raise money by the issue of Exchequer bills, or by the sale of a further portion of annuities, and so on; in the October and April quarters the payment would be provided for from the dividends, and in the January and July quarters, the trustees would have to sell annuities or issue Exchequer bills. It was easy for the House to understand, that if the Bank was disposed to take Exchequer bills, or if a ready sale was found for them in the market, the inconvenience of any untimely sale of the annuities might be avoided. It was to be observed, that the sums to be paid by the trustees rapidly decreased; for in the first five years it was reduced from 4,900,000*l*. to 4,100,000*l*, after which a comparatively small sum would remain to be raised in any mode. The dividends received on the annuities would at last exceed the payments made by the trustees, and they would then be applied to the paying off of the Exchequer bills advanced in the earlier years, or to the repayment with compound interest, of the sums advanced from other quarters.

Among the various points of view in which this transaction might be considered, the most important perhaps was that of its operation on the sinking fund; in the first place, because it was intimately connected with the sinking fund, because it was a discharge of one species of public debt by the creation of another; and because they were bound by the resolutions of this as well as of former parliaments to support an efficient sinking fund of five millions. Now, in the first place, he should say that no sum whatever was taken out of the hands of the commissioners for the reduction of the debt. The sums which would pass into the hands of the commissioners would be precisely the same; and the debt which was now created provided for its own extinction without any additional operation of the sinking fund. This plan, it was to be observed, only provided for the half-pay and pensions with which the country would be charged on the 15th July next. The half-pay and pensions which might hereafter be granted were not provided for; so that, if in remitting the taxes they did not provide for this charge, the country would be left in a worse situation than it was. It was, therefore, proposed, though the sum of 2,200,000*l*. would be the present saving, that a sum should be reserved to meet the charge of future half-pay. Various calculations had been made as to the probable amount of this charge; but as it was dependent on innumerable contingencies which could not be foreseen, as, for instance, the reduction of forces, promotions, and retirements, it was impossible to estimate it exactly. It was thought, however, that a reserve of 400,000*l*. would be sufficient to meet this charge, till the sinking fund reached that point at which its accumulation should stop: that point was the time when its annual amount became equal to one per cent on the capital of the debt. Something more than ten years and less than eleven would bring it to that maximum. This 400,000*l*., till it was necessary to meet the growing charges of future pensions and half-pay, would be applied, in some way or other, to the reduction of the funded or unfunded debt. To keep in view the principles on which parliament had hitherto acted, he thought it most desirable to place the sum at the disposal of the commissioners of the sinking fund; so that for the next and subsequent years nearly 5,400,000*l*. per annum would be at their disposal. In the statement of the annual payments, the average sum payable in each year had been taken. Thus, as the half-pay and pensions were taken in July next to amount to five millions, and at the end of the year July 15, 1823, at 4,800,000*l*., he had taken 4,900,000*l*. as a medium charge. Between the five millions now payable, and the annuity of 2,800,000*l*., there was a difference of 2,200,000*l*. of which 1,800,000*l*. would be applied to the remission of taxes, 400,000*l*. reserved to meet the charge which would be growing up and remaining without other provision.

It might be thought premature in him, before the plan was sanctioned by the House, to state what taxes it was intended to remit; but as it was desirable to bring the whole of the plan at one view under the consideration of the House, and as he knew how much the feelings of hon. members were interested in this part of the subject, he should now state what he intended to propose in the way of remission of taxes. On the best consideration he could give the subject, with a view of affording that substantial and effectual relief (without which the feelings of the people would be rather trifled with than gratified), he had come to the conclusion as to the taxes which it would be adviseable to reduce. There was hardly a difference of opinion either in the petitions to the House, or among the members themselves, or among those whose judgments were most worthy of regard, that among all the taxes there was none which it was more desirable to reduce, to a very considerable degree, than the salt tax [hear, hear!]. His objection, at an early period of the session, to the motion of the hon. member for Wareham, besides the general objection at that time to the remission of any taxes, was, that it would throw the trade into confusion by a partial remission. The remission he had now to propose was to a much greater extent. Of 15*s.* per bushel, the present tax on salt, he should propose that 13*s.* be given up, leaving a duty of 2*s.* equal to the present Irish duty, which would give the convenience of an equal duty in both parts of the United Kingdom. In this operation, consideration was to be had to the persons engaged in the trade; and it was obvious, that unless the measure was taken with due preparation, it would be ruinous to them. Though, therefore, he intended to propose an immediate resolution for the reduction of the tax, he did not propose that it should take effect till the 5th of January next. There might be some inconvenience to the dealers, and there would be a postponement of the advantage to the public; but, considering the nature of the commodity, the consumption of which was generally from hand to mouth, it was thought that by aid of reasonable arrangements with the excise, any considerable inconvenience might be avoided, and the public would have the satisfaction of the near prospect of a very considerable relief. The Scotch duty which was 6*s.* he also intended to reduce to 2*s.* He was aware that there were some local interests that would be affected by this measure; but the benefit of a free trade in salt, was too great to be impeded by any minor consideration. In order to make the fullest freedom of the salt trade practicable, all allowances and drawbacks on salt for particular purposes would cease, with the single exception of the drawback on exportation to foreign parts; because in the case of exportation the duty of 2*s.* per bushel would be ruinous. Irish salt would not be subject to any other duty than at present, but salt imported from England would be subjected to the duty of 2*s.* The duty in all cases would be levied at the pit's mouth; so that all the charges of management would be saved, and the trade would be left entirely free and unfettered. Though certainly the discontinuance of the allowance of salt duty free to several manufactures might be attended with some inconvenience, yet the great countervailing advantage from the cessation of all penalties and restrictions, would be more than equal to the charge of 2*s.* per bushel. The same statement might apply to the fisheries: though there would be an increase of charge, it would be counterbalanced by the unrestricted supply. The foreign salt imported for the fisheries would be chargeable with the 2*s.* duty, and the additional 3*d.* per bushel which it was now charged with. It would thus be charged in all with 2*s.* 3*d.* per bushel. As he proposed to reduce the fifteenth of the tax, which now amounted to 1,500,000*l.* the reduction would be about 1,300,000*l.* As to the foreign salt imported into Ireland, he should not propose any alteration, at least he did not now entertain a contrary opinion.—The next tax which he should propose to remit was one which it was the more imperative on the House to attend to, as the people of Ireland would derive no benefit from the repeal of the salt tax. On the contrary, it was rather a disadvantage, as it deprived them of a comparative superiority, though that generous-minded people would never object to the relief of their fellow subjects. With the repeal of the salt tax, however, he felt it his duty to propose a contemporaneous measure for the relief of Ireland, and the House would anticipate him in saying, that nothing could be more grateful than the repeal of the window tax [hear, hear!]. This repeal he proposed should be entire, to take effect from the 5th of July next. This tax amounted to 200,000*l*., and with it he proposed also to repeal the Hearth Duty, a tax not paid in England, and which indeed had been repealed here in the reign of king William, as unfit to be levied; it amounted only to 50,000*l*. Both taxes hardly amounted to 250,000*l*., which, added to the 1,300,000*l*., made 1,550,000*l*. The next article was one to which also the House had frequently had its attention called; he meant the duty on leather. Without due precaution the public would not derive all the benefit of the repeal of this tax. His intention was that the additional duty which had been imposed in 1812, should be remitted, and that the tax and the trade should be replaced on the footing on which it stood from the reign of queen Anne to 1812. The House, however, should proceed in the same manner in this case as with the brewers, and should not repeal the tax till they had an experimental assurance, that the public would derive a benefit from it. He felt the greater necessity for this precaution, because he had observed that since the peace, the reduction of price had not borne a fair proportion to the reduction of the raw material. If they took care to secure this effect there was no tax from the reduction of which the public would derive more advantage; for the commodity on which it fell formed a very serious article of expenditure both to farmers and to the working people. The whole of the leather tax produced 600,000*l*.; he proposed to reduce half or 300,000*l*. There was another reduction which he meant to propose, and which though not of a large amount, would be felt to be highly desirable. It had been frequently urged, in the course of the discussions on the navigation bills which had been brought forward by his two right hon. friends with so much benefit to the country, that notwithstanding the general advantages which would arise to the commerce of this empire and of the whole world, from the adoption of a different principle—advantages which he hoped to see still further extended from year to year —there was one most important interest which was likely to be effected by these measures; he alluded to the shipping interest. A reduction, therefore, which was calculated to relieve any difficulties and embarrassments which might fall upon this class of the community from the operation of a general measure, which parliament, in its wisdom, thought fit to adopt, would at least shew the protecting care of parliament for that particular interest. The duty he proposed to repeal was, the tonnage duty, which had been granted during the war and continued during peace. The tonnage duty on all ships clearing inwards and outwards amounted to 150,000*l*. which in addition to the 1,850,000*l*. already enumerated, made a total of 2,000,000*l*. There was an excess, therefore, of 200,000*l*. beyond the proposed amount of reduction; but he expected that the large reduction of the salt tax would occasion so great an increase of consumption as to cover a considerable portion of this excess. There were some other items which he confidently expected would make up the remainder, so that there would be no ultimate loss to the revenue, beyond the proposed sum of 1,800,000*l*. He hoped that, without going into minute particulars of calculation, he had succeeded in making himself distinctly intelligible to the House. With regard to the plan for vesting the annuity in trustees to be named by parliament, it was certainly expedient, as soon as it was ascertained that the original intention of government could not be conveniently carried into effect, to endeavour to obtain the same benefit by some other arrangement, to which no objection could be made. He felt confident that the House would think the measures proposed were in themselves capable of producing all the benefit which they had in view, and that there was no other objection to them than that which was inseparable from any plans of this nature. —The right hon. gentleman concluded by moving his first resolution;

"That, for the purpose of apportioning, conformably to the resolutions of this House of the third of May, 1822, the burthen occasioned by the Military and Naval pensions, and Civil Superannuations, it is expedient that an equal annual Annuity of 2,800,000*l*. terminable at the end of 45 years, should, from the fifth of April, 1822, be vested in trustees to be named by parliament; and that the said Annuity should be charged upon the Consolidated Fund of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland."

Mr. Calcraft congratulated the House upon the propositions which they had just heard. He confessed that he must have totally misunderstood the right hon. gentleman in the beginning of the session when he fancied he heard him say, that a repeal of taxation would not only be no remedy for the distress under which the country laboured, but that it would actually aggravate the evil. It was scarcely possible that such a declaration could ever have been made by the right hon. gentleman, who had this night risen in his place to move a reduction of taxes to the extent of two millions. But whether he were mistaken or not, what had passed that evening was an encouragement to the House to persevere in their opposition to ministers, and to continue that course which their duty to the country demanded. The right hon. gentleman had gone further in his reduction of the salt tax, than he (Mr. C.) had ventured to propose under the circumstances of the present session. This was a measure which was calculated to give universal satisfaction. If it affected the interests of Ireland, he must beg that country to turn her eyes to the advantages she derived from the monopoly she possessed of our corn market. With regard to the duty on foreign salt, which was only used in one particular part of the fisheries, he really thought the right hon. gentleman ought to increase it. As to the other part of the plan, he confessed himself unable to understand the mode of carrying it into execution. When the noble lord first opened his proposition to the House, there was not a person who heard him who could have supposed that a minister would have gone so far without having the means of executing his plan. All this embarrassment would have been avoided by adopting the plan proposed on his (Mr. C's.) side of the House, namely, that of taking the money at once from the sinking fund. The whole thing might be done at one stroke of the pen, by striking out the word "consolidated," in the first resolution, and substituting "sinking" fund. This would be a straight forward, clear, intelligible course. How could the right hon. gentleman, he would ask, go into the market to borrow money every year, without divesting the capital which would otherwise go into the funds? His majesty's ministers had talked so much, however, of their darling sinking fund, that they had become enamoured of their idol, or if not enamoured, they had said so much in its praise that they were unwilling to recede. After all, if he understood the right hon. gentleman, he had himself declared his intention of coming in a few years to the sinking fund, for when it reached a certain amount, it was to bear a proportion of this debt. As far as he (Mr. C.) was concerned, he should not press for any further remission in the present session. If he found the reduced tax worked well, he should be satisfied, but if the duty of 2*s*. a bushel appeared to press hard upon the fisheries, he trusted the House would be ready to afford them relief.

The Marquis of Londonderry said, that after the manner in which the hon. member had expressed himself, it would be unpardonable in him to make a single observation which might interrupt the harmony of the evening. He had not for a long time, passed so satisfactory a moment; nor did he ever remember to have seen the countenances of the gentlemen opposite so creditably lighted up. The hon. gentleman had done such ample justice to the plan of his right hon. friend, and he had spoken of it in such a spirit of candour, and even of kindness, that he (lord L.) should be doing violence to his own feelings if he suffered himself to let fall any expression which might throw a cloud over this happy dawn. There was one maxim of the hon. gentleman, however, from which inconvenient consequences might be drawn, if it were suffered to pass wholly unnoticed. As the hon. gentleman had called upon the House to observe what advantages were derivable from opposing ministers, he (lord L.) would remind the hon. gentleman of the advantages of supporting ministers, whose great object was, to preserve public credit. He agreed with the hon. member, that if the fisheries should be embarrassed or injured by this duty, it would be incumbent on the House to consider the particular bearing of the tax upon their interests. The hon. member had said, that the government had now for the first time discovered that relief for the country was to be derived from the remission of taxes; but surely ministers had contended, as loudly as the hon. member himself, that the House could not be too eager to repeal taxes, provided they did it upon a sound principle. He would not, however, be a party to so gross a delusion as to hold out, that even this large reduction of two millions, in addition to the reduction of a million and a half in the malt duty, which followed close on the repeal of the agricultural horse tax, would be likely to bear upon the main pressure of the distress which prevailed. The relief was, in fact, afforded to consumers, who were not the class of the community suffering under the greatest degree of distress. The hon. member had said, that if the words "Sinking-fund" were substituted for "Consolidated-fund," all difficulties would be at once removed, and their harmony would be at its climax. When he proposed the principle of a contract, he had good reason to believe, that there were persons disposed to become contractors for the plan. It was not wonderful, however, that persons, looking to the probable contingencies which might arise during so extended a period as 45 years, should entertain doubts, whether, with a view to the interests of the parties for whom they were trustees, it would be prudent to embark in such a transaction. The plan was in consequence changed, and now the public were themselves the contractors. There was, however, no interference with the principle of the sinking fund. Nothing could stand more distinct from the operation of this plan than the sinking-fund did. The fund of five millions for covering the dead charge was not to be confounded with the sinking-fund; for if those two funds were married together, they would make 10 millions. He would not add another word, lest it should disturb the harmony of the evening.

Sir J. Newport rejoiced at the repeal of the window tax, and was also happy that the hearth tax was given up, not on account of its magnitude, but because it was extremely disagreeable to the feelings of the people, who viewed it as a badge of slavery. The financial plan appeared to him more desirable in its present shape, than if it had been effected by means of a body of contractors.

Sir R. Shaw expressed the great pleasure he felt at the repeal of the Irish window tax.

General Gascoyne adverted to the present state of the shipping interest, and said, he experienced great pleasure at finding that it had not been neglected. The right hon. gentleman deserved the gratitude of the country, for the equal manner in which he had distributed relief to different classes and descriptions of individuals.

Mr. Hume said, that no member of that House could be more pleased with the remission of two millions of taxation than he was: but he felt much surprised at the tone assumed by hon. members, who returned their thanks to ministers for what they had proposed, in so extravagant a style, that it might be supposed some personal favour had been done by them. He considered it to be the duty of ministers, if the necessity of the country required the repeal of taxes, to remove them immediately. He could not but regret that so much praise had been bestowed for the mere discharge of their duty, a duty, be it remembered, the House and the country had called on ministers to perform, day after day, and week after week. No part of the community, not even the agricultural classes, required greater relief than the shipping interest. He was, therefore, extremely pleased at the remission of the tonnage duty; and he hoped, at a future period, that something further for their benefit, which he had turned in his mind, such as the remission of 1*s.* in the pound on wages for Greenwich Hospital, which was now taken from the merchants service, would be conceded to them. As to the leather tax, he believed its partial repeal would meet the wishes of the public, but he had looked for the entire tax being repealed; and with respect to the repeal of the Irish window tax, every one who knew any thing about that country and the hardships it had suffered, must concur in the propriety of its repeal. He did not, however, approve of the manner in which the salt tax was reduced. When it was remitted, that object should be effected in the most advantageous way. Why, then, for so small a part of the tax as 2*s.* of the 15*s.* should they retain the expense of the whole system of collection and management? He held in his hand a return, from which it appeared that there were 255 officers employed in managing the salt duties in England; their salaries amounted to 26,500*l.*: adding other emoluments, the total expense was 32,000*l.*, and if the charge of 5,000*l.* was added for the officers who superintended these duties in Scotland the amount would exceed, in salaries and allowances, 36,000*l.* per annum. If one-half of the present establishment of officers were kept up, the consequence would be, that the public would pay near 20,000*l.* a year for collecting 200,000*l.* It would, therefore, be better to take off the whole tax and relieve the country from the interference of the excise in the use of that most important necessary of life. As to the fisheries, instead of laying a duty on salt, the right hon. gentleman might, perhaps, find a mode of lessening the public expense, by reducing the amount of bounties. Why should they charge—say, 2*s*. of duty on salt to the fishery, and afterwards give 4*s*. back in the shape of bounty? Why was not the whole system simplified, and the bounty reduced from 3*s*. 6*d*. to 1*s*. 6*d*. or 2*s*., which would enable the right hon. gentleman to exempt the fisheries from the additional duty? He here expressed his anxious hope, that the government would take the system of bounties into its consideration, with the view of abolishing them. He doubted much the policy of keeping up any trade by bounties which after a fair trial could not exist without them. The effect was, to supply herrings &c. cheap to other countries, by taxing the people of England to pay a part of the expense of production—this ought not to be continued. The hon. gentleman then alluded to the financial plan of the chancellor of the exchequer, to raise money by long annuities, and contended, that it would be the simplest and best mode to take the money at once from the sinking-fund. What was it the chancellor of the exchequer proposed to do, but sending one set of commissioners into the market to sell annuities and incur new debts, whilst they employed other commissioners to purchase annuities and to pay off part of the same debt? Although he was certain, that without the walls of the House there would be none weak enough to deny that this was not in effect an interference with the sinking-fund. Though it was affirmed within the walls of that House that this measure did not interfere with the sinking-fund. If it was improper to adhere to the resolution for 5,000,000*l*. of a sinking-fund, why not revise it? If the wants of the country required relaxation from taxation, why not break through the resolution for the purpose of adopting a course which would be in all respects more economical? and on one consistent principle—instead of employing new commissioners, the commissioners of the sinking-fund ought to be required to advance the necessary sum, and to re[illegible] hereafter the profits of the contrac[illegible] the benefit of the sinking-fund. [illegible]this there would be no expense of management, and no risk; and the proceeding would be intelligible to the world, and the delusion of not interfering with the sinking-fund, when it was manifest to every one that they were interfering, got rid of at the same moment. If the right hon. gentleman was delighted with complexity, if he must have his darling operation of selling and buying, let him adopt this plan; by which the sinking-fund would gain what the public treasury would lose. He would add that if the public money was to be economically applied, this plan of the chancellor of the exchequer must be abandoned, and he trusted that the committee would see the propriety of adopting his amendment, and so dispensing with the cumbrous machinery of the other plan. Gentlemen were naturally delighted with a remission of taxes, but in their delight they ought not to squander the public money. He begged leave to move as an amendment on the first resolution, "That the balance between 2,800,000*l*. and the several sums set forth in the scale for the first 15 years should be taken from the commissioners of the national debt, and that the balance be paid again to the commissioners on the 16th and subsequent years."

Mr. Curwen could not refrain from expressing his satisfaction at the selection of taxes to be remitted. The effects of the remission of the salt tax would be greater than were calculated upon. He was, however, anxious that the whole duty on rock salt should be remitted; for then agriculture would be greatly relieved, and trade inconceivably increased. What was proposed to be done would, he was persuaded, give general satisfaction to the country.

Mr. Davenport congratulated the House on the great remission of taxes which had been announced. He begged to suggest, as the salt duty was to terminate in January next, that much relief would be afforded to the dairy farmers, who consumed great quantities in cheese and butter, if it were taken off in the present year.

Mr. W. Smith regretted that the whole tax on salt was not remitted, in order to save the expence of collection, and wished the whole of the leather tax was repealed also. With respect to the amendment, he was surprised that the point should not be given up by ministers; for nothing could be more clear to any rational mind than that there could be no sinking fund but what arose from the surplus of revenue above the expenditure. The best course, therefore, was, to take from the sinking fund without disguise, and in a manner that would prevent any increase of establishments.

Mr. J. Benett said, he would rather see the whole of the salt tax taken away, and the leather tax left as it was, than both reduced, but still retaining the expense of collection. He rejoiced in the reductions that were made, but hoped they would not have a tendency to relax the endeavours of members to push the principle of economy still further.

Mr. Bright observed, that the fisheries would not feel the benefit of the repeal, if it was merely partial, and would therefore be dissatisfied. Another class of persons who had great interest in the removal of the whole tax, were the linen bleachers of Ireland; and he would submit whether it would not be right to remove the pressure from the staple manufacture of the sister kingdom. He rejoiced that the tonnage duty was also removed, as it would be of great advantage to the commercial interests.

Mr. Hutchinson could not withhold the expression of his satisfaction and congratulation for measures so well calculated to give relief. He was most grateful for the remission of the Irish window tax, and also for the relief which in the leather tax would follow. With respect to the salt tax, he wished the whole had been reduced; but he trusted that the operation of the arrangement on the subject of foreign salt would not affect injuriously the provision trade of Ireland.

Mr. Ricardo said, he was most ready to commend the conduct of ministers where he found it prudent and proper; and in the proposed remission of taxes he thought they had acted judiciously in listening to the general prayer of the people. But, when he offered this commendation, he must decline concurring in any terms of excessive gratitude. He confessed, that he owed no gratitude to ministers for giving the people what was, in fact, their own money. If, indeed, the ministers had framed any plan for giving the people any portion of money which did not really belong to them, then would be the time to offer them fervent gratitude. But he thought that ministers, in coming down with all that earnestness to announce the remission of taxes, had not dealt quite fairly with the House. It looked as if they wished to induce the House to assent to those parts of their proposition which were bad, under the cover of those parts which were good. Now, he thought it was the duty of that House to separate the bad from the good, and by its vote to get rid of the former altogether. Under that view, he should support the amendment. He regretted much that any portion of the salt tax was continued, he did not wish that any nucleus should remain, because they well knew with what vigour, under the management of the exchequer, it would spread. [Hear, hear.] As to the present plan for meeting the dead expenditure, it was nothing more or less than an annual loan, in the contracting for which either a profit or a loss, as in all other loans, must follow. To the public, then, at last they must go for that loan; and as there was no ascertained stock in which it was to be funded, it would be of course less marketable, and consequently a greater profit must be held out to the contractor. Why then not keep that advantage to the country? There was another fallacy: for as the period of 45 years approached to a termination, what was to prevent the chancellor of the exchequer of the day, from converting these annuities into a perpetuity? He did expect the vote of the hon. member for London. That hon. member had qualified his support to the former plan, by hoping that the chancellor of the exchequer would take advantage of the present high price of the funds, in making his bargain for the public. Now, by the proposed scheme, the sale of the annuities was to be annual, and of course the purchases. Being thus made from year to year, such sales and purchases must be subjected to the contingency of war, and the depreciation of the price of stocks. Besides, if the market failed the right hon. gentleman, he must issue Exchequer bills, and add to the unfunded debt. If war subsequently occurred, he would then have to fund at a greater expense.

Mr. Wilson said, he considered the present proposition as nothing more or less than a loan; indeed it was worse than a loan, as it trenched upon the sinking fund. It went to borrow from year to year, instead of being fixed on a long annuity. He was, however, quite gratified at the remission of taxes, particularly that portion of it, which so peculiarly affected the shipping interest.

Mr. Maberly disapproved of the financial part of the scheme, which was, in point of fact, creating a loan for the purpose of reducing taxation. This was not a legitimate mode of effecting such an object, whilst there remained another, an easier, and a cheaper way, by reviewing the estimates, in which he was persuaded a saving of 2,000,000*l.* might be effected, without touching the sinking fund. In March last the right hon. gentleman said that the sinking fund must be kept up at 5,000,000*l.*, and that therefore no taxes could be remitted. Now, his views were entirely reversed. It was idle to talk of a sinking fund in this manner. Indeed, from 1792 downwards, the public credit had been sustained without one. All the machinery of their finance was complicated; and even when the right hon. gentleman paid the debt to the Bank, he raised the amount by a loan on Exchequer bills. This was, in fact, a system of frauds and tricks; and the House, instead of guarding the public purse against such operations, had been the aider and abettor of the plunder. Mark the right hon. gentleman's course in the present year. As soon as he had accomplished his financial operations for the reduction of the five per cents, during which he had said not a word of reducing taxation, not a word of touching the sinking fund, he turned round and robbed the public creditor of the operation of this sinking fund, to which he had just before pledged his faith. Even in his plan of remitting taxes, he took a clumsy and an expensive course. Instead of reducing altogether an impolitic and injurious tax, he touched it partially, and thereby still retained the expensive machinery for its collection. He cordially approved of the amendment.

Mr. Huskisson denied that the plan was any infringement upon the principle of the sinking fund: on the contrary, it was one which must keep up the public credit, and be of peculiar service in the present situation of the country. He joined, therefore, in the general congratulations of the House, and was surprised to hear the epithet of "frauds and tricks" applied to any part of the arrangement. If any man had an annuitant for life attached to his estate, what fraud would there be in offering him a proportionate equivalent for a term of years? His right hon. friend had assumed, and he was correct in that assumption, that supposing the present amount of annuities to be in existence for a certain specific time, and supposing the country would have to maintain the ordinary charges for the navy, army, and other expenditure, and even contemplating a few years of ordinary war, still the amount of debt charged would not exceed 2,000,000*l.* He was very ready to admit that there would not be a clear surplus in the present year; but they must bear in mind, that they were dealing with a fund which was daily decreasing in amount, and by which the public must be gainers for the next 16 years. As to the expense of working this plan, he hoped that it would be carried into effect without any expense at all.

Mr. H. Gurney said, he could by no means participate in the cheers and congratulations which he heard all around him; and he was afraid the House, if he might be allowed the expression, would find itself in a fool's paradise. In fact, the propositions of the chancellor of the exchequer were, in his mind, the most alarming symptoms of the times—the adoption of a system marking, and fraught with ruin; an increase of debt, accompanied by a decrease of revenue—the precise proceeding which had been the index and forerunner of the bankruptcy of all nations. As to the total remission of the window tax to Ireland, he could by no means comprehend why the large house of a great proprietor in that country should be exempted from a burthen, which was borne by what was almost a cottage in England and Scotland; though there might be a very valid reason for their exempting rather a better species of house than was exempt here.

Lord John Russell observed, that as it was on all sides admitted, that there could be no sinking fund unless there was a surplus of revenue over the expenditure; and as they were now, after having resolved that there should be a sinking fund of five millions, about to remit two millions of taxes, it was incontrovertible in arithmetic, that the sinking fund could not exceed three millions. The present plan was to be in operation for fifteen years—that was, the taxes were to be lightened, but the remission was to be met by continual loans for fifteen years. During that time the sinking fund would not be in operation. If the country should be involved in war, the loans we should be obliged to make must, according to their equal or greater amount, altogether destroy the sinking fund. It was manifest that the sinking fund proposed in the early part of the session, was for the purpose of facilitating a recent financial operation; for the moment it was effected, the very minister who proposed the former resolution, proposed a plan to break down that resolution. This was a mode of supporting public credit very different from what could be acted on in private life. With respect to the statement of the chancellor of the exchequer, he was much amused with the manner in which he produced arguments to show the inutility and expense of the plan which he had proposed a few weeks ago. He now attempted to prove how his present plan had a singular advantage over his former one; but it was evident that the chief ground of resorting to it was, to avoid the shame and humiliation of going directly to the sinking fund. What could be a greater incongruity, than that government should have commissioners to dispose of long annuities, and commissioners to sell long annuities. This reminded him of a comic poet, who had brought upon the scene an avaricious father lending money to a prodigal son. But what would have been said of that comic poet had he introduced the prodigal in the scene lending money to himself. Yet this was the case with the present government, for the chancellor of the exchequer and the noble lord were trustees of the pension plan, and commissioners of the sinking fund. He participated in the satisfaction felt by the House on account of the promised reduction of taxation, and could not but wish that the machinery of the sinking fund was done away with.

Mr. Alderman Heygate did not object to the selection of the taxes to be repealed, but thought a reduction or repeal of the window tax in England would have been most desirable. With regard to the annuity scheme, it was objectionable, because it enabled government to take off taxes without a correspondent reduction of expenditure, and removed the burthen from our own shoulders to those of posterity, who were already loaded by our improvident wars with a debt of nearly 800,000,000*l*. Besides this, it seemed to be an indirect attack upon the sinking fund, which the house and the government had so recently pledged themselves to maintain untouched, and in consequence of which resolution the nation had just effected a saving of 1,500,000*l*.—the greatest financial measure upon record. Approving neither of the annuity scheme, nor of the amendment, he felt himself bound to vote against both.

Mr. W. Williams denied, that the sinking fund had been maintained inviolate, and contended that it was now too late to talk of keeping parliament to its pledges. The chancellor of the exchequer had departed from his pledges and destroyed the sinking fund, by reducing it from what it ought to have been, between 20 and 30 millions, to the paltry sum of five millions. He was glad to see a reduction of taxes, but it ill became that House to talk of gratitude to the ministers for that reduction when the distresses of the country demanded it. The sinking fund might be taken away altogether for a few years, with the greatest advantage to the country. Its increased prosperity, growing out of the reduction of the taxes, would then enable us to establish another sinking fund without distressing the people.

Mr. Cripps supported the proposition of ministers, and congratulated the country on the reduction of taxation.

Captain Maberly said, he had no objection to either of the plans then before the House, but was of opinion that the plan proposed by the hon. member for Montrose was the most effectual and economical.

Mr. J. Martin preferred the amendment, on account of its greater clearness and simplicity. It was a palpable juggle to talk of having a sinking fund at a time that we were borrowing money to defray the expenses of our ordinary establishments.

The committee divided: For the amendment 35. Against it 115.

ILL-TREATMENT OF CATTLE BILL.] Mr. R. Martin moved, that the bill be now read a second time. Upon which, the attorney-general moved, "That it be read a second time this day six months."

Mr. R. Martin expressed his surprise that the attorney-general had not assigned any reasons for opposing the bill. The learned gentleman ought to have done so, if not in courtesy to the member who brought the measure forward, at least on account of its having received the approbation of a large portion of the inhabitants of the country. The learned gentleman had placed himself in opposition to the common sense of the whole nation. The magistracy of London and Middlesex had spoken in an articulate manner in favour of the measure. It had received the support of clergymen who did honour to their calling. There was not a pulpit in London that had not spoken in a pronounced manner in approbation of it. It had been asserted by the advocates of cruelty, that the bill did not define in what cruelty to animals consisted. But, could any one define what was called excessive correction of an apprentice? He would not object to a horse being beaten; but he would protect the animal from being inhumanly treated. The utmost penalty which his bill provided for the most flagrant case of inhumanity towards an animal, was three month's imprisonment, or the payment of a fine of 5*l.* Was this unreasonable?

The Attorney General observed, that he had had an opportunity, in the course of the last session, of explaining the reasons for his objecting to a measure of this description.

The House divided, for the second reading: Ayes 29. Noes 18.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, May 30.

Welch Judicature Bill.] Mr. Jones moved for leave to bring in a bill "to enlarge and extend the powers of the judges of the several courts of great sessions in Wales, and to amend the laws relating to the same."

Mr. Barham complained of the course taken by the hon. gentleman, on a former night, in moving that the House be counted, and by that means smothering the measure of his hon. friend, (Mr. Allen). If his hon. friend's measure had been suffered to go to a committee, the House would then have had the two plans before them. He could not help thinking that his hon. friend had been ill used.

Mr. Peel maintained, that nothing could be further from the intention of hon. gentlemen on his side of the House, than to show any want of courtesy to the hon. member for Pembroke. The hon. member for Durham had moved the adjournment of the debate for a fortnight on the night alluded to. The motion for counting the House, therefore, had produced no other result than would have been produced, had the motion for an adjournment been persisted in.

Mr. Denman said, the question on which a difference had arisen, was not as to adjourning the debate to any particular day, but to the appointment of a committee to which the resolutions of his hon. friend and the whole subject might be referred. The present bill supplied a remedy to trivial evils, but did not meet any of the great objections against the present system of Welch judicature. He thought it would be better that the subject should go off altogether till next session, than that such a measure should be adopted.

Leave was given to bring in the bill.

Friday, May 31.

Bank Charter.] Mr. Grenfell rose to present a petition from several highly respectable individuals in the county of Berks, relative to a negotiation said to be pending between government and the Bank of England, for the renewal of the Bank charter. To the extension of that monopoly, which would expire in 1833, he had the strongest objection; and the petitioners were of the same way of thinking; but they objected more strongly to the relaxing of the restrictive law as to the number of partners engaged in country banks—to the relaxing of that law in places more than 65 miles from London, and continuing it in places within that limit. Now, whenever the measure for renewing the charter came before the House, he should feel it his duty to oppose it. Indeed, after the experience which the country had had of the conduct of the Bank during the last 20 years—after their immense profits, amounting in 25 years (after the payment of 7 per cent dividend) to more than 25,000,000*l.* —after their tyrannous conduct towards government and towards the public, exemplified by their letters to committees of the House of Commons in 1819—after these warnings, it was amazing that any ministers could be so unwise, upon any terms, as to propose a renewal of the Bank charter. He had heard, out of doors, that the negotiation was at an end. If it were not so, he should certainly oppose it in every stage.

Mr. Manning defended the conduct of the Bank, and treated the charge of tyranny as invidious and unfounded. He also denied that the profits of the Bank were unreasonable, referring to the very large additions the Royal Exchange Insurance Company had made to their capital in consequence of their great profits during the war.

Mr. Dundas supported the prayer of the petition, and remarked upon the loss which had been sustained by the failure of country banks in Berkshire.

The Marquis of Londonderry said, the natural moment was not arrived for the discussion of the question, which was too large to be settled on the mere reception of a petition, to which there was no sort of objection.

Mr. Ricardo did not complain of the Bank directors for making the concern as profitable as possible; but he complained of ministers for having made such improvident bargains with the Bank, as to enable that establishment to make those enormous profits. He should oppose to the utmost the renewal of the Bank charter, because he was satisfied that every farthing made by the Bank ought to belong to the public. Even if a paper currency were wanted, ministers could accomplish the object more advantageously for the public without, than with the assistance of the Bank of England.

Mr. Pearse defended the Bank of England, and asserted that they had no monopoly, since it was in the power of any of the London bankers to issue notes if they thought fit to do so.

Mr. Monck contended, that the Bank had a monopoly in effect, if not in fact, seeing that the private banks could not compete with the favoured chartered companies. With regard to the bargains between government and the Bank, he thought they were just upon the terms of a spendthrift and a usurer—the former being obliged to consent to any thing that the latter required.

Ordered to lie upon the table.

POOR REMOVAL BILL.] Mr. Scarlett, in rising to move the second reading of this bill, observed, that he was prepared for considerable opposition to the measure, in consequence of the great number of petitions which had been presented against it. He had not had an opportunity, when he first brought the subject before parliament, to open the general grounds on which he approached the question. It was his wish, as it also was his intention, to state to the House that he considered the present as only one of a series of measures. If he succeeded in carrying this, he would then venture to press others on the attention of parliament. And he thought it was probable, that many persons who supposed their interests would be affected by this bill might have been induced to soften their tone of observation, if they had been aware that he meant to follow up the present measure by the introduction of others equally important. The House would recollect, that in the last session he had proposed a measure which embraced three great principles. He then conceived, and nothing had since occurred to alter his opinion, that the great vice of the whole administration of our poor laws might be traced to three causes: 1st, the restraint on the circulation of labour; 2nd, the unlimited provision for the poor; and 3rd, the indiscriminate application of that provision, which led to profligacy, idleness, and vice. And he thought, to use the words of a great man, who had often addressed the House from the place where he then stood, that "defective amendments, grafted on a plan originally defective, could produce no lasting or solid benefit." Therefore it was, that he wished to strike at the root of the evil. The numerous alterations in the poor-laws, and the great number of enactments on this subject, afforded sufficient proof that the system demanded serious investigation. It would be found, on examining the different plans which had been adopted for ameliorating the law, that when each project was first introduced, it had haply produced some temporary relief; but, in the course of time, the principle itself, which was pernicious in its basis, overcame every palliative, and increased in power till it had acquired strength sufficient to defeat all the efforts that could be made to correct it. He need not occupy the House in stating the prodigious increase of the poor-rates, and the constantly increasing numbers of the poor. Although it was his intention last session to have called for the adoption of the three principles to which he had alluded, every one of which was of great importance, yet he knew the extreme difficulty of bringing into one bill three measures founded on those principles, each of which had its advocates as well as its opponents. On the present occasion, he had confined himself to one of those principles; and nothing which had occurred since last session, had induced him to alter the opinion he had deliberately formed, that it was necessary to found some particular measure on each of those principles. He firmly adhered to that opinion; and he thought that the measure now before the House would not be effectual, unless it was followed up by enactments calculated to bring the other two principles into operation.

But, leaving untouched the unlimited provision for the poor, and forbearing to legislate on the indiscriminate application of that provision to poverty, however occasioned, he would proceed to inquire into the necessity of the measure now before the House, which had for its object to prevent the removal of the poor, as the system at present stood. The House would, he hoped, permit him to enter into some short history of this subject, before he proceeded to discuss the principle of the measure. He supposed that gentlemen were perfectly acquainted with the present situation of the poor of England. From papers that had been laid before the House, it appeared that the poor amounted to about one-ninth of the whole population. Now, in what situation was that large portion of the people placed under the existing law? If any poor man demanded relief for himself and family, whether his poverty arose from crime, misfortune, or idleness, he was subject to be removed by the justices or overseers, if he had not obtained a settlement in the parish where he applied, to some other parish or township in which he appeared to have a legal settlement, no matter how distant—no matter whether there was any demand for his labour—no matter whether he knew a human being in the place: there he must go—there he must remain under the present law, and he was liable to punishment if he quitted the place. Perhaps he might find it impossible to support his family in the district to which he was removed; still it was no matter—there he and they must continue, as they generally were, burthens to the parish from generation to generation. This was the case at present; and how had the country arrived at such a state of the law? Such a system must be illegal in its principle, since it was contrary to justice to use extreme severity towards the poor. The 43rd of Elizabeth placed the poor-laws on a basis on which Mr. Justice Blackstone lamented they had not been allowed to continue. By that law the poor were placed in this situation.—None were entitled to relief except those who could not work; but for those who could work, but were destitute of employment, the overseer was directed to provide a stock, out of which they might be supplied with employment. This statute set the question at rest for the space of above 60 years; for, from the passing of that act down to the time of Charles 2nd, there were only two acts of the legislature respecting the poor, and neither of these had any reference to the increase of the poor-rates or the multiplication of the poor. There was an act of James 1st, to punish those who abandoned their families; and a second to punish the parents of illegitimate children. But soon afterwards, in the reign of Charles 1st, this country was thrown into a state of civil commotion; armies were raised, and marched from one part of the country to another. An army recruited in Lancashire was, perhaps, employed in Cornwall, and thus much confusion arose with respect to settlement. An order, published by Cromwell, in 1656, would afford some evidence of the effect the civil war had produced on the population. The order stated, "Whereas the number of wandering, idle, loose, dissolute, and disorderly persons, is of late much increased, by reason of some defects in the statute heretofore made for the punishment of rogues, vagabonds, and sturdy beggars." Now he (Mr. S.) believed, that the increased number of those idle persons was occasioned by the peculiar state of the country. This was some years before the restoration of Charles 2nd; but, in the second year after his restoration, as the evil still continued, that statute was passed which enacted the compulsory removal of the poor. He therefore was correct in stating, that, for 60 years, until this statute passed, no law was made to confine the poor to any particular place. The moment that statute was passed, and from that period down to the present hour, the removal of the poor had been the subject of excessive complaint and of constant litigation. The consequence was, that the Statute book was crowded with laws on this subject, until an artificial code had been formed. The statute of Charles 2nd enacted, "that if any person was likely to become chargeable on any parish or place, he might be removed by order of the magistrates to the last place where he was resident for forty days." The House must see what an extraordinary alteration this statute made in the situation of the poor who were not able to support themselves. It gave a most extensive power to the overseer, who was impowered not only to remove those who were chargeable, but persons who appeared likely to become chargeable to the parish. The legislature saw the harshness of this measure, and numerous statutes were passed to multiply the modes of obtaining a settlement. By one statute a man could not be removed who was hired as a servant for a year; a second exempted him from removal if he had served a parish office; a third if he had served an apprenticeship; a fourth if he had purchased a tenement. There were a variety of other statutes, all of which related to settlements. But this was not all. The courts of justice, acting on the principle of the common law, which in this country ever had been, and he hoped ever would be, favourable to the liberty of the subject, had grafted on those statutes a great number of exceptions, to limit the power of removal. In the reign of king William, in 1696, a remarkable circumstance took place with respect to the poor-laws at that period. An application was made to the House of Commons to inquire into the state of the poor-laws. The subject was referred to the board of trade, of which Mr. Locke was then a member; and they had the report of that board which was drawn up by Mr. Locke, and which showed what effect had been produced by the act of Charles 2nd during his reign and the reign of his brother James 2nd while that statute was in full operation. The report said—"the multiplicity of the poor, and the increase of the taxes for their maintenance, is so general a fact that it cannot be doubted of; since the last war it came on us, it has been a growing burthen for many years, and the two last reigns have felt that burthen as well as the present. If the cause be looked to, it will be found to have proceeded, not from the scarcity of provisions, nor for want of employment from the poor, since the goodness of Providence has blessed this country with abundance, and the long peace, during the last two reigns, has wonderfully increased our trade and commerce. There must, therefore, be some other cause.* Perhaps it arises from laxity of discipline and corruption; because virtue and industry are as constant companions on the one side, as idleness, poverty, and vice, on the other." This report was followed up by an act to remove the grievances that were felt from the operation of the statute of Charles 2nd. The 8th and 9th of William was the act by which persons were allowed to come into any parish or township, on producing a certificate of previous settlement. The effect of it was to do away the mischievous operation of the act of Charles 2nd, by allowing people, on stating that they were settled in particular places, to proceed to others, and to reside and work there without the liability of being removed.

Having thus stated the history of the law, he would next call the attention of the House to the effects of that part of it, which obliged persons as soon as they became chargeable to the parish, to remove to another parish where they had got a settlement. And here he would advert for a moment to the 26th of the late king, which introduced some mitigation of the previous state of the law; and it was some consolation to him in his present attempt, to reflect upon the number of petitions which had been on that occasion presented from all parts of the country against sir Edward Hyde East's bill. In consequence of those petitions, and the opposition made to the bill, it had been found necessary to except from its provisions those who might become chargeable to the parish; and a clause had been introduced declaring women pregnant with bastard children chargeable, which was in effect one of the most odious and most pernicious of our system of poor-laws. One of the advantages of the measure which he now proposed would be, that it would greatly diminish the whole expenses and charges of maintaining the poor. The first of these expenses were those arising from litigation. Dr. Burn, one of the wisest writers upon the subject, had stated it to be his conviction, that more litigation had arisen from the law of removals than from any other source. The doctor had alluded only to litigation respecting settlements in the Court of King's Bench, which formed, however, but a small part; for the litigation on the subject at quarter sessions was more enormous than the history of litigation could parallel. On an average of three years up to 1815, this expense was 327,000*l.* a year; and when to this was added the expense incurred at the quarter sessions four times a year, and in the making of inquiries as to the power of removal—of which no regular return had been or could be made—the amount would be found to be very considerable indeed, and would go a great way in actually providing for the poor. According to the existing law, if a man received the smallest sum for his support under a casual or temporary calamity, then that was made a ground for removing not only that man, but the whole of his family, unless the parish to which they had originally belonged became bound for their removal. By this means, the parish from which the family was ejected for the purpose of saving half a crown, not only subjected the parish to which the pauper was to be sent to very heavy expenses, but also compelled the whole family to remove from a place where many or all of them could find work, to a place where no work was to be found. He was fully convinced that many families were to be found subsisting entirely on the parish funds in one place, who but for the law of removal would have been maintaining themselves by their own industry in another. If under such circumstances the poor man should wander out of his own parish in quest of work, the overseers had it in their power to force him back. That the sum of 327,000*l.* was annually expended, upon appeals in disputed cases of removal was in his opinion a clear proof of the vast mischief of which the system was productive; and he would remark in particular, that the expense of removals from large manufacturing towns to small country parishes was very great. One of the most striking effects upon the poor themselves was, that they were driven from where they could find labour, and accumulated where there was no labour to be found. Honourable gentlemen would be pleased to notice how this operated. Let them just imagine for a moment that a law was proposed for preventing the circulation of wheat, of wool, or of any other commodity beyond the parish in which it was produced—would not the man advocating such a measure be considered as something worse than absurd? Now, he would be glad to know upon what better ground the labour of the poor man should be restricted to the parish in which it was produced? Why, when they would spurn at the application of such a doctrine to other commodities, they should act upon it when the labour of the poor was under consideration? Let them mark the effects of this—they were, a total derangement of the wages of labour, especially of agricultural labour all over the country. If the law were such that it made the price of wheat, or of any other article of produce, high in one county and low in another, they would be disposed to think the law bad; but surely that law was no better which made the price of labour high in one county and low in another. Now, the weekly wages of the poor man varied exceedingly in the different counties of England. In some it was from seven shillings to nine shillings; in others, it was from fifteen shillings to eighteen shillings; and in one parish of Oxfordshire, it was stated to be as low as 3*s.* The sum paid in poor-rates, too, bore no proportion to the wealth and population of the counties. From the returns it appeared, that Sussex, with an inferior population and a taxable income of 915,348*l.* paid 275,000*l.* of poor-rates; while Lancashire, with a superior population and a taxable income of 3,087,777*l.* paid 261,730*l.* which was less by more than 14,000*l.* It might, indeed, be stated as perfectly general, that in populous districts where there were large manufacturing towns, the poor-rates were always lower than in thinly inhabited agricultural districts. The cause of this, as well as of the disparity of wages to which he had alluded, was obviously the removal of the poor. To the great towns the poor man naturally directed his steps, because there he had the best chance of finding employment and protection, and to prevent him from going there was an act of injustice; for if he was not allowed to find employment for himself in the parish where it was to be found, then they were bound to find it for him, or subsist him without it, in the parish to which he was restricted. He had heard of one parish in which there were twenty-five able bodied labourers out of employment, while in almost the very next parish there was a deficiency of labourers. These labourers were prevented, by the law of removal, from going to find work, and they naturally said to those who prevented them, "you must support us." One of the worst effects of this practice was, a strong foundation it supplied for a most fatal persuasion, which was increasing of late years—he meant the notion of right to parish support. When the poor man was restrained from the free use of his labour, he had a right to return upon those who restrained him, and to convert their oppression into his title to support. Gentlemen expressed alarm at giving facility to the poor for moving from place to place. He would say that they could not give them facility enough. Let them give greater facility to the poor man to transfer his labour according as there might be a demand for it, and they would do him and the public a service. Instead of feeling jealousy and alarm, they ought to aid and assist the poor in moving from place to place.

He would now advert to some objections which had been urged against his plan. It had been said, that by doing away with the present law of removals, they would set gentlemen on pulling down cottages. But, before the act of Charles 2nd which introduced the present law of removals, so far from cottages having been exposed to destruction, the 37th of Elizabeth had been passed expressly to prohibit the building of cottages. Here again he referred to the authority of Dr. Burn, who stated that the great business of an overseer of the poor was to prevent a poor person from acquiring a settlement —to quarrel with the pretensions and claims of those settled—to pull down cottages—to depopulate the parish in order to keep down the rates, and to pay no attention to the religious habits or the education of the poor. The pulling down of cottages was thus imputed to the law of removal, instead of being prevented by it. The moral effects of this law deserved particular consideration. Their own poor were kept employed by overseers, and their moral habits were attended to; but with respect to the great part of the poor who had no settlement in the parish, they cared not what their habits might be, and the neglect of moral instruction was consequently prevalent throughout England, to a degree which excited the astonishment of every one who contemplated the subject. He had received a letter from the overseer of a parish in Cumberland, who had been overseer at intervals for a period of 23 years. This overseer stated, that those who had not a settlement in a parish were totally neglected, and that young women were left unprotected against seduction, because they could be removed to other parishes. If one half the attention which was now applied to the prevention of litigation of settlements were given to learning the wants of the poor, and bestowing religious and moral instruction upon them, it would be a great saving of expense and a great accession to public virtue. An objection had been made last year in the House, and had since been adopted in many petitions—it was to this effect:—"If you abolish the law of settlement, you will take away a wholesome restraint upon idleness and vice by removing the fear of becoming a burthen to the parish." He was ready to admit that the terror of removal operated in some cases to induce men to exercise greater attention and industry. In this view the law operated as a penal law. But, if the law ought to be maintained for this purpose, it ought to be extended further, and abolish settlements altogether. The poor ought to be removed 100 or 150 miles as a punishment. They ought to be sent from Lancashire to Sussex, and from Sussex to Lancashire. But this punishment wanted the great essential of justice—equality. It might operate as a restraint upon idleness and vice, but it was the very worst punishment which could be applied. When removed from the parish, they ought to be fed on bread and water in the place to which they were removed, if the law was penal; because privation and want were the natural punishment of idleness and vice. But if they were removed from one place only to flourish in idleness in another place, where was the justice of the punishment? Again, the inequality of the law as a punishment was still more increased by the circumstance that it inflicted the greatest severity on those least deserving of severity. Local attachments were stronger in the more virtuous and amiable. To them a removal was the bitterest affliction: but to the idle and profligate, who felt not the attachments arising from industrious and virtuous habits, a removal was no punishment. Admitting, then, that moral restraint ought to be imposed upon idleness and vice, he denied that banishment was the proper means of such restraint. The evils arising from the rigour with which pregnant women were sought out and removed, were particularly mischievous. The parish officers were suffered to drag women in those unfortunate circumstances to public shame, and to fasten that shame upon them for life. It had been stated to the House, that 69 women were in this way removed from Nottingham. He regarded manufacturing towns and agricultural counties with equal favour, but he could not admit the right of manufacturers to send young women whom they had seduced back again to be a burthen upon the country. There could exist no moral obligation to support such spurious issue. Such cases ought to be treated as in Scotland. Let the woman complain if she thought fit; and then an order of maintenance would be made. But if she did not complain, let her be left alone. This was the course pursued in Scotland, and the moral habits of the lower classes there had very much the advantage over those of the same classes in England. The inconvenience of removals were in many cases so great, that a compromise was entered into. The effect was, that a parish A, where a settlement had been secured, was paying to a parish B, where a poor man became chargeable, the amount of his allowance of relief. It was quite manifest that more expenses were incurred by that means. No objection was made to a liberal allowance where another paid it.

The general effect of this measure, would, he doubted not, be in every town throughout the kingdom, to increase the disposition and necessity on the part of those who had the government of the poor in their hands, to look into their moral habits, to discriminate between the industrious and the undeserving, and to proportion in some degree the aid and relief to the merits of the applicant. If this bill should pass into a law, they would find it their interest to confer education on the poor, and to superintend their moral habits. The tendency of so improved a system must be, to diminish rather than increase the amount of the present rates. He would admit that the saving would be relatively greater on the part of the agriculturist, but to the manufacturer the bill would produce no additional burthens. In many districts funds were already established among the poor, which rendered unnecessary all application to or dependence on the parish. It was so in the town of Salford, where, by means of subscriptions of one penny a week, a fund of 200*l*. was established; the efficacy of which had been such, that for a considerable period not above 5*l*. had been drawn from the parochial assessment. The managers of this fund did not allow it to exceed 200*l*. When it arrived at that amount, they stopped short; and when it sunk below, they re-opened the contributions. This example would in all probability, be widely imitated, as it became more generally known. For all these reasons, he was satisfied, that the measure, if adopted, would become a public benefit. That the poor were oppressed by the law as it now stood, and the practices to which it gave birth, was indisputable. The present bill might serve as a first step on the return to a better system. They could not expect to get into a right state until means were devised for lessening that mass of contrivance, ingenuity, and artifice, which at present existed, and for no good or beneficial purpose. Let the experiment be fairly tried of creating employment by less artificial means. In submitting to the House his views upon this most important question, he hoped he had betrayed no ill-placed vanity, nor treated with any improper levity a subject so material in its consequences. In bringing it forward he was animated by one motive only—a desire to promote the true, permanent, and substantial good of his country. If it was not acceptable to the House, he was ready to abandon it. His conviction that, if reduced to practice, it would prove generally useful was deeply founded; but, if it was the pleasure of the House, that it should go no further, or if they were disposed to send it to a committee, there to remain till the ensuing session, he, in either case, bowed to their decision. He certainly did wish to inspire all parties with his own feelings on this subject, and induce them to contemplate in the same light the present state of the labouring poor in this country—a state of slavery and degradation which, he believed, did not exist in any other nation of Europe. He should conclude by moving, "That the bill be now read a second time."

Mr. Mansfield said, that his constituents were strongly opposed to the measure, and in that opposition he concurred with them. He believed, that if carried into effect, it would operate with a multiplied pressure, not only on those who contributed to the poor fund, but even on those who were relieved. He therefore felt it his duty to move as an amendment, "That the bill be read a second time this day six months."

Mr. Monck declared his conviction, that the present measure was brought forward with the purest and best intentions, and with the hope of redressing the many evils which flowed from the system of poor-laws. Indeed, so long as these laws existed, great abuses would prevail, and the lamentable truth was, that in every discussion on the subject the House was reduced to a choice of evils. But he must be allowed to say, that the evils of the present system were comparatively small, when contrasted with that mass of abuse which would be engendered by the operation of the present bill, if carried into effect. The principle of the measure was not new—it had been tried in this country before; but the inconveniencies and abuses it produced made its repeal imperative. It was first introduced in the reign of Elizabeth, and continued until the 13th of Charles the second, when the inconveniencies felt, in consequence of the overflow of paupers from country parishes into towns and rich districts, where there was plenty of stock, were so numerous as to compel the legislator to abandon the system. If such were the abuses in the simple state of society in those times, how much more aggravated must they be if that system was renewed under our present complex condition? The present average amount of the poor-rate, was 15*s.* and 20*s.* in the pound, in the country, and from two to three shillings in town. Now the effect of the bill would be to send every idler from the country parishes into the towns, with a view of their being better supported, and the ultimate result would be, that those towns would be filled with paupers. The hon. member contended, that it was the uniform policy of the legislator rather to restrict than to extend the facility of obtaining settlements. Under the present system every device was practised to throw the paupers in country parishes on the towns for maintenance. He instanced the county of Berks. It became now a complete system with the farmers to depopulate their parishes, to pull down cottages, and indeed to leave only sufficient habitations to meet the ordinary conduct of the farm. The farmers drew labourers for the harvest from the workhouses of Reading, Abingdon, and Newbury. For six weeks they were well fed by the farmers; got beer and large wages; but afterwards they were cast out, and for the rest of the year were to be maintained by the towns. Much stress had been laid by the learned member on the great oppression of removing a pauper from the place which had the advantage of his labour, to his place of settlement. He could not assent to that description of oppression. That labour was the consequence of an understood compact, and was as valuable to the individual as to the place. But he denied it to be oppressive to remove an individual incapable of earning his own bread to that place, where he was to be secured from what the Irish were now unhappily suffering—scarcity and famine. The evils of the present system were numerous enough, without risking their aggravation. How was it that an English manufacturer was able to sell in a foreign market, an article that cost 1,000*l.* in its manufacture, for 900*l.*, and at the same time to draw a profit of 100*l.* from the sale? It was because the English manufacturer possessed that power which the manufacturer of no other country possessed; namely, of putting his hand into the pockets of others for the support of his labourers. The Irish manufacturer had, if any manufacturer had, great natural advantages; yet still he could not compete with the English manufacturer, because as no poor-laws existed in Ireland, he could not pay for his labourers out of the pockets of other people. It had been said, that towns had no right to complain against the bill, as they had the manufactories to afford relief. It would be the greatest benefit that could be conferred on towns, to be rid of manufactories altogether. Wherever they existed, they were the source of misery, disease and vice to the working people—of embarrassment and extortion to the other inhabitants. As to the expence attending the removal, and that was the only gain held out by the present bill, he should only say, that he believed it cost the town of Reading 30*l.* a-year; and sure he was that the inhabitants would gladly pay 300*l.* a-year to be relieved from the evils, which the measure, if carried into operation would entail upon them.

Mr. T. Courtenay felt considerable apprehensions in rising to oppose a measure introduced under the authority of the hon. and learned gentleman, in a speech so well calculated to make a considerable impression. That speech appeared to him, however, more particularly to apply to a bill which some sessions back had been brought forward by a right hon. friend of his, the chairman of the poor-laws committee (Mr. S. Bourne), which was negatived by a considerable majority, rather than to the immediate proposition before the House. For that bill he had voted; though he confessed, he had since altered his opinion, chiefly because he was persuaded that the nearer a man is to the fund on which he has a claim, under the poor-laws, the less industrious and independent he is. In his bill of last year the hon. and learned gentleman had limited the application of the poor-rates. Then, the provision by which he abolished settlements was of less importance; but the present bill left the claim to relief on the extended footing on which it now stood, and allowed the pauper to select the parish to which he might choose to apply for relief; and when relieved by one parish on one day, there was nothing to prevent him making a similar application to another on the next. He agreed with the hon. member who spoke last, that the parish in which the pauper last worked might or might not have been specially benefited by his labours. In every view which he took of the question, since the hon. and learned gentleman's first introduction of a measure relative to the poor-laws, he (Mr. C.) felt more and more convinced that the principle of those laws was a just one; and whenever the hon. and learned gentleman should again introduce the subject fully to the House, he would be ready to meet it. He implored the hon. and learned gentleman to bring forward the whole measure which he had in contemplation, that the sense of the House might be taken; and that those who were for modifications rather than for abolition might have an opportunity of proposing them.

Sir J. Shelley said, he was afraid that, in the present state of the country, the land itself would not long be able to keep the poor along with the payment of rent and taxes. Some remedy should be applied, and therefore he would support the measure.

Captain Maberly opposed the bill, as producing too violent an alteration in the poor laws. Though the system of removal might be sometimes oppressive to the poor, yet the proposed alteration would be exceedingly oppressive to the rich. The comparatively light pressure in some places did not proceed from any restraint on the free circulation of labour, but from the vigilance of those who superintended the poor, and the prevalence of industrious and frugal habits.

Sir M. W. Ridley said, that great inconvenience and expense were incurred by the present system of removal. He would throw it out as a suggestion, that magistrates should be empowered to suspend the order for removal, as in case of sickness, in cases where disputes might be likely to arise as to the parish of the pauper. This suspension might continue until the parishes consulted upon the matter. By this means a great deal of expense and trouble might be saved. As to the bill, he should oppose it, because it would make that alteration all at once which ought to be effected gradually.

Mr. Nolan began by alluding to a remark that had been made, that the poor had no representatives in that House. He could not suffer such an observation to pass without maintaining that there was no class of his majesty's subjects whose interests were not represented there,—and there was no class to whom greater attention had at all times been paid than to the poor. Great acknowledgments were due to his hon. and learned friend for the very able, candid, and ingenious manner in which he had introduced the subject; and though he might differ from him as to the remedy proposed, yet he thought this advantage, at least, would result from the discussion of the question — that it would set the public mind to work upon it, and that no inconsiderable benefit might be derived from that source. It had been said, that the subject was one which ought to have been taken up by his majesty's ministers. Now, he did not think they were bound to take it up. As a measure interesting to all classes, it was open to the consideration of, and might be introduced by, any member who felt himself competent to the task. One general objection to the measure which he had was this—even if he thought favourably of it, he should hesitate to establish it as a law when he found so many petitions against it from every part of the country, and so general an opinion against its practical effects. Another objection was, that the measure was partial, and left wholly out of consideration the general system of the poor-laws with all its defects. When his hon. and learned friend introduced his former bill, he observed that it was complicated, but that every part of it depended on the others; but now he abandoned all the parts except that which referred to the removal of paupers, without any reference to how they were to be supported. It had been objected, that the unsettled poor were irregular in their habits. Now he, on the contrary, was prepared to maintain, that the fear of removal from friends and connexions operated as a great stimulus to industry amongst that class, which stimulus would be lost by the present bill. He contended that this bill was likely to produce one of the effects that his hon. and learned friend had most strongly deprecated, namely, to make the poor look upon that as a matter of right, which in point of fact was a mere matter of charitable relief. Instead of checking, it would likewise considerably promote the expenses of litigation.

The Marquis of Londonderry complimented the hon. and learned gentleman, who had just sat down, on the ability and knowledge which he had displayed on this interesting subject, and congratulated the House on the fact, that it was a subject which had never been discussed with any thing like party feeling. On the contrary, there had never been but one object in view, which was, to resolve the difficult problem of relieving the country from the evils attendant on the existing system. The present discussion tended to show how unfair it was to call on his majesty's government to embark in a measure of this kind when it appeared that even the hon. and learned author of the bill, with all his legal knowledge and research, found himself compelled to abandon two out of the three propositions originally embraced in his bill, and experienced great difficulty with respect to the details of the third. To the principle of the bill, every man must be favourable. The only doubt was as to the mode in which that principle could best be carried into effect. In the present state of the bill it appeared to him that bands of paupers might traverse the country, and obtain what would be very like a right of settlement wherever they might find themselves in especial want of aid. That was an evil which, in his opinion, ought not to be permitted. Without going further into the details of the new bill, he would simply state that it appeared to him to be calculated to promote litigation to an unexampled extent, and to create great additional expense, instead of furthering the cause of economy. He wished the hon. and learned gentleman to find out some plan to disarm his bill of the evils which it was certain to create, if the principle of it was pushed to its full extremity. He could assure the hon. and learned gentleman that if he did so, he would give him every assistance in his power. Indeed, the House was bound to give every assistance in its power to any gentleman who took the difficult subject of the poor-laws into his consideration, and ought to encourage in the outset any measure that was introduced to amend them. If he were compelled to give a vote upon this measure as it stood at present, he should certainly vote against it; but as he was favourable to the principle of the bill, and thought that the objections which he had against its details might be remedied in a committee, he had no wish to object to the reading of it a second time.

Sir C. Burrell defended the habits of the poor in Sussex, and the disposition of the farmers of that county, to do all in their power to relieve their wants. The poor-laws required extensive amendment; and he thought the hon. and learned member entitled to great thanks for having bestowed so much attention on the subject.

Mr. Chetwynd said, that as the present system of poor-laws was one of the greatest curses under which the country laboured, its gratitude was due to every gentleman who suggested the means of amending them. After complimenting his hon. and learned friend on the exertions he had made upon this subject, he proceeded to say, that though he would not go the whole length of abolishing the law of settlement, he was still aware that some alteration in it was absolutely necessary. After pointing out several inconveniencies which accrued from it, not only to parishes but individuals, he proceeded to attack the present system of bastardy laws; and contended, that that system was calculated to promote vice and immorality, inasmuch as a woman with three or four bastards was enabled to live in ease and idleness from the allowance she drew from the father of her children for their maintenance; whilst a married woman, with the same family, was obliged to work hard before she could obtain a similar relief from the parish in which she had a settlement. He should vote for the second reading of the bill, as all the objections he had to it might be removed in the committee.

Colonel Wood said, he should cordially vote for the second reading, and heartily thanked the learned gentleman for bringing forward a measure of so much importance. He was quite persuaded, that when the details of the bill came to be known in the country, the hon. and learned author of it would be hailed as a friend by every poor man in the country.

Mr. P. Moore said, he concurred in the unanimous sentiments of his constituents in opposition to the bill.

Sir R. Wilson approved of the principle of the bill, but hoped it would receive some modifications in the committee.

Mr. Alderman Bridges opposed the bill, though he was in favour of some alteration in the system of the poor-laws.

Mr. Scarlett expressed his readiness to make such alterations in the committee, as he hoped would do away the different objections that had been urged against it.

Mr. Denman objected to the principle altogether, and cautioned the House against favouring it so far as to permit it to be read a second time.

The House divided: For the second reading, 66. Against it 82. The second reading was consequently put off for six months.

Monday, June 3.

Reform of Parliament—Remonstrance and Petition from Greenhoe.] Mr. Coke rose to present a petition from the hundred of North Greenhoe in the county of Norfolk, complaining of agricultural distress, and praying for a Reform of Parliament. The petition set forth, that taxation was the cause of their distress, and that the enormous sums raised by it were lavished to increase the influence of the Crown, by maintaining a corrupt majority in that House, and to keep up a large standing army for no other purpose than that of subduing the constitutional feelings of a justly indignant people. It stated, that the majority of the House was always ready to support any administration, however corrupt and tyrannical. The hon. member expressed his concurrence in the prayer of the petition, and moved, that it do lie on the table.

Mr. Fremantle thought the language of the petition was most insulting to the House, and moved, that it be rejected.

Mr. Curwen said, the truth of some of the allegations in the petition could not be denied. It was notorious that seats in that House were bought and sold like cattle at Smithfield market. It could not be expected that the country would shut its eyes to these practices.

Mr. James rose to notice a mistake into which the petitioners had fallen. It was not to keep up the influence of the Crown that such lavish acts were committed, and he thought it almost high treason to say so. It was to maintain the unjust influence of the boroughmongers.

The Marquis of Londonderry said, that the tone of the petition was not only a tone of remonstrance but of insult, and he thought that the House, with a due regard to its own character, could not receive it.

Mr. Calcraft could see nothing in the petition which was adverse to its being received. What it contained had often been repeated in that House, and doubtless would be again. Were they not accustomed to say that taxation was grievous? Was it not a fact that pensions and useless offices were kept up, by which many members were under the direct influence of the Crown? With regard to the standing army, he had always said that it was greater than was necessary for proper purposes; and it had been used, in some instances, under very suspicious circumstances. He thought his hon. friend had displayed a little too much zeal in moving for the rejection of the petition.

Sir R. Wilson said, that the hon. gentleman could not, as a man of honour, deny that seats in that House were bought and sold, to his own knowledge. He thought the petition ought to be received.

Mr. Wynn had always considered that a petition ought not to be rejected upon any particular expressions or words which it might contain, but upon the general spirit in which it was drawn up. If he looked at the general spirit of the present petition, he thought it was plainly intended to menace and insult the House. It was a justification of rebellion, and if it was received, the House could never after venture to reject any other petition.

Sir J. Newport thought they were bound to open as far as possible the doors of the House to the petitions of the people. By so doing they would best consult the dignity of the House. To a large proportion of what was contained in the petition he gave his assent. There were some words in it which he regretted; but they ought not to be scrupulous about expressions in a time of distress like the present.

Mr. Secretary Peel said, there was a point of form which struck him as being objectionable in the wording of the petition. It was called a remonstrance. Now, if he believed it was uniformly the custom to call such applications petitions. He should not have considered this a sufficient reason for rejecting the petition; but, when he looked for the animus in which the whole had been drawn up, and found this word "remonstrance," in conjunction with the language therein used, he had no difficulty in determining that it ought not to be received. He was convinced that it would form a rule that would lead to future petitions of a still more objectionable nature. If the language it contained was not insulting to the House, he was at a loss to know what would be so.

Mr. J. Smith did not believe many of the allegations contained in the petition, the one with regard to the army was altogether false. But he felt considerable difficulty in rejecting a petition of this kind; and he was determined not to do so by what had fallen from the right hon. gentleman who had lately accepted office. The right hon. gentleman had said, that before rejecting a petition they ought to be satisfied that there was an intended insult and this had not been made out in the present case. He believed there were many persons who thought every word in this petition to be true. He, however, did not think so, and he knew the part which related to the army, to be grossly false.

The House divided: For receiving the petition 55. Against it 89.

NAVAL AND MILITARY PENSIONS.] On the order of the day, "that the report of the committee on Naval and Military pensions be now brought up,"

Mr. Hume said, he did not blame the chancellor of the exchequer for touching the sinking fund, but he blamed him for talking one way and acting another. It was most inconsistent to buy and sell annuities at the same time. It was a round-about way of doing that which might easily be simplified. It was better to proceed simply and honestly in the management of our finances, and to free them from complexity. He therefore moved as an amendment, "that it is expedient to take from the Sinking Fund an annual sum equal to the amount of taxation to be remitted, towards relieving the distresses of the country instead of raising money by Loan, or Annuities, as is proposed to be done by the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the payment of Military and Naval Half-pay and Pensions."

Mr. Grenfell said, that should the amendment be rejected he intended to propose a clause similar to that proposed in 1786 by Mr. Fox. It would be a clause empowering the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt to apply the monies in their hands to the purchase of these annuities.

Mr. Brougham said, that as light alteration of words would make the plan of the right hon. gentleman and that of his hon. friend precisely the same. The right hon. gentleman proposed two sets of commissioners; one for reducing the national debt and the other for increasing it. Why not save the trouble of bringing one set of them into existence? At present here was a set ready made to their hands, grown up and in full maturity. They were precisely of the same cast as that of the set proposed to be created. The present commissioners might sit on the same day and at the same place in their united capacity, and might be empowered to deal in the stock. The plan for double commissioners was a senseless, degrading mummery; and it was merely proposed to make it be thought that the right hon. gentleman was really not touching the sinking fund. He should therefore give the amendment his hearty support; as he should also the clause mentioned by his hon. friend.

Colonel Davies could see no distinction whatever between the measure proposed and a direct invasion of the sinking fund. At all events, if the thing was to be done, let it be done in the way most advantageous to the country. Place the commissioners of the sinking fund in the shoes of the parties, who were to become purchasers; and then, at the end of the 45 years, the public would reap the benefit of the bargain.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he was inclined to acquiesce in the suggestion of the hon. member for Penryn.

Mr. Ricardo said, that the plan was neither more nor less than sending one set of commissioners into the market to sell stock, and another set into the market to buy stock; and even the chancellor of the exchequer now understood that fact so fully, that he was about to support a clause which would enable these two sets of commissioners to deal with one another. And here he would remind the House of an expression used by the right hon. gentleman on first bringing forth his plan. The right hon. gentleman then assured the House, that he was not so young in office, as to make a proposal to parliament unless he had good ground to believe that he could make a bargain upon the terms which he stated. And what had the right hon. gentleman done since? Why, he had been forced to tell the House, that there had been an error in his calculations—that he had never supposed that he could make a bargain with any body for 2,800,000*l*., but that the bargain would cost considerably more. Then look at the present situation of the country. The chancellor of the exchequer said, that the sinking fund was 5,000,000*l*. Yes; but he had for a long time maintained the delusion of its amounting to 16,000,000*l*. Now, as he had tardily acknowledged that the 16,000,000*l*. was a delusion, and that the real fund was only 5,000,000*l*., so he might hereafter acknowledge, that the 5,000,000*l*. was a delusion, and that the fund was in reality only 3,000,000*l*. The plan of the hon. member for Aberdeen, was simple and easy to be effected; then why not adopt it, in place of such a complicated operation as that proposed by the chancellor of the exchequer?

The Marquis of Londonderry said, it surely could matter very little whether the operations of the proposed scheme were carried on by a set of commissioners constituted for that purpose, or by the commissioners already in charge of the sinking fund, since neither the commissioners already existing, nor those intended to be appointed, were to receive a single shilling in the way of emolument from the public. The only real question was, whether the managing parties should go by one name or another. With respect to the proposition that the plan should be carried into effect out of the sinking fund, he was opposed to that mode of doing the business; but he had no objection to the clause suggested by the hon. member for Penryn, because it merely put the new description of stock in the same situation with other stocks in the market, leaving it open to the commissioners of the sinking fund to deal in that stock or not, as they might think fit. The new stock might chance in some years to be what was called a heavy article. Now, if the trustees of the stock had power to sell, and the commissioners of the sinking fund power to buy, an additional channel for disposal would be opened, and the value of the property proportionably sustained. The noble marquis defended the chancellor of the exchequer's manner of bringing forward his plan. His right hon. friend had merely said that, if the House voted the measure, it would be carried into execution. No doubt he had had reason to expect that purchasers would be ready to treat. One great corporation, the South Sea Company, had, he believed, received subscriptions with a view to the bargain, but had afterwards changed their mind, the remote return being unsuited to their purposes. It would not, however, be set up as an objection to the measure, that it had failed in that or any other quarter; because, as regarded the wishes of the hon. gentlemen opposite, the manner in which it was now likely to be accomplished was precisely the manner which they themselves preferred; and therefore, he saw nothing which should induce the House, now, to adopt the amendment. Gentlemen argued, as though there was but one sum of 5,000,000*l*. to work upon, while, in fact, the fund in question was a fund of 5,000,000*l*. independent of the sinking fund altogether.

Mr. Calcraft considered the chancellor of the exchequer to be at that moment in too pitiable a plight for any generous mind to indulge in taunts against him. "Parcere subjectis" was the characteristic of a magnanimous opponent; and he knew his hon. friends near him too well not to feel that they would act upon its influence towards the right hon. gentleman in his present helpless condition. What the noble lord meant by his two sinking funds equally operative, he professed he did not understand; but if there were two sinking funds of five millions, the result would be, however the noble marquis endeavoured to mystify the question, that one would be applied in the purchase of the other. He (Mr. C.), however, was bound to defend the chancellor of the exchequer against the defence which had been made for him by the noble marquis. The noble marquis said, that the right hon. gentleman had come down to the House with what he conceived a contract made; but, in fact, it was the noble marquis himself who had come down with the contract made; and when it was found that the contract could not be made, then it was that the chancellor of the exchequer had come down to announce the failure. Upon the whole, he was glad that the project had failed with the ominous South Sea company—he was glad, also, that it had failed with the Bank of England, and that ministers had at last been compelled to come to the right course. We had 5,000,000*l.* of sinking fund, and we were going to get rid of a certain quantity of our expenditure. Could any thing be more proper than to take from our surplus the 2,800,000*l.* that we wanted? Upon the argument, that the measure did not interfere with the sinking fund, it was unnecessary to detain the House. Was it possible for commissioners to buy in the morning and sell in the evening at one market—to create debt at twelve o'clock, and to reduce it at two; nay, to create and to extinguish at the very same hour, and yet to say that the two acts did not nullify each other? Could any man in his senses say that while this was doing a sinking fund of 5,000,000*l.* was maintained? He should certainly vote for the amendment; and, failing that, for the proposal of the hon. member for Penryn, which appeared as it were a sort of salvo for the honour of ministers. He congratulated the House, first, that ministers had been compelled at last to resort to that course which had been pressed upon them ever since the beginning of the session; and next, that a very large reduction of taxes had been obtained, which ministers at the commencement of the session had treated as impossible.

Mr. Hume said, that after what had just occurred, the next thing for the House to do was, to endeavour to persuade ministers to carry the complex operation of their plan into effect as beneficially to the public as possible. He thought that this would be best done by the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt advancing the annual payments for a number of years, and afterwards repaying themselves, as the annuities to be paid decreased in amount. Such a plan would have the effect of relieving taxation at the present time, and might be carried into effect without the loss of a single penny to the country. He would therefore move to leave out all the words of the original resolution after the word "that," and to insert the following in their place: "That it is the opinion of this House, that, for the purpose of apportioning, conformably to the resolution of the 3rd of May last, the burthens of the naval and military pensions, it is expedient that the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt be authorised and required to advance from the sinking fund into the exchequer several sums [which Mr. H. specified] by four equal quarterly instalments, payable on the 15th of January, 15th April, 15th July, and 20th of Oct. in each year, the first instalment to be paid on the 20th Oct. 1822; and that after 15 years shall have expired the said commissioners shall pay from the exchequer to the sinking fund the said annual sums above specified."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer did not think it necessary to trouble the House with any observations upon this amendment, as it was substantially the same with that which had just been negatived.

The amendment was negatived, and the original resolution was then agreed to; as were also the two resolutions immediately following it, without any further discussion. When the fourth resolution was read, Mr. Grenfell moved, that the following words be added to the resolution: "That it shall and may be lawful for the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt, if they shall think it expedient, to apply any of the monies which shall have been placed to their account towards the purchase of the whole, or any part of such portion, of the said annuity of 2,800,000*l.*, terminable at the end of 45 years, as the said trustees shall find it expedient to sell in any year, or of any other terminable annuities created by the authority of parliament." The chancellor of the exchequer acquiesced, and the amendment was agreed to.

On the resolution, relative to the repeal of 13*s.* out of the 15*s.* duty on every bushel of salt, from and after the 5th of January 1823,

Sir J. Sebright said, it would be of great relief to the agricultural interest that the tax should be taken off before the autumn, because then the greatest quantity of cattle was killed and salted.

Mr. Curwen observed, that there was another inconvenience by the mode proposed, as the poor people who laid in their salt would incur a great loss. For his part he was induced to move the taking off the whole tax [Cheers]. If it was necessary that the government should have the 250,000*l.* which they expected to raise by what was left of the salt tax, there were many other ways of raising that sum. He then moved as an amendment, "That from and after the 10th October 1822, all Duties on Salt shall cease and determine."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer objected to the amendment, on the ground that there could be no material alteration in the existing financial arrangements without breaking down the system altogether. If the whole of the salt tax were repealed, either some new tax must be imposed to supply the deficiency, or the integrity of the sinking fund must be invaded [A laugh!]. Did gentlemen mean by that laugh, that the resolution which had recently been agreed to, trenched on the sinking fund? If so, the House ought to adhere with the more pertinacity to what remained. But he denied that the resolution in question involved any incroachment on the sinking fund. If, however, this amendment was adopted, the present surplus of the income over the expenditure, on which the existing sinking fund was founded, would be diminished. With respect to the proposition, as viewed with reference to its effect on the community, he believed, that the remission of 13*s.* of the duty would afford to the public all the advantages that would result from the remission of the whole duty. For all the domestic purposes to which salt was applicable, a reduction of the price of salt from 17*s.* or 18*s.* a bushel, to 4*s.* or 5*s.*, would operate in such a beneficial manner, that the difference of 2*s.* would not be perceptible. As to the question of the duty on the salt employed in the fisheries, that might be discussed when the bill went into the committee. It was of vital importance, however, to the whole system of our finance, that this amendment should not be acceded to. By retaining the 2*s.* a bushel of duty on salt, parliament would retain for the public a considerable revenue. It was probable, in consequence of the increase of consumption which the diminution of duty must necessarily occasion, that the produce of the duty of 2*s.* a bushel would amount to 300,000*l.* That sum would be immediately lost by the adoption of the amendment. Such a proposition would with more propriety be made when the particular bill should be before the House.

Mr. Brougham congratulated the House on the great light which had broken in upon the right hon. gentleman's mind since the commencement of the session. The right hon. gentleman had then talked as if no relief could be experienced by the country from any remission of taxation. Nay, the right hon. gentleman had even gone farther than the noble lord opposite did in 1816, when he said "the ignorant impatience" of the people on the subject of taxation [Lord Londonderry denied having used the expression]. He (Mr. B.) must have dreamt, then, that the noble lord had said so. And yet the idea was so singular, the collocation so peculiar, the whole phrase so extraordinary, that it was difficult to suppose any one could fancy such an expression had been used when it actually had not been so. The right hon. gentleman had not only characterized a remission of taxation as a most ridiculous project for the relief of the country, but had absolutely asserted, that he was not sure that such a remission would not increase the existing evil. The House and the country had, however, reason to rejoice in the new view of the subject entertained by the right hon. gentleman, who now talked very fluently, of the great relief which the taking off 13*s.* out of 15*s.* in the duty on salt would afford. Far be it from him to say, that such a diminution of the duty would not afford considerable relief;—a relief for which the country had to thank, not his majesty's government, but those who compelled them to concede the remission. The right hon. gentleman, however, refused to take off the remaining 2*s.* of duty. On that point he (Mr. B.) perfectly agreed with the member for Cumberland. Was it nothing, by refusing to abolish the duty, to keep up the whole expense attending its collection? Perhaps he should be told that the amount of that expense would abate with the amount of the produce of the duty. But, if he might judge from the present expense of collection in Scotland and England, no such effect would be the result. On the salt duty in England of a million and a half, the expense of collection was not more than 55,000*l.* whereas, on that of Scotland, which amounted only to 100,000*l.*, the expense of collection was 21,000*l.* The same result might be expected here. But there was another objection to preserving the duty, independent of the expense of collecting it; he meant the patronage which it gave the Crown. If a large revenue were to be raised by any particular impost which there was no means of avoiding, a certain extent of patronage in the collection might justly be allowed to the Crown. But if the revenue so raised was trifling, it was unjust to the people on constitutional grounds, to keep up a disproportionate patronage. There was a third objection to the continuance of any part of the duty. Let the House make what alterations they pleased in the salt laws, it was impossible, while any portion of the duty existed, that there should not co-exist those regulations which were the worst part of the worst laws of this country—the revenue laws. No man who had not seen the operation of those laws in our courts of justice—who had not witnessed the intolerable regulations which were brought together under this branch of our revenue system—could form any idea of the extent to which they cramped and fettered industry—of the snares which they strewed around its progress, or of the downright galling oppression that belonged to this part of our jurisprudence. Were it only for the sake of getting rid of all this odious machinery, it would be well to abandon the tax; but when, in addition to all this, they considered the undue patronage, and that all these evils were to be encountered for a sum at the utmost of 300,000*l.*, he thought the House could not hesitate to relinquish it entirely.

The Marquis of Londonderry said, that any stranger who had heard the learned gentleman, would really suppose that his right hon. friend was so fond of laying on taxes, and so inimical to taking them off, that he had preached a lecture to the House on the delights and the utility of taxation. Now, he would appeal to the House, whether his right hon. friend had not invariably declared, that whenever taxes could be remitted without detriment to the public credit, it would be a great relief to the country to remit them? What his right hon. friend had argued against was, the assertion of the learned gentleman, that taxes should be taken off to such an amount as immediately to remove the agricultural distress. The learned gentleman contended, that if the remission of five or six millions of taxes did not relieve that distress (which he very well knew it would not), the remission ought to proceed farther. His right hon. friend, on the contrary, maintained that the remission could not proceed so far; and à fortiori, that it could not proceed farther, without shaking public credit, and issuing in national bankruptcy; and therefore that an accordance with the learned gentleman's suggestion would be followed by additional suffering. With respect to the patronage, it was administered not by the government but by the board of Excise. In one word he would state to the House why the learned gentleman supported the amendment. Either he wished to take from his right hon. friend the merit which belonged to him, or he wished to destroy the system which parliament had sanctioned. The learned gentleman felt himself so completely beaten, that he perceived there were only two games open to him. He hoped, either that the House would listen to the insinuations in which he was always indulging in order that he might appropriate to himself the suggestions of his right hon. friend, or on the other hand, that parliament might be induced to degrade itself, by breaking down piecemeal the system which it had hitherto determined to maintain. If the learned gentleman could once get his wedge in, he knew it would be difficult to prevent him from driving it farther. Unless, therefore, the House were prepared to retread their steps, they would reject the amendment; if the House allowed the learned gentleman to do what he wished, he would not only trench on the sinking fund, but would apply himself to the appropriation of a part of the general income.

Mr. Ricardo said, it was asserted by ministers that the annuity scheme was no infringement on the principle of the sinking fund. If so, instead of forty-five let the period of that scheme be extended to fifty or sixty years, and that would afford a sufficient sum to enable parliament to remit the whole of the salt duty.

General Gascoyne was of opinion that the reduced duty would be much more productive than was anticipated. He was satisfied with the diminution proposed.

Mr. Benett, of Wilts, characterized the salt tax as the most mischievous of all imposts. He hoped it would be entirely got rid of, and that, no longer existing as a nucleus of taxation, no minister would be hardy enough to propose its revival.

Mr. Calcraft allowed that the chancellor of the exchequer's proposition went in the first instance farther than his (Mr. C's) had done. But it should be recollected that his ultimate object had been the annihilation of the tax, although he was obliged to suit his primary proposition to the palate of those to whom it was made. To make the residue of the tax productive, it must be extended to the fisheries, than which nothing would be more injur[ious]. It would be in vain otherwise to expect an increase of consumption at the rate of 50 per cent on an article of the first necessity. It was evident that on the ground of constitutional principle, it would be better to get rid of the tax altogether. While any part of it remained, the people would suspect, that on the occurrence of any necessity for raising money, it would be restored to its present magnitude. It was well worthy of the consideration of a financial minister, that the repeal of the tax in question would afford the people the means of indulging in the consumption of other exciseable commodities; so that the revenue would not suffer.

The House divided: For the original motion, 111, for Mr. Curwen's amendment: 67.

Corn Importation Bill.] On the order of the day, for going into a committee on this bill,

Mr. Canning rose, to move an instruction to the committee, the subject of which, he said, was not new to the House, having been introduced to its attention in a petition from the holders of foreign corn at Liverpool. It was undoubtedly a great object to get rid of the accumulation of foreign corn, and the holders entertained the hope, that if it were ground into flour there would be an opportunity of exporting it to the West Indies or some other place, and it was wished that permission should be given that it might be taken out for the purpose of being ground for exportation, and failing of exportation, that it might be returned into warehouse. The first regulation would be, that the person taking out foreign corn should enter into bond to return even a larger than the usual proportion of flour. It might be permitted to remain for the chance of exportation a certain time, say six weeks, and then be returned into bond, and not suffered to come out for home consumption until the ports were opened. He would move, "that it be an instruction to the committee, that they have power to make provision in the bill to allow the taking of foreign corn out of warehouse, for the purpose of being ground into flour, for exportation."

Sir T. Lethbridge said, that the agriculturists had been so completely ground already, that he must take the liberty of opposing this grinding clause, in whatever shape it appeared. Nothing was more likely to promote the introduction into our market of foreign corn, in the shape of flour.

Mr. Ricardo agreed, that if the clause could not be introduced with a full security against the flour coming into the home market it ought not to be admitted; but, if that security could be found, it would be most unjust to deprive the holders of foreign corn of it. He thought the bill of the noble lord would be a great improvement on the present law. The hon. member for Cumberland founded all his arguments on the value of corn in pounds sterling, but he (Mr. R.) did not regard the pound sterling. He was anxious that the people should have an abundant supply of corn and an increase of their comforts; and he thought a greater freedom in the trade calculated to produce those effects. He differed entirely from the hon. member, as to the ill effects which it would have upon the demand for labour.

Mr. Western would acquiesce in the clause, if security could be given that the corn reduced to flour should not be brought into home consumption; and he was disposed to think that such security might be given.

Sir J. Newport had no objection to the clause, on the understanding that proper means would be applied to prevent the flour from being brought into home consumption.

The House divided: For the instruction, 136; against it, 49. On the question, "that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair," Mr. D. Browne moved, as an amendment, "that this House do resolve itself into a committee of the whole House, to consider the laws relating to the importation of foreign corn." The amendment was negatived. On the question, "that the Speaker do now leave the chair," the House divided: Ayes 149; Noes 41. The House then resolved itself into the committee. On the question, that 80s. be the permanent price at which wheat shall be imported,

Mr. Whitmore said, that the bill had two objects—to raise the price of corn in this country above the level of other countries, and to induce the agriculturists to grow a sufficient quantity of corn for the whole supply of the country. He decidedly objected to both these proposals. In a country densely peopled like this, it was necessary, that much of the supply should be obtained from other countries. Without imports we could not expect to have exports. It was true that of late we had not been importing corn; but we had, from the necessity of our peculiar situation been largely importing gold, which had given an artificial stimulus to commerce. High prices of the articles of subsistence in this country must destroy its trade or its capital. There were two opinions as to the effects of high wages, which high price of food rendered necessary; that they entered into, and increased the price of the commodity to the consumer; the other, that they lessened the profit of stock. Whichever of these views was correct, the effect must be ruinous to commerce. He was convinced that corn could not be procured in any great quantities from the Baltic, at a lower average than 40s. to 45s. to which the import charges and duties were to be added. As to currency, he expressed his doubts, whether the demand in behalf of this country for gold in the foreign markets, had not raised the value of that metal, and consequently the value of our present currency, to a greater degree than was calculated by his hon. friend, the member for Portarlington. The supply of gold also it was to be recollected, had been stopped from political causes. This was a subject which required to be sifted to the bottom; and he lamented that the plan of his hon. friend, for a paper currency payable in bullion had not been resorted to. He concluded by moving to substitute 64s. for 70s.

Mr. Wodehouse, instead of agreeing to reduce the import price to 64s. said, he should move an amendment to raise it to 75s. as it appeared from the whole tenor of the evidence, that 80s. was necessary as a protective price.

Mr. Ricardo expressed his surprise at the proposition of the hon. member for Norfolk, since the most active supporters of the agricultural interest had declared that 67s. would afford adequate protection to the farmer. He thought the proposition of the hon. member for Bridgenorth deserving the support of the House. High protecting prices would only benefit the landlord, at the expense of the rest of the community, not excepting even the farmer.

The committee divided on Mr. Whitmore's amendment: Ayes, 42; Noes, 87. Mr. Wodehouse's amendment was withdrawn and the original resolution agreed to.

Mr. Bankes then moved an amendment, that the importation duty should be paid at the time of importation instead of the time of taking it out of the warehouse.

Mr. Robinson saw no sufficient reason for adopting the amendment. It would have the effect of preventing the warehousing of corn under any circumstances.

Mr. Marryat contended, that the amendment was in opposition to the whole warehousing system of this country.

Mr. J. Benett contended, that there was little or no analogy between the warehousing of corn and other articles.

The committee divided: For the amendment, 33; Against it, 70. Mr. Canning then proposed a clause to authorize the grinding of foreign corn into flour, for the purpose of exportation. The clause was agreed to pro formâ; and the farther discussion of it being postponed, the House resumed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, June 4.

CRIMINAL LAWS.] Sir James Mackintosh rose, to entreat the attention of the House to that very important subject, the criminal law of the country; and he felt that in mooting a question already so often discussed, he should have occasion for the patience and for the indulgence of honourable members. The fact of the repeated discussion of the subject—that fact alone—impressed upon him the difficulty of his task; but he was also aware, that the very nature of the question was calculated to do any thing rather than to excite general interest in the House. The question, however important to the community at large, touched, at no point, the interests of any particular class: it neither promoted the views of any party; nor could it be rendered subservient to the ambition of any individual: it formed no field for that kind of personal contest in the House which was the principal amusement of the parliamentary bystander; nor was it likely to produce any of those more serious contests between bodies of gentlemen threatened with ruin, and ministers compelled to defend their own measures, which the House had unfortunately heard so often during the present session. Not one of these various and opposite kinds of interest belonged to the subject upon which he had now to treat; but the deep importance of the subject had left him, in his own feelings, no choice but to undertake it. Under the difficulty which attached to the handling of a question so repeatedly discussed, he was sustained by the numerous and respectably-signed petitions which had been presented to the House. Those petitions, attested as to their value by the hon. members who presented them, spoke the deliberate opinion, the decided feeling of a great majority of the enlightened and reflecting inhabitants of England; and he, standing upon the foundation of public opinion, and about to examine a question which no one could deny to be of the very first importance, claimed excuse if he asked that same patient attention from the House with which he had been honoured upon former occasions. At such an advanced period of the year, he could have no hope of introducing a bill to be passed during the present session. Any proposal to that effect, at such a time, would be unreasonable; and he had been prevented, partly by the course of public business, partly by a sense of the difficulty of his subject, and partly by his own ill state of health, from bringing the matter forward at an earlier period. But although he had no hope of a full discussion of the subject in both Houses of parliament this year, he should hold it unpardonable if he did not make some effort to advance a cause which the community had so deeply at heart; and he therefore intended to propose a resolution to the House, merely affirming a general principle which he believed had already been recognized, and virtually adopted in various cases by the House, and by the legislature; and that resolution might serve as a basis for measures to be taken in the next session for the revision and reformation of British criminal law.

The better course, with that view, would perhaps be, to read the resolution at once. It was this—"That this House will, at an early period of the next session, take into their most serious consideration the means of increasing the efficacy of the Criminal Laws, by abating their undue rigour; together with measures for strengthening the Police, and for rendering the punishment of Transportation and Imprisonment more effectual for the purposes of example and reformation." Upon this resolution he would first say, that he attached little value to the peculiar form of expression in which it might be couched: he wished to get a declaration, generally, in favour of the principle: and he wished that declaration to be recorded as a resolution on the Journals of the House; but with respect to any thing like criticism upon words, he gave his up at once to those who might think them worthy of such examination; and having stated thus much he would add a few words in justification of the course which he was taking. He set little value upon precedent on such matters; but if precedent was necessary, precedent he had, and of the highest description. In almost every work of reformation which had experienced vehement opposition, it had been found necessary in the different stages of the subject to vary the form of presenting it to parliament. In that memorable measure, the greatest effort perhaps of modern times in the cause of justice and humanity, the abolition of the Slave-trade—after bills had passed the lower House in favour of that measure and been rejected in the upper, after a bill for the partial suppression of the trade had passed through both Houses, a resolution similar to that which he now submitted, had been proposed by Mr. Fox. It embodied almost his dying words—it was the last effusion of that unextinguishable zeal for virtue and humanity which animated his heart and shed lustre over his public life; and in following such an example, farther search for precedent became unnecessary.

Having justified his conduct, then, in proposing the resolution, he would proceed to offer a few observations in its support. What he called upon the House to declare was this—that the efficacy of the penal laws would be increased by an abatement of their rigour. In proposing to the House to make that declaration, he proposed nothing novel; they would merely be re-asserting, and in definite terms, that which was contained in many acts of the House itself, and in some acts of the whole legislature. Had not the statutes against stealing in bleaching-grounds been repealed, upon the very ground that to mitigate the punishment was the only practicable means of making the punishment effective? Had not the repeal of several statutes in 1812 against offences connected with the revenue, proceeded precisely upon the same principle? Look at the statute of the 12th Geo. 2nd, which substituted transportation for death in cases of fraudulent bankruptcy. No man would contend that the punishment was mitigated out of any opinion that the offence was insignificant; but the change was made because the mere threat of death had deadened and defeated the whole operation of the law, and had, within the space of 70 years, reduced it to a dead letter. This alteration in the bankrupt law was only a single instance among many which might be cited. And could the legislature have put forth a more solemn recognition of the principle for which he was now contending? The punishment of death was repealed as regarded fraudulent bankruptcies; and yet fraudulent bankruptcy was a heavier offence than nineteen out of twenty of those which were still capital by the existing law of England. He would not consume the time of the House with repeated instances; but there was the case of shoplifting. The law was mitigated as regarded that offence from capital at 5s. to capital at 15l. The old excuse for that law had been, that it was intended to guard by severe penalties the property of poor shopkeepers from a kind of small theft to which they were continually exposed. That excuse was now given up. The small thefts were made no longer capital, and 15l. instead of 5s. was made the price of a man's life. Was farther instance necessary of the adoption of this principle, the acts of the House of Commons might over and over be appealed to. The bills in the time of the late sir S. Romilly might be quoted; the committees appointed by the House, and the reports of those committees. Nay, he would appeal to the divisions in that House, and to the feeling exhibited upon the question of forgery. He would ask, whether the attendance of members had not been as numerous, and the feeling of the House as strong and clearly manifested against ministers upon that question, as it had ever been found to be, or ever could be expected to be, upon a question merely of general legislation? Now, members were aware that the attendance upon such subjects could never be compared with that which was given upon subjects which agitated more immediately the passions of men. The state of the House at the moment when he (sir J. Mackintosh) was speaking, was a sample of the kind of attendance which could be obtained upon such questions. He alluded to that fact, not out of any personal feeling, but merely to show that upon the question of forgery—upon that question which was the strong-hold of the opponents of his present measure—upon that question which formed the very triumph of severity—the House of Commons had inclined to the wise resolution, that the punishment of death should to a great extent be done away? Upon grounds like these, it was not too much to say, that, in calling upon the House for a resolution that mitigation would promote efficacy, he called upon it to declare nothing which it had not virtually declared long ago; that he only was demanding that avowal in terms which the House, by its acts, had repeatedly made already. The latter part of his resolution he had introduced, because he had been told upon a former occasion, that in attempting to discuss the question of capital punishments, without looking at the question of secondary punishments, he was separating two things, which, from their nature should be indivisible. To satisfy the holders of such opinions, he had put the two questions in his present resolution together. He himself thought them, in some points, inseparably connected, though not exactly in the way which the gentlemen to whom he alluded maintained. Those gentlemen thought that the question of secondary punishments should be first considered; he, on the contrary, gave his first attention to the capital punishments; and he did so, because he took a vain reliance upon the fallacious appearance of efficacy belonging to the threat of punishment to be the true cause of the lax and disgraceful condition into which the secondary punishments had been permitted to lapse. The very first step, in his opinion, to a reform of our secondary punishments, must be a reduction of the capital punishments—a reduction of that stay which always deserted our lawyers in action, but a reliance upon which had tempted them to neglect the effectiveness of other systems, more safe and more important.

Now, in offering some reasons why the House should reaffirm the principle for which he contended, he could not do better than take his footing upon a ground which he had heard laid down by an hon. friend of his, that in all questions relating to the arrangement of punishments, the burthen of proof was not with those who attempted to reduce the capital punishments, but with those who endeavoured to support them. That course, indeed, was borne out by every general principle. Capital punishments could only be justifiable in cases of absolute necessity. They must be justified upon the same principle with war or any other measure which went to take away the life of man—upon the principle of self-defence, the principle that we had no means of securing or defending ourselves against the individual except by destroying him. Then, of course, the lead lay upon those who justified the taking of man's life. They were bound to show that, in the cases where they contended for it, it was necessary. Those who contended against the power could not be expected to prove a negative. Now he (sir J. M.) charged this defect upon the law of England for the last 150 years. All other nations, whatever might be their laws, be they mild or be they cruel, made it a principle generally, that those laws should be carried into effect. But, while such was the practice with all foreign nations, England had 200 capital offences upon her code, for not more than 20 of which convictions ever took place; and upon the convictions which did take place, not more than one offender out of ten suffered the penalty of the law. That such a system, notwithstanding its absurdity, should find some supporters, he did not wonder. Paradox, from its very singularity, at once attracted the attention of genius. An anomaly or a gross absurdity was a plaything, as it were, for men of talent; and when men of talent had their own interest concerned in supporting that absurdity, it would be strange if, in a country like England, it should be found without defenders. And then, on the other hand, people's fancies were excited by such discussions. They were more pleased and amused with hearing a thing any how defended, which they had never imagined could bear defence at all, than they would be with a homely, straight-forward discussion. Certainly it was to no other cause that he could ascribe the fact of our criminal laws having been defended by Mr. Windham and Dr. Paley. There had, indeed, been a spirit of chivalry about the general conduct of Mr. Windham—a love of singularity, and a reverence for ancient customs—which rendered his defence of this system perhaps rather intelligible. Men naturally delighted in that which was new to them. Liberal opinions were the opinions of the society in which Mr. Windham had [illegible] and lived, and consequently there had been nothing to him of novelty about them; but, in taking up the old opinions, the dogmas of former ages, he had the pleasure of defending a hopeless cause, of justifying abuses long and long exploded, and of palliating evils which were condemned by every enlightened man in the country except himself. As to the panegyrics which lawyers by profession were eternally pronouncing upon the laws of the country, while they were undiscriminating, he, (sir J. M.) thought they were wrong. Upon portions of their commendation he agreed with them altogether; but indiscriminate praise carried back his mind to the words of that poet through whose prose writings even the spirit of Paradise Lost often beamed in all its vigour; such commendation made him think of the words of that poet, the first defender, let it be remembered, in Europe, of a free press and an unfettered conscience; that bard, in his address to the Lords and Commons of the land, spoke in these terms—"Those who freely magnify what has been well done, and fear not to declare as freely what might be done better, give the truest covenant for their fidelity. Their highest praise is not flattery, and their plainest advice is a kind of praise." And such was the kind of praise which he (sir J. M.) would apply to the great principles combined in the law of England. To distinguishing praise he offered his full tribute; and of undistinguishing praise, what, he asked, was the value? Such praise was bestowed upon the law as it now stood. Why, yes; and it had been also bestowed before the time of William 3rd, when no man indicted for treason had a right to a notice of trial, to a copy of his indictment, or to a list of the witnesses against him. Such praise had been lavished before the act of the 1st of queen Anne, when no witnesses could be sworn in favour of a prisoner, and when it was a vain formality therefore to give him the right of calling witnesses at all. During all the time that those excellent regulations had existed, the cry against innovators had been no less loud than it was now. He contended, therefore, that the praises of lawyers were to be guardedly received. Mr. Serjeant Hawkins said, in his "Pleas of the Crown," that "those only who have taken a superficial view of the Crown law, charge it with rigour." Would the House believe that those words were written while the statutes against witchcraft were still in full force—while witches were burned as regularly as felons were hanged at every assize? But to come farther down. What was the state of the law even within the last 30 or 40 years? Had not women been burned alive for petty treason within that time, and prisoners put to the torture for refusing to plead? And yet all this while lawyers had not been less loud in their praise of law, courtly writers less warm in its commendation, or enemies to innovation less numerous and determined! It was to fundamental principles that he wished to draw their attention, in discussing the present question, although he was certainly aware that no views could be more unpopular in that House, and that nothing was in danger of being held more visionary, than the idea of framing a scale of punishments adapted to the degree and measure of criminality. He knew it might be said, that every attempt to construct such a scale had been found impracticable, and that no theory of the kind was to be found in the writings of Montesquieu. Let it not, however, be treated with scorn and derision on the credit of such representations. Such a scale was to be found in a document which, though it had been enacted nearly 600 years ago, still formed a portion of our written law—it was to be found clearly and distinctly expressed in Magna Charta. In that superannuated statute, passed by turbulent and martial barons, there was, indeed, a most singular contrast with the spirit of legislation that distinguished more modern times. But unpopular as it might be to refer to that ancient and venerable monument, to that law of laws which he charged the criminal jurisprudence of England with violating every day, he should yet think that a British parliament would listen with respect to this thirty times confirmed enactment. Remarkable it was that those whom we, in this enlightened age, were apt to consider as barbarians, had legislated respecting crimes with the clearest judgment, and with the most careful humanity. Their reserve as to the infliction of the last dreadful penalty, he had already noticed; their respect for property, and the rights of merchants, were equally conspicuous. Pecuniary fines were at that time an ordinary mode of punishment, and these were imposed on every occasion, with a strict reference to the amount of guilt, or the circumstances by which it was softened or aggravated. What were the words of that charter? "Liber homo non amercietur pro parvo delicto, nisi secundum modum illius delicti, et pro magno delicto secundum magnitudinem delicti, salvo sibi contenemento suo: et mercator eodem modo, salva merchandisa sua, et villanus alterius quam noster, eodem modo amercietur." Thus it appeared that their zeal for the distribution of justice did not overlook persons in a servile condition, but that every class was alike the object of their wise and provident liberality. At this period the civil magistrate might have called to his aid all the thunders of the church; but he did not think it necessary to avail himself of that alliance, in order to fortify his denunciations of capital punishment. At that time it was not capital to utter a forged note for one pound, to cut down a tree in an avenue, or to steal to the value of 40*s.* in a dwelling-house. It never could be deemed agreeable to the principles of religion, any more than it was to the letter of Magna Charta, to inflict the punishment of death for a fraud, or an offence against property, to which the culprit had been, perhaps, instigated by the extremity of want. He could not but think that the views taken in the 13th century, amidst all the rigour of the feudal system, presented an afflicting contrast in this respect with the opinions now entertained in some quarters where they could not fail of exercising a great influence. Enlightened lawyers were unhappily at variance with the authors of that great foundation of our liberties, which had been thirty times confirmed, and which contained, instead of a measure of suspicion and tyranny against all foreigners, a special enactment for their protection. Every one had heard the name, if he had not read the writings, of sir Mathew Hale. That celebrated person flourished under the reign of Charles 2nd, and in his work on the Pleas of the Crown, had observed, that death was too frequently adjudged in this country; but the difference between England and other nations was, that much was left elsewhere to the arbitrium judicis, but in England the laws were more determinate and inflexible. Let the House, then, only reflect on the change which had been effected in the character of our laws since that period. It was by the extent of discretion left to the judge in criminal cases, that we were now distinguished from, and opposed to every other country in the world. Was he to be charged with introducing new or vague opinions on the subject, when he produced an authority like this; or rather did it not justify him in proclaiming the more recent doctrines received upon it as themselves an upstart degeneracy which they could not too soon abandon? Since the time of sir Matthew Hale, when, according to that venerable person, the criminal law of England was too sanguinary, there had been added various capital punishments for forgery, for stealing in a dwelling-house to the value of 40*s.* and for sheep-stealing. If it were said, that modern usage differed from the usage of antiquity, and had led to a different result, he should be extremely happy to place the argument upon that issue. Lamentable, indeed, was the inference furnished by a contemplation of the actual effects which had followed the change in question. The average of capital convictions from 1805 to 1809 inclusive, was 381; and for the last five years this had risen to 1,260. Here was one striking evidence of the practical result of a legal system, contrasted not only with the sentiments of our ancestors, but with the laws and institutions of every other country under heaven. Something must be attributed, beyond all doubt, to an increase of population. A variety of causes might have been more or less influencial in producing this rapid and frightful increase; but surely the presumption was against those penal laws, under which this increase of crime had taken place. In other countries, where the law was different, a different result had followed; and so far they had the experimentum crucis in favour of his argument. When the disease became more violent, instead of abating, and its symptoms rapidly and constantly increased, surely there was reason to suspect that the remedies were not well chosen or applied. It would not be asserted by any enlightened foreigner, that there was any thing in the national character which peculiarly disposed it to the perpetration of criminal offences. The House had recently received several petitions on this subject, exhorting it to adopt those principles which he was now feebly endeavouring to recommend. In some of them it was truly urged, that the extreme severity of punishment often defeated its own purpose, and secured impunity to the offender. Perhaps enough, however, had scarcely been said on the importance of adverting to its usefulness in every instance, where the punishment of death was inflicted. He feared that this great object was too frequently endangered and altogether sacrificed, by its disagreement with the feelings and sympathies of mankind. It was in vain that the tyrannical magistrate might flatter himself with the hope of spreading the terror of his authority by the severity of his judgments. The laws of nature had declared, "thus far shalt thou go, and no farther:" those punishments which were called infamous were at length laid aside from their want of efficacy, and it was well known that when torture was sometimes inflicted upon faith and conscience, such was the support which the victims derived from the admiration and sympathy of their beholders, that their triumph was complete, where their oppressors had been most confident of their misery and humiliation. When mankind beheld the life of a fellow-creature sacrificed for a petty theft, a trifling injury or fraud, their feelings at once revolted, they sympathised with the sufferer in his dying moments, and, ascribing his punishment to the effect of superior power alone, they too often inwardly loaded both laws and judges with execrations. These were reflections that seemed to have escaped the authors of those 220 capital felonies which now polluted our Statute-book, and so many of which had been added since the time of sir Matthew Hale. Admitting the advantage to be derived from a particular case of punishment, where the circumstances were of an aggravating nature, still they ought likewise to look at the other side, and consider at what price this advantage was obtained. The awful punishment of death was rendered familiar, the ideas and sentiments of men were confused, and the execution of a criminal was disarmed of all its salutary terrors. That infliction which would otherwise carry an authority that must impress itself on the hearts of all, was regarded as an unavoidable accident; a certain number of deaths was calculated on, even as soldiers looked forward to the same events in the course of an honourable campaign. The sword of justice was thus blunted, and the corrective influence of penal laws was lost. If it was said, that he was now speaking as a philosopher and a theorist, he would refer to the observations of a learned person, Mr. Serjeant Adair, in 1796, then a member of that House, and holding the office, (being the last eminent person who had held it) of recorder of the city of London. That learned person, after an experience of 20 years, did not hesitate to say, that the complexion of our laws was too sanguinary, and that "it was painful to reflect, that the punishment of death was not reserved for the crimes of treason and murder." Now, he (sir J. M.) did not go so far in his philosophy as the judge to whom he was alluding went, conformably to his experience and practice. The principles which he was now desirous of seeing espoused by the House, had been already adopted by states of the most various and dissimilar forms of government—from countries in which the power of the monarch was all but absolute, to those in which the constitution rested on the verge of democracy. Russia had followed the example. Even Austria had been subdued in this instance, and, foe as she was to human improvement generally, she here joined with Spain, with America, and with every other country except one, or rather except with a branch of the legislature in that one, which he should not name. Such was the force of truth, and so strong were the moral feelings of society on this important subject, that during the French revolution, a very material alteration and reform was effected in their criminal jurisprudence. That eminent person, under whose government it was perfected, and of whom it was now certainly lawful to speak with historical truth, had not only approved of the undertaking, but assisted at its execution, in which he displayed a share of acuteness, as well as zeal, which would cast over his fame hereafter, a lustre that neither his conquests nor his adversities would eclipse. This it was due in justice to his memory to state; for though he had fallen in an evil hour, and had weakly yielded to the temptations of legitimacy, when he might have been the champion of the liberties of mankind, yet it was with no narrow mind that he regarded these subjects: he patronized art, he was himself versed in science; he did not say to his professors that he wanted no learned men, but was disposed to encourage all improvement that did not circumscribe his power or limit his ambition. The Code Napoleon was complete in 1810, but, to comply with the habits and language of the noble marquis, he would date his remarks upon it "as to its working," in the year 1811. The entire number of capital offences in our criminal jurisprudence he had already stated to be 223: in the French code it was six. These six were the following:—high treason, which was technically defined in terms different from those used in this country. Murder, which was well defined. Arson. Forgeries of notes of the bank of France and government securities. Coining; and theft, under some of the following circumstances:—that it be done in the night; that it be perpetrated by two or more men; that the parties are armed; that a house is broken open, or entered under the cover of legal authority; or that arms be either used, or threatened to be used. Under the French Code, a seventeenth part of the offences specified were capital. Under the English code, about a seventh were punishable with death. In France, there was no transportation, and about four-fifths of the punishments inflicted consisted of imprisonment and hard labour. In England, the number of transportations were about one-fourth—the punishments by imprisonment and hard labour amounted also to one-fourth. The mean amount of the English population during the period to which his calculations referred, he would take at 11,000,000. The mean amount of the French population, during the same period, might be estimated at 27,000,000, being about two and a half to one. Such being the number, it appeared that the convictions in England had, in the first five years, doubled those which had taken place in France, being five times as many according to the number of the people. In the five years at the end of the period referred to, the convictions in England quadrupled those in France, amounting to ten times the number in proportion to the population. In France, the average number of convictions, in the first three years, was 294. The average number in the last three years, 303, being a variation of only nine. In England, the average number at the first-mentioned period was 349. In the latter it had risen to 1,249. This increase, though part of it might be ascribed to the distress under which the people had groaned and continued to groan, he argued, was also caused in part by the character of our penal code. The situation of France, twice invaded, the disbanding of a large army, and the horrors of a thirty years' war, would have led them to expect a different result. That France had escaped the fatal increase of crime which had been witnessed in England, must therefore be ascribed partly to her improved criminal code. In this country, from the year 1805 to the year 1809, which was considered a period of prosperity, when the chancellor of the exchequer was in his Paradise, and issuing paper dreamed that it was wealth, the convictions had increased from 339 to 549. As this was before the peace, it could not be ascribed to the pressure of misery under which, he would not deny, the people had since groaned. He feared he was trespassing too long on the patience of the House; but as we had but seldom an opportunity of discussing the merits of the Code Napoleon, he did not think he should be right if, in considering a theory, he omitted to point out its merits. In alluding to it, he was comparing the systems of two great nations, which, though rivals in all things, might be considered as jointly at the head of Christendom. He was comparing the results of the different systems of criminal jurisprudence adopted by each; and though, as was said 150 years ago by lord Halifax, "Nothing was so apt to crack in stretching as an inference," he did not think he was stretching the inference too far when he asserted, that when two systems produced such opposite effects, when under one crime had decreased, whilst under the other it had increased rapidly, there must be in the one something to be approved, and in the other something to be condemned. There was also this striking contrast in the criminal laws of France and England—that the former were intended to be carried into effect, whilst, the severe decrees of the latter were in most cases dispensed with. This, in itself, was an objection which ought to be fatal to the system. It was a defect opposed to the practice of all civilized nations, opposed to reason, and justly condemned by all experience. It was not, then, too much to infer, that, under such a system, crime could not be effectually checked nor adequately punished.

He would now come to that part of the subject to which the second part of his resolution tended; namely, that the reduction of capital punishment would tend to the improvement of civilization. First, with respect to the state of the police. The principal object of police should be to repress disorder; the next, to detect crime. To repress disorder, it would be necessary that more effectual means should be adopted; but he should object to means derived from too great a restriction of human action, which he would call tyranny; and in the detection of crime, he should deprecate as much as possible a system of espionage, by which he believed a nation lost more than it could gain on the score of morality; for it was in itself a more fertile source of crime than any other. The most effectual means, in his opinion, for the detection of crime, would be the mitigation of punishment. If the laws were more mild, no stigma would attach to the discovery of crime; the hearts of men would go with its detection, and we should have that information given voluntarily, and from the best of motives, which was now extorted from the worst of vices. If it was wished to make the informer and the prosecutor appear less odious, let them not so frequently conduct to the gallows; let not death to the accused follow the accusation, and we should then have crime discovered, and its punishment approved; instead of, as was now the case, crime studiously concealed, and its punishment looked upon as wanton severity.

With respect to transportation as a punishment for crime, he would say, that, in a variety of cases in which it was at present inflicted, he considered it unnecessary and impolitic. There were, however, two classes to which he thought it would be applicable. The first was, that of incorrigible offenders, whom no exertions could reclaim. Such persons, undoubtedly, ought to be banished from the society of which they were unfit members. The next class consisted of persons of a description exactly the reverse. He would suppose the case of a man who had fallen into a crime of which, perhaps, he might be disposed to repent, but, in consequence of which, there was no hope of his resuming his former place in society. Such a man might be properly sent into a new society, where he might repent, and again return to those moral practices from which he had fallen. To such persons transportation might be applicable; but then it should be to a colony established on different principles from that of New South Wales? When America ceased to be considered as a fit asylum for convicts, this colony was thought of; but in its establishment there was this capital defect—it was not considered that the best foundation for a penal colony was a moral population, where the example of a different set of men with better habits might have an effect on the newly-arrived convict. This, however, he regretted, was not considered in our present system. There were other vices attendant upon our treatment of convicts, which called for correction. He did not see, for instance, why persons transported might not have their labour transferred to private masters, by whose care and superintendence much good might be effected. At the same time that he suggested this, he admitted that it was a measure which ought to be adopted with great caution; but, with proper precautions, he was satisfied it might in many cases be done with very good effect.

Another circumstance, which was eminently calculated to check crime, was a proper attention to prison discipline. In adverting to this, he would not wish that any thing should be adopted without the most serious consultation with those benevolent individuals who had made the subject their study. But, without going more at large into the question, he would say, that every thing depended upon the classification of the prisoners. This he thought might be left in many cases to the discretion of the magistrates; yet it ought to depend entirely on the nature of the crimes of which the parties were accused. He saw one plan by which all felons were classed together. This system was most absurd and injurious. What could be more unjust than to allow the parricide to be confined and associated with the man whose offence was the cutting down a tree? Surely nothing could be more effectual to spread the contagion of crime than such an association. But because the neglect or the folly of our law condemned each equally to death, the parricide, and the poisoner, and the most hardened criminals, were to be placed in a state of daily and hourly intercourse with those whose offences, though denominated felonies, could scarcely be deemed immoral, when compared with the enormities of those with whom they were associated. The consequence was, that until the evil was remedied by proper classification, our prisons, instead of being the means of repressing, would become so many nurseries of the worst of crimes; and those unfortunate persons whom our game laws, our revenue laws, and our poor laws sent thither, would, by the contagion of evil example, become, on their liberation, the pests of society. To those humane and benevolent individuals who devoted a large portion of their attention to the improvement of our prison discipline, it was impossible to render sufficient thanks. Their exertions were daily becoming a national benefit, though he had known occasions upon which their labours had been scoffed at, and held up to ridicule. In that House he had heard a member, whom it was unnecessary to name, ridicule such exertions, and add, that it seemed as if it was intended to encourage crime, by making prisons houses of ease and recreation. Allusion had also been made, in derision, to Persian carpets, as if such luxuries were to form a part of an improved treatment. This, however, was grossly mistaking the objects of those who endeavoured to improve our prison discipline. They desired to let the prisoner feel that he was in prison, as much as that could be felt consistently with health, and the prospect of reformation. To the latter every possible attention was paid, and it would not be contended that the former was a matter of indifference. Individual cases of reformation might be scarce, but one example of that kind was worth twenty of severe punishment. The hon. and learned gentleman then alluded to the many instances of reformation of criminals which had been effected by the benevolent exertions of a number of highly respectable females, who devoted a large share of their attention to that most meritorious object. These reformations were effected, not by a departure from the modesty of their sex, but by following up the dictates of that modesty, by exhibiting in their own persons those traits of mildness and benevolence, of humane commiseration for the failings of their fellow-creatures, which render the virtuous so amiable, and make their example so impressive. We had heard of associations of females in Catholic countries called the Sisters of Charity, who made it their business to visit the sick in hospitals and prisons, and to perform all those kind offices by which misery could be alleviated. Their conduct was most praiseworthy; but they were bound by vows, and their actions were regulated by the rules of their order. They gave up all the relations of domestic life, and only adhered to the obligations of their rule. But our Protestant Sisters of Charity were bound by no vows; their actions were the result of no set of regulations which they must obey. They went further than those excellent models of the Catholic belief; for while they voluntarily devoted so large a portion of their time in administering to the wants, bodily and mental, of those whom they visited, they forgot not the duties of domestic life, of which they still continued the best models and the highest ornaments. Their benevolent visits brought them in contact with some of the worst of vices in their worst form—the female. They made themselves acquainted with the weaknesses, the follies, and the crimes of the unhappy objects of their care; and thus, by means of the same knowledge by which the villain was enabled to seduce them to the paths of vice, did those benevolent females endeavour to draw them to practices of virtue. He himself had seen some of the effects which he described. He had visited the prisons where those benevolent ladies were so humanely occupied. He was accompanied by persons who, while they were disposed to praise and approve of every plan by which the load of human misery could in any degree be lightened, were at the same time studiously vigilant to observe the manner in which such good was effected. They perceived with sincere satisfaction, not only the good done, but the modesty with which the benevolence of those ladies unfolded itself. No exaggeration of what had already been the result of their efforts—nothing of vanity, where such temptations to it existed—but the whole of their conduct in this pious work was marked by that modest and unpretending benevolence, which proved at once the sincerity of their intentions. It was a melancholy reflection, that our system of criminal laws was constantly opposing itself to such humane exertions. One execution for the forgery of a bank-note, or the cutting down of a tree, was calculated to defeat their best efforts. In proportion as their humanity was felt and appreciated, so must the severity of our laws be more striking by the contrast, to those for whom that humanity was excited. In proportion as they succeeded in making those unfortunate beings more enlightened, so must they perceive themselves the more opposed to our system of criminal laws. But he would not press the subject farther. He had trespassed too long on the attention of the House, but not, he trusted, without having succeeded in establishing the position—that undue and undistinguishing severity was the worst means of repressing crime. The hon. and learned gentleman concluded, amidst cheers from both sides, by submitting his resolution.

The Attorney General trusted, that in opposing the present motion, his hon. and learned friend would not consider him as adverse to any alteration in our criminal laws. It was certain that almost all the ameliorations in our criminal code had been introduced by gentlemen of his profession. It was therefore erroneous to suppose that the profession were opposed to any improvement in the state of our laws. He for one would not be favourable to capital punishment in any case where it could be shown that it might be safely dispensed with. He, however, could not consent to a motion which went to pledge the House to a measure which would cast a censure on the whole of our criminal law. The motion was the less necessary, as no specific measure was to be founded upon it this session; and such a sweeping declaration would, he thought, put the government and the criminal law in a situation in which they ought not to be placed. What had been the course hitherto pursued by his hon. and learned friend? He had first of all proposed the appointment of a committee to take into examination the whole state of the criminal law. Such a committee was accordingly appointed, and subsequently presented a report to the House, recommending that, in particular cases, capital punishment should be abolished, and a secondary punishment substituted in its stead. Upon that report his hon. and learned friend brought into the House certain bills to carry that recommendation into effect. The House adopted some of them, but rejected others; notwithstanding which, his hon. and learned friend said, that the House had, on that occasion, adopted the same principle indirectly which he called upon it by his resolution to adopt formally at present. The proper course for his hon. and learned friend to have pursued was to have again brought forward those measures which the report of the committee had recommended, in order that the House might see the remedies which it was intended to apply to the grievances complained of; but, instead of doing this, his hon. and learned friend had left the House entirely in the dark regarding his intentions, except, indeed, with regard to the cutting down of young trees, and the stealing of 40*s*. in a dwelling-house. With regard to the crime of forgery, his hon. and learned friend might have again submitted to the wisdom of the House his bill for the mitigation of the capital punishment attached to it. His hon. and learned friend was bound to have proposed some specific measure to parliament at present, or if he wished to obtain a declaratory resolution of the House, to have brought it forward at such a period of the session as would have enabled him to follow it up by some practical measure. His hon. and learned friend had said that the effect of the criminal law as it now stood was to increase the quantity of crime. Now, his hon. and learned friend could have no other grounds on which to rest his assertion than the number of individuals convicted and executed for any given offence; and if so, the return of those numbers did not bear him out in the proposition he had advanced. Besides, his hon. and learned friend had been somewhat inconsistent in the line of argument which he had himself used. His hon. and learned friend concurred, he believed, with the statement contained in the report of the committee on the criminal laws; namely, that there were some crimes—for instance, burglary, theft, murder, and robbery—to which it was still fitting that the punishment of death should be attached. Now, it so happened, that upon all offences of the nature above specified the punishment of death did not invariably follow; for there were such gradations in the moral guilt of them, that it would be impossible to inflict such punishment upon every occurrence of them without exception. He found, upon inspecting the returns, that the offences he had just named had gone on in the same ratio with the offences mentioned by his hon. and learned friend, and he therefore contended, that the argument of his hon. and learned friend, if it applied to the one species of offence, applied strongly to the other. It was also a fair inference from his hon. and learned friend's argument, for any person to state, "Your not always applying capital punishment to burglary and murder, leads to an increase of those crimes; and, therefore, to diminish the frequency of them, you ought to abolish the capital punishment for them, and to substitute a lighter and secondary punishment." But his hon. and learned friend had himself declared, that he had no wish to abolish the punishment of death in those cases; though he had not given any reason for the continuing it in the one case, and discontinuing it in the other. The principle of English law was not to have a scale of punishment adapted to the exact quantity of crime committed; but to have a known and specific punishment for each species of crime, and to leave that punishment to be mitigated by the Crown and the executive, whenever circumstances seemed to demand such a mitigation. It had been argued by his hon. and learned friend, that where the law affixed death to an offence, but afterwards inflicted a minor punishment in lieu of it, there it would be better to remove the greater punishment, and to continue the less with undeviating constancy. Now, to that argument he could not yield his assent; for even though the greater punishment were but seldom inflicted, it would still leave a strong apprehension of it on the mind of every criminal. With regard to the comparison which his hon. and learned friend had drawn between the state of the criminal law in France and England, he would merely ask him whether he would wish to introduce into this free country the police and criminal law of France? Unless the preventive police of France, and the whole system of Napoleon, were taken into consideration, any person making a comparison between the criminal code of France and that of England, and founding it principally upon the number of criminals convicted and executed in each country, would be certain to arrive at a very erroneous conclusion. But, what period had his hon. and learned friend seselected for bringing forward his resolution? At that very moment they had a committee sitting up stairs on the state of the prisons of the country, a bill was upon their table by its express direction; and a gentleman who had been sent to New South Wales to gain information respecting the state of the convicts, was daily expected to return with that information. At that very moment a committee was busily employed in examining into the state of our Police; and, yet that was the moment chosen by his hon. and learned friend, to call upon the House to resolve to take into consideration, not now, but in the ensuing session, the means of increasing the efficacy of our criminal law by abating its present undue rigour, of strengthening our police, and of rendering the punishment of imprisonment and transportation more effectual for reformation than it was at present. To adopt such a resolution would be to hold out to the country a sweeping condemnation of the criminal law as it now stood, and would place those who had to administer it in the most painful situation. As he had no wish to prevent this subject from receiving full consideration at a fit opportunity, he should not meet the resolution with a direct negative, but would content himself with moving the previous question.

Mr. Fowell Buxton said, that at so late an hour he should not have risen to address the House, were it not for some of the minor points which had been touched upon in the course of this discussion. If the present motion went merely to affect the law as applicable to capital offences, he should have rested its merits upon the able speech of his hon. and learned friend; but upon the minor points to which his hon. and learned friend had adverted, he begged permission to make a few observations. It was curious and essential, in looking at this subject, to consider the operation of the existing law, and how far the prevailing punishments were rendered available in practice. Upon a reference to the returns of committals and convictions in Ireland, he found that the number of committals in one year for offences not capital, were 6,000; for offences that were capital, 2,500. Of the former, the convictions were in the proportion of one-half, and of the latter only one-seventh. The same inquiry would lead to nearly the same result—though not perhaps to the same extent—in England. In Ireland he might also mention that the committals for minor offences were 3,700, of whom 3,000 were convicted. In England experience showed that when a man was tried on a capital charge, his chances of escape were double, in comparison with what it would be, were he indicted upon the minor charge. And in America, when the capital law was mitigated, the acquittals were only at the rate of 1 to 7, although before the alteration in the severity of the law they always equalled the convictions. In the year 1818, the number of persons sentenced to death or transportation were 3,906, of whom 100 only were executed. The greater part of the rest had been transported. Upon the punishment of transportation it was only necessary for him to remark, that it did not constitute what could be considered as a secondary punishment. The right hon. and learned gentlemen opposite, the noble marquis who sat near him, lord Liverpool and lord Sidmouth, all admitted, that there was no adequate secondary imprisonment. Lord Ellenborough had said twelve years ago, that transportation was nothing but an easy migration by a summer's voyage from a worse situation to a better. It was by all admitted, that, in the way of terror to a criminal, transportation was just nothing at all. On the contrary, it rather offered a bounty and a temptation to crime, than an inducement to refrain from its commission. He held in his hand the best evidence of that fact, from the testimony of convicts themselves. If the House would permit him, he would read a letter transmitted by a convict of the name of Clark, from Botany-bay, to his wife in England. It was a private and a confidential letter. [A laugh.] He meant it was confidential until he had obtained the wife's permission to read it; and the letter would show how far transportation operated to induce remorse in the mind of the criminal, and how far it could be considered as deterring a culprit by example. The letter commenced thus:—" Providence shines on me in every shape; I hope he will provide for you as he has for me. [A laugh]. I cannot grumble —the winter here is hotter than the summer in England. We have two crops here every year, and no ice ever thicker than a shilling: the grapes lie in loads on the rocks, and the peaches run wild in the fields; so that the day that I committed the offence which brought me here was the best day's work I ever done." He would submit whether this letter contained any thing like a tone of remorse; or whether it afforded any thing in the way of useful example—which ought to be the object and end of all punishment. He would mention another instance. It was in the person of a convict named Cook, who had also written home to his family, describing the comforts of his situation, and the good exchange he had made by his change of residence. "I am (says this man) living a servant with one 'Squire Love; he lives very well here, and is reckoned a very clever gentleman." Now, it so happened that he (Mr. Buxton) knew something of this 'Squire Love. He had lived for a long time as a clerk with a gentleman in a county with which he was well acquainted, and had repaid the confidence reposed in him by his employer, by robbing him of property nearly amounting to 20,000*l.*, with the produce of which he had loaded a ship, and was about to emigrate. The police, however, secured him. He was tried on the capital charge, but saved, and would have escaped altogether, were it not for a minor count, on which a conviction was obtained against him; in consequence of which he was ordered for transportation. Thinking that the execution of such a sentence would only enable him to enjoy more completely the ill-gotten wealth he had retained, he (Mr. Buxton) applied at the home-office, to entreat that the sentence of transportation might be commuted to imprisonment in the hulks, or hard labour. He encountered a refusal, and the man was transported, and transformed into "'squire Love, a very clever gentleman;" and so he certainly was. The only question was, did the same description apply to those who sent him there? When this mode of punishment was found so utterly to fail, why was it persevered in? He remembered to have read in Tacitus of a Roman named Gallio, being transported for some crime to Lesbos; but upon its being ascertained that the was enjoying insula nobilis et amena, he was brought back, and placed in a situation more likely to expose him to privation. The lateness of the hour alone prevented him from entering more largely into the question. He should therefore pass over altogether the police branch of this subject, and merely advert to the example of Charles 5th, which had been quoted last year by his hon. and learned friend (Sir J. Mackintosh), and which furnished a memorable illustration of the benefit of mitigating the severity of the criminal code. It was well known that the whole of the early part of Charles the Fifth's reign was marked by religious persecution. He had framed the Code Caroline, which, for undistinguishing severity, was a refinement upon the laws of Draco. It inflicted, without selection or mercy, the most cruel and lingering death; and the result of that system was found so inadequate for the purpose of prevention, that Charles himself, at the close of his life, was convinced of the necessity of altering it. It was the deliberate conviction of his reason, and not any thing like a woman's compassion which dictated the change. The law had been stretched so far, that accusers and prosecutors were wanted—witnesses were not forthcoming—and at length judges could not be found; the screw and the crucible were applied in vain; torture, which was alike applied to the prisoner and the witness, had failed altogether; and the whole code was at length altered. He should detain the House no longer than by adding his firm conviction, that at present there was a prevalence of crime in England which was an evil of the first magnitude: coupled with this was his conviction, that the remedy was not hopeless. They had it in their own hands; and he believed they would most efficaciously secure it by pledging themselves to his hon. and learned friend's motion.

Mr. Courtenay said, that though he concurred in the general principles laid down by his hon. and learned friend, he could not accede to the resolution. Nothing could be more improper than to set the public mind afloat on the subject for six or twelve months, without doing any thing for so long a period to remedy the evil. As there was a committee now sitting, whose labours were directed to that end, he did not see how the House could come to any resolution which imputed neglect. The present proposition would not advance the practical reform of our criminal code, and therefore if the question was pressed to a division, he should vote against it.

Mr. Secretary Peel said, that he concurred in what had been stated with respect to the committee for the reformation of prison discipline. Their exertions were above all praise, being dictated by the soundest policy, and likely to lead to the most beneficial results. It was his intention, on Friday next, to submit to the House a bill which went to provide for the regulation of prison discipline. Was it possible, then, for him to support a measure which was to pledge the House to take into its consideration a subject, which had been already delayed too long? The question of transportation was one which presented many difficulties. As it would, however, be materially affected by the forthcoming bill for the improvement of prison discipline, he should refrain from saying any thing about it at present. He also concurred in the propriety of adopting a vigorous system of police. God forbid that he should mean to countenance a system of espionage; but a vigorous preventive police, consistent with the free principles of our free constitution, was an object which he did not despair of seeing accomplished. He was equally unwilling to postpone that subject till the next session. It was his intention to introduce a plan for making the experiment upon a small scale. Something should be done with respect to transportation, but he would wait for the report of the gentleman who was sent to New South Wales. He would here mention one scheme which had suggested itself to his mind, and which might lay the foundation of a new mode of punishment, free from many of the objections to the present system of transportation, and combining with it hard labour. The experiment in question would be of this kind; namely, to send to Bermuda a certain number of convicts to be employed on the public works now carrying on there, taking securities that at the same time that such employment should be provided, their moral discipline should be properly attended to. This was a mode of punishment, which, inasmuch as it combined removal with hard labour, might be assimilated to that of the hulks at home. As to the general principle and wording of the motion, he concurred in the objections which had been taken by his hon. friend. When, in the course of the next session, the hon. and learned gentleman should feel disposed to take up the subject in detail, he should not find in him a predetermined opponent.

Mr. Wynn earnestly recommended the hon. and learned gentleman to withdraw his motion; at all events in its present form.

Sir J. Mackintosh said, he would have no hesitation to adopt the suggestion of his right hon. friend, if he did not feel it necessary to retain that part of his resolution which went to pledge the House to adopt measures for increasing the efficacy of the criminal law by mitigating its rigour. The resolution pledged the House to no principles but those which they had session after session recognized, therefore no injury could possibly follow the adoption of his resolution. By entertaining it, the House would give a proof of their intention seriously to adopt measures for the amendment of the criminal code. They would thus invite persons of knowledge and experience to lay their sentiments upon the subject before parliament. The resolution would, in fact, serve as a notice, as well to the profession of the law, as to all others, to supply that House with all the information they could impart on a question which required all the wisdom, the learning, and ability of the nation.

The question was then proposed, "That this House will, at an early period of the next session of parliament, take into their most serious consideration, the means of increasing the efficacy of the criminal laws, by abating their undue rigour," and the previous question being put, "That the question be now put," the House divided: Ayes, 117; Noes, 101. Majority in favour of sir J. Mackintosh's motion, 16. Loud cheering followed the announcement of the numbers.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, June 5.

ALIENS REGULATION BILL.] Mr. Secretary Peel rose for the purpose of moving, that the powers of the Alien act should be intrusted to the executive government for a period of two years longer. Even those who differed from him in opinion, would admit that he opened the question fairly, if he touched, first, upon the nature of the danger to which he proposed to apply a remedy; next, the character and extent of the remedy itself; and lastly, the various objections which, upon general principles of policy or apprehensions from abuse of power, might be started against the remedy. To begin, then, with the nature of the evil against which they had to provide. He recollected that he was proposing the continuance of an Alien bill at a time when the country had been seven years at peace, and after a declaration from the sovereign, that he continued to receive assurances of the favourable disposition of foreign powers. But every man who looked back to the events of the late war, the circumstances of the contest, and to the principles which had produced it—every one who dwelt upon the consequences by which that war had been attended—must admit, that it was not the mere signature of a treaty of peace, nor even the duration of a peace for seven years, that could extinguish the principles which had led to the tumult, or conciliate the various interests which had taken part in it. He denied that to provide a corrective for such an evil, was any imputation on the character of those relations of amity in which this country was bound with the other states of Europe. It was also to be recollected that, within the last two years, revolutions had taken place in some countries, and attempts at revolution had been made in others, through the agency of secret societies, and the instrumentality of the military force. Conspiracies had been formed even where no act of resistance had taken place, which had been put down by the strength of government. He did not advert to these events with a view of pronouncing any opinion as to their character, his object was, to impress upon the House that such a state of things could not exist without reviving those very principles which characterised the late war, and without producing that very re-action that, if successful, would unsettle the pacific relations of Europe. The effect of these events, however, was the expatriation of many of the most active agents in these revolutions and conspiracies. They fled from their respective countries, and though the government of this country was armed with an Alien act, and though many of these persons sought a refuge here, in no single case was the asylum of our shores denied to them. No matter what was the part they had taken—no matter the tone or tendency of their principles—no matter what their crimes against their own governments—on the part of this country there existed the disposition to grant an oblivion of the past. Even in cases where informalities arose which might have produced some embarrassments, he could appeal to hon. members in his eye, whether the uniform inclination of the government was not, to avail itself of any advantage? That character for hospitality of which this country was so justly proud had never been forfeited. When the law was executed against one individual (general Gourgaud), it was, because it was well known that he was endeavouring to make this country the theatre of his cabals. There had not been a conspiracy nor a revolutionary attempt for the last two years, but had thrown some persons into this country. Instead of the Alien bill operating as a terror to foreigners, the number of aliens had increased since its enactment. In 1818, there had been 22,000 aliens in the country: in the present year the number exceeded 25,000. In 1819, the increase of arrivals above departures had been 266; in the five expired months of the present year alone, the increase had been no less than 655. It was impossible to avoid inferring from these facts that the Alien bill had not prevented the resort of foreigners to this country. He hoped he should not now be met with the argument, that the increased number of aliens formed an increased reason for withholding the powers of the bill. If power over an increased number of persons was to be called an increased power, then, had the number of aliens diminished instead of increased, he might have made an argument upon that diminution of power in favour of his measure; but it would be most unfair to convert a proof of the lenity with which the act had been used into a plea for continuing to intrust government with its powers. Under this bill, then, we secured to the foreigner who sought an asylum in this country an oblivion of the past. We had a right to say to aliens, "You shall not abuse the hospitality of these realms, you shall not desecrate the sanctuary you have chosen, by making it the scene of conspiracies and cabals." For it would be in the highest degree unjust, to suffer this country to become the resort of all those who should be disposed to enter into plots against the peace of states with which we were in amity. If the present Alien act was permitted to expire, such, he averred on the responsibility of a minister, would be the case. It was with a view to a particular evil that he recommended the measure in question. He could assure the House that in bringing it forward he was biassed by no partiality or prejudice, and that he founded it not on any vague surmise. Still less was he influenced by any suggestions from foreign courts. No; it was as secretary for the home department, and by virtue of that office alone, that he should now submit to parliament the expediency of renewing those powers under which the admission of foreigners to this country had been regulated since the peace. With regard to the nature and extent of its remedial influence, he was utterly at a loss to discover what there was about it to challenge so determined an opposition as there was reason to apprehend. One of the provisions of the bill required from every foreigner landing in this country a statement of his rank and situation in life, and in default of such communication imposed a penalty on the master in whose vessel he arrived. The more material, however, indisputably, was that conferring on the Crown a power to direct by proclamation, or order in council, any foreigner to quit the kingdom. In case of disobedience, he was at first subjected to a small penalty, still retaining a right of appealing to the council, after which he might, if he gave no satisfactory explanation, be at once removed. An hon. and learned gentleman (sir J. Mackintosh) had the night before attempted to create an unfavourable impression against this proceeding, by a reference to Magna Charta. Just so it had been usual to allude to the policy of queen Elizabeth, and of states placed in circumstances altogether different. Now, any individual who listened to the learned gentleman, and did not happen to be familiar with Magna Charta, must conceive that the admission of foreigners to our shores was established in it as a ruling principle, according to which the right could neither be limited nor withheld. On examining it, however, there appeared no such variance between its authority and measures of a more recent date. He found in it, indeed, but one enactment that at all respected strangers; and this, by the exception accompanying it, proved to be far from a general or permanent regulation: "Omnes mercatores habeant salvum et securum conductum, exire, et venire, ad emendum vel vendendum," &c. But it was also provided, that in the event of war, the merchants of the country with which we had commenced hostilities, should in the first instance be attached, and kept in custody till it was seen in what manner our own merchants were treated by their government. It was also worthy of remark that the enactment to which he had alluded, contained the phrase "nisi antea publice prohibiti," or unless the king in council prohibited them. As to the conduct of queen Elizabeth, and the policy subsequently adopted by this country on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, the periods of those events bore no resemblance to the present. When Elizabeth, in another part of her reign, was surrounded by different circumstances, she, probably recollecting the expression "nisi antea prohibiti," pursued a course wholly unlike what had been so loudly commended. In the council-register of her reign might be seen copies of directions issued to bishops, to the master of the rolls, and to two aldermen of London, that all foreigners not belonging to any church or congregation should be ordered presently to avoid the kingdom. But in order to fortify his argument, he might here allude to a bill lately presented by a learned member (Mr. Scarlett), a gentleman of high reputation in the courts, and who might be considered as the model of a Whig lawyer. He meant the allusion merely by way of precedent, not as a reflection in any point of view, though he hoped it might serve as an instance that gentlemen on the other side, whatever were their political opinions, did not when they sat down seriously to remedy a grievance think of referring to all the ordinances or principles of Magna Charta. The learned gentleman had recently introduced a bill for the more effectual removal of the poor, and this bill enacted that a single justice before whom a pauper should be convicted of leading a disorderly life, might have the power of committing him to the House of Correction, there to be kept to hard labour for a time not yet specified. Now, he was far from censuring this provision; but how did it accord with the well-known declaration of Magna Charta—"Nullus liber homo capiatur vel imprisonetur nisi per judicium parium suorum?" It could not be denied that all power was liable to some abuse; but the experience of seven years went to show, that the proposed measure was as little likely as any to produce it. Returns had been laid before the House, showing that the powers with which it invested government had been exercised but in four instances, since the year 1815. Doubtless this was not a complete justification; but it at least afforded a presumption, that the continuance of those powers would not lead to any practical inconvenience. If it were said, that there was no guarding against the abuses of subordinate agents, he would undertake to assure the House, that subordinate agents should never exercise these powers. He did not consider that foreigners were in any real danger of suffering injustice by the effect of malignant insinuations on the mind of a secretary of state, nor had the conduct of the British government hitherto been such as to afford an example to the detriment of our countrymen resident in foreign states. He pledged himself, on his responsibility, to a just exercise of the powers in question. He believed it to be a measure of lenity and moderation. He certainly did not undervalue the opposition it might encounter, but he had rather submit to any inconvenience or unpopularity than carry about with him during the recess, the heart-sickening consciousness that from the dread of these, he had been deterred from bringing forward a measure which he believed essential to our security. He concluded by moving, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to continue the Act for establishing Regulations respecting Aliens arriving in, or resident in this kingdom in certain cases."

Sir J. Mackintosh observed, that he had felt the deepest anxiety and alarm on hearing that it was in contemplation to propose a renewal of the present measure. It could not but produce the deepest feeling of melancholy to find principles such as those proclaimed by the right hon. gentleman avowed to a House of Commons, or to any assembly of men accustomed to a free government. It was lamentable to find them made the ground of a legislative proceeding, by a minister of great talents, and of high character. The right hon. gentleman was thus furnishing them, not with an auspicious sample of the future benefits to be expected from his career, but marking the outset of an administration which would probably last longer than he (sir J. M.) should live, by an assertion of principles that, if pushed to their legitimate consequences, would subvert every law and every security which we now enjoyed. What was the tenour of this proceeding? It vested in the government a direct and absolute power of banishing from the home of their choice, from the conduct of their affairs, and perhaps from the seat of their fortunes, 25,000 individuals. This bill, too, was to be passed on the assurance of a secretary of state, that he would only exercise this absolute power in cases where it should be necessary and expedient. Gracious God! had it not been said that ship-money was so moderate, that although levied by the mere authority of the king, no real grievance or oppression was likely to arise from it? The very same arguments had been urged in defence of that iniquitous imposition, which were now advanced by the right hon. gentleman, and which would go to destroy every right that had been acquired for us in a lapse of ages. The right hon. gentleman tendered his responsibility; and, relying on this, they were invited to surrender principles which their forefathers had maintained and established with their blood. When lord Strafford, who, though a guilty man, was illegally condemned, was, among the other grounds of his impeachment, charged with having advised in council the bringing an army over from Ireland, to enforce the king's proclamations in this country, it was represented on the other side, that the only object was, to preserve tranquillity, to enforce the laws, to defend juries, and to maintain public peace against the Pyms and the Hampdens of their country's liberties at that period. The number of foreigners now in this country, and necessarily claiming our protection, was supposed to be, about 25,000. If, prior to 1793, a single alien had been apprehended, and taken by a king's messenger to Dover, in order to be sent out of the country, he would have had his action against the authority under which he had been so treated. And, if that was the case with respect to one individual, at the period he alluded to, what would have been thought at that period of a minister of the Crown, if he had asked parliament, merely on the ground that the residence of such an alien might by possibility be converted into the means of conspiring against a foreign power, to pass a bill of pains and penalties against any single alien, subjecting him, at the arbitrary discretion of government, to exile from this country, and to a deprivation of the legal protection which, until that time, he had enjoyed? And yet, the only difference between such a supposed case and the present was, that the right hon. gentleman at present proposed a bill of pains and penalties against no less than 25,000 British subjects (for so they were while they remained in this country), depriving them of their legal rights, and subjecting them to exile, simply on the assertion of a minister of the Crown, that there was a certain degree of danger in permitting them to continue to enjoy those rights, that no abuse had heretofore taken place in the exercise of the required power, and that he would take care there should be no abuse in future, either on his own part, or on that of the subordinate agents employed. To what did that assertion amount? He never did believe there was any danger that a minister of the Crown in this country would intentionally exercise the power vested in government by the Alien act, in a maner unjust towards any alien. But there was infinite danger that a minister might be imposed upon by false and malicious tales, introduced in so plausible a shape by the enemies of a poor alien, that it would be impossible for him to guard against the deception. The right hon. gentleman had said, that a great many aliens resided in this country; that very few had been sent away; and therefore that the bill could not be injurious. To what did that argument amount? That it was of no moment to those persons if their residence in this country was a matter of sufferance, or a matter of right. That it was of no moment to them whether they owed their freedom from disturbance to the will and the generosity of a minister of the Crown, or to the shield which the law threw over them. That was the pure doctrine of despotism. He by no means attributed any intention of inculcating despotic doctrines to the right hon. gentleman, but such was in fact the character of his argument. The doctrine of liberty was, that to live by law was necessary to happiness; the doctrine of despotism was, that to depend on the will of government was not destructive of happiness. The argument of the right hon. gentleman was an outrage and a libel on the constitutional principles of this country. It was in direct contradiction to that of an illustrious writer, Hooker, the ornament of the reign of Elizabeth, no friend to anarchy, but the determined supporter of rational freedom. That illustrious writer declared, that "to live by one man's will was found to be the cause of many men's misery;" and why had Hooker given this opinion? Not because the will of the one man was always exercised against those who lived under it, but because it was always precarious. This was his objection to the Alien bill. It was not because he thought it would be put in force against those foreigners who might live in this country, but because he was unwilling to see 25,000 individuals coming here like beggars, and existing here only by the will of a minister. But, according to the doctrine of the right hon. gentleman, it was a matter of indifference whether that large body of men resided here by law, or merely by the generosity of a secretary of state. It just made to the alien the difference between Turkey and England, between Middlesex and Morocco, between liberty and slavery. Could the right hon. gentleman deny, that his bill would have this effect to the foreigner? Would it not render his residence here, as precarious as in the most despotic country in Europe?—But it was asked in a tone of confidence, can we allow that foreigners shall come and make this capital the seat of conspiracies against foreign governments? In order to see the force of this argument, it would be necessary to inquire what were the advantages which this capital possessed, for carrying on a conspiracy against a foreign government; and what were the governments against which such conspiracies might be excited? He would suppose that a body of Neapolitans had taken refuge in this country from the barbarians who had taken possession of their beautiful country. Was London the place where they could be most likely to act with effect to rescue Naples or Milan, or Turin, from the dominion of foreign bayonets? Could they raise regiments here, or send ships to the aid of their suffering country? If any conspiracy were in contemplation, he could hardly suppose a worse place for carrying it on with effect than London. —But the right hon. gentleman said, that as long as these things lasted, it would be necessary to continue the present measure. Did he mean to assert, that such conspiracies, or a danger of them, existed, or was it to be understood that the Alien bill was to be perpetual? He feared the latter was intended, when he heard the right hon. gentleman say, that it would be justified by a "temporary or permanent emergency." For his own part, he could not well understand the meaning of the term "permanent emergency." He could only suppose that a residence of six years in another part of the kingdom had created a slight confusion of ideas which caused him to mix up terms so different. Or, perhaps, intending the measure to be perpetual, and the whole of his arguments going that way, the word "permanent" naturally shot across his imagination, and he applied it to what he called the "emergency", on which he rested the bill at present. His argument was, that as long as refugees came from foreign countries to seek an asylum here—no matter from what cause, whether good or bad—so long should a bill of this kind continue; but when the causes for such refuge ceased, then the bill might be repealed. That was, as long as the persecuted and afflicted of other nations had need of an asylum on our shores, so long should our ports be closed against them; but, the moment that general content and satisfaction existed in every country—the moment that the harmony of Paradise was established on earth, and that the men of other nations no longer sought or required our protection, then our gates should be thrown open, free as the air of heaven, and admission be given to those who on their knees should come and ask it. What was this but a hypocritical cant, of affecting to proffer assistance where none could be required, and denying it where it was most wanted.—The right hon. gentleman had gone back to other ages for precedents. Now he would request him to transport himself for a moment to the first year of the reign of James 2nd, when by the revocation of the edict of Nantes, 50,000 unhappy Protestants, subjects of France, sought an asylum in this country: let him suppose, that the minister of that day, lord Preston, had come down to the House and demanded an Alien bill. What would have been his language? It would be something of this sort. "The king, my master, has afforded abundant proofs of his hospitality towards these unfortunate persons. Although differing from him in religion, he has ordered collections to be made for them. It is evident, therefore, that he wishes for the power which I now require, not for the purpose of abusing it, but because he is desirous to possess the means of preventing the discontented subjects of his great and powerful neighbour from conspiring against their sovereign, and thereby involving his majesty in a war with France. His majesty pledges himself never to abuse this power; I, lord Preston, his majesty's secretary of state, promise never to abuse this power. I also pledge myself never to allow it to be abused by any subordinate agents, but to take care that it shall always be employed with the utmost moderation, and with a strict attention to justice?" Suppose lord Preston had used such an argument in favour of an Alien bill, would it not have been as specious and as reasonable as that which the House had that night heard from a minister of a prince of the House of Brunswick? The right hon. gentleman had alluded to the reign of Elizabeth, and had quoted the order in council of that reign directed to two aldermen in London, commanding them to order all foreigners belonging to no congregation presently to avoid the kingdom. He should not be disposed to place much reliance on the authority of precedents from the reign of Elizabeth. He remembered that in the other House of Parliament, in 1816, an order of Elizabeth, authorising the banishment of Scotchmen from England, was quoted in support of an Alien bill then in progress; and it was on two subsequent occasions quoted in the House of Commons for a similar purpose; but it appeared on examination, that this was founded on an act of Henry 7th, enabling the Crown to banish Scotchmen from England, but which was afterwards repealed by the act of Union with Scotland. After having heard this quoted in support of three Alien bills, and finally destroyed, he was not disposed to place much reliance on authorities from the reign of Elizabeth. The argument which the right hon. gentleman had founded upon the meaning of the words "nisi publice prohibiti," he would leave him to settle with sir E. Coke, who had distinctly stated that the meaning of those words was, "unless prohibited by act of parliament." The right hon. gentleman had contended, that the clause of Magna Charta extended to merchants only; but let the House look to the state of society at the period when Magna Charta was signed. There were at that time no travellers but merchants. They were almost the only persons who visited foreign countries; and the clause which alluded to them went to the greater part of the foreigners who visited this country. But the right hon. gentleman had talked of the treatment of merchants. It was true, that by the law of nations one country might retaliate the treatment which its subjects had met from another state; but it was said we did not retaliate after the peace of Amiens, the treatment which the subjects of England had experienced in France. He should be ashamed of his country if it had so disgraced itself; and should consider himself a traitor to the honour of his country, if he took praise to her for an act of common humanity.

Mr. H. Twiss contended, that the right of excluding strangers was one inherent in every state, and that its exercise ought not to be considered an act of injustice. A country which tolerated the residence of foreigners within its territories had a right to say, "You shall be treated as our subjects, as far as the protection of our laws goes; but we will consider you only as tenants at will, and you must depart whenever we think proper to give you notice to quit." His learned friend had talked of the practice of ancient times; but he was prepared to maintain, that the practice of every period of our history was in perfect accordance with the principles of this bill. At the time of Magna Charta, foreign merchants trading to England were subject to the most grievous exactions. The barons, who had got a taste for foreign luxuries, were naturally anxious that the merchants who introduced them should not be exposed to too great extortion, and therefore they introduced that clause which authorized them to come and tarry in this country, unless publicly prohibited. A residence at will in this country was never the right of any but British subjects. It would be found, that a variety of strong enactments had passed against aliens at different times. It was well known that an alien could not buy an estate in this country; or if he did, it became immediately forfeited to the Crown. For a long time after the Conquest an alien could not rent a house in England; and even now he could not, except he was a merchant, and rented it for the purpose of his business: nor could an alien merchant hold a lease even of the house or shop in which his business was carried on: so jealous were our ancestors of giving to foreigners any permanent establishment in the country. If a British subject chose to leave the country, the king had a right to prevent him. If he had left it, and was resident abroad, he might be recalled; but an alien might go when he pleased, and when gone, he could not be recalled. The only power which the state exercised, and which by this bill could be exercised over him, was, to send him away whenever his residence here might be considered dangerous to the country. This, he contended, was a power which every state did, and ought to possess, over the subjects of another, resident within its territories. His learned friend had stated, that the object of this bill was, to gratify the rulers of foreign states, by excluding their obnoxious subjects from the protection of this country. Now, he must beg leave to differ altogether from his learned friend upon that point: though he should wish to know where was the immense evil, even supposing the case to be as he had stated it. Were not the parties to whom his learned friend alluded, known to be men of a sullen, factious, and turbulent spirit, discontented with the present order of things, upon the continent, and anxious to disturb the tranquillity which at present fortunately prevailed there? The great desideratum with men of such a temper was, to find a place in which they might mature their projects in secrecy and safety; and if this country, from its insular situation, its readiness to give credit, its free press, and the unbounded licentiousness in which that press indulged, afforded them such a place as they wished for, surely it was not altogether improper to arm the executive with such power as would prevent them from plunging it into war with states with whom it had no legitimate cause of quarrel. They had also been told, that this measure was now improper, inasmuch as it was originally passed as a war measure. He allowed such to have been the case; but if hon. gentlemen would compare the present bill with the original war measure, they would find all the severity and harshness of it omitted. But, were gentlemen ready to contend, that the Alien bill ought to be abandoned altogether? If they were, he would ask them on what grounds they were prepared to state that discontent had vanished from Europe? Did they think that, because the waters were now smooth, all the force of the tempest was spent; and that because the air was at present still, all the materials of confusion had been banished from the elements? If such were their opinions, they were indulging themselves in a flattering error. The learned gentleman concluded by giving his support to the bill.

Sir R. Wilson said, that though the right hon. secretary had taken upon himself the responsibility of the proposed measure, he must still consider it the work of the noble marquis who had taken so active a part in recent proceedings on the continent. It had been well said, that in the seventh year of peace we had a right to expect a discontinuance of this disgraceful measure. But what was the fact? The present bill, the baneful effects of which had been already so fully felt, and so ably described, was pressed forward for the purpose of meeting the views of those continental powers, who were confederated together to impede the progress of knowledge, and to retard the march of freedom. The bill bore upon its face the signet of the autocrats of Europe. This was not an English measure. Since England was England, we never had excluded foreigners from our shores, until our recent continental connections. The right hon. secretary had stated, that it was a part of the prerogative of the Crown to send foreigners from our shores. If this was so, let it be proved; and then where would be the necessity of this bill? It could not be denied, that this measure arose out of our continental relations; and the noble marquis had disgraced this country by connecting us with the police establishments of the continent. It had been urged, that only two foreigners had been sent out of the country since 1820; but supposing a single person had not been removed, still the constitutional objections to the measure must remain the same. It was a bill held in terrorem over the heads of all foreigners, either in, or likely to come into, this country. It had been urged that no oppression had been exercised under this bill. Let it be remembered that arbitrary power was never exercised with severity, until its possessors felt themselves secure. Without casting any imputation on the right hon. secretary, he could not help observing, that he appeared to desire this power, in order to show with how much forbearance, he would exercise it, upon the principle of the school maxim—"qui nolunt occidere quemquam posse volunt." He implored the House not to sanction a measure hatched and fostered in the sanguinary and bigoted despotisms of the continent.

Mr. Scarlett said, that upon the occasion when this bill was last granted by the House, he trusted that it would be the last time that so odious and unnecessary a measure would be demanded of it. The idea that a body of foreigners could revolutionize a people so exclusively national as were the people of this kingdom, though it was sometimes urged as a pretext for the continuance of this tyrannical measure, was an idea too puerile and absurd to deserve any formal refutation. The bill was attempted to be defended by precedents; but supposing those precedents to be correctly stated, they were taken from barbarous periods of our history, and ought to be avoided rather than imitated. He was surprised that any member of the legal profession could come forward in defence of this bill. He had hoped that, whatever indifference might be felt upon constitutional points in other parts of the community, it would not be shared by gentlemen who made the law a study and profession. As to offer any farther arguments upon this question would be quite superfluous, he should content himself with giving a decided negative to this unjust, tyrannical, and unnecessary bill.

Mr. Serjeant Onslow said, that not concurring in the opinion of the gentlemen opposite, that this bill was dangerous to the liberties of England, or unfriendly to the hospitable consideration due to foreigners, it should have his support. Notwithstanding the denunciations of the gentlemen opposite, the people of England had manifested no hostility to the measure.

Mr. Denman said, he would give the bill in every stage, his unqualified opposition. One great and important question had been repeatedly put to ministers, and, had invariably been left unanswered; namely, where was the proof of the necessity of the bill? The call remained unanswered, and the necessity of the bill still rested upon the mere statement of the right hon. secretary. That right hon. gentleman had spoken as if he were alone the responsible administrator of the measure, and had forgotten that the whole of the three secretaries were equally invested with the powers it conferred. It was urged that there were only four cases in which this power had been recently exercised. But how did the House know the facts of these four cases? How did the right hon. secretary himself attain the information respecting them? He must entirely depend upon others, which was the evil of a measure, executed by a secret power, called into action by secret spies, and, in the whole of its progress, worked by clandestine machinery. The right hon. gentleman had made a strong appeal to the House to intrust him upon his own responsibility with this bill. To such an appeal, he was compelled to reply, that it was a strong objection to the fitness of any man for office that he commenced his career by wishing to be invested with such a power. He wished, indeed, to have known the right hon. gentleman's official career in Ireland connected with some wiser and better act than the suspension of the trial by jury; and he should have been better pleased to have seen him open his official career in England, without calling upon parliament to intrust him with such a measure as this. It gave him the deepest concern to have heard the free provisions of Magna Charta decried and depreciated in a British House of Commons. Notwithstanding the neglect of this now, it would seem, obsolete charter, he would not hesitate to avow that he preferred the old law of England to the new, and was prepared to contrast, with some degree of humiliation, the hospitable securities of Magna Charta with the fatal provisions of this bill. The old law protected the foreign merchant according to the old and rightful customs of England, at the same time making due and provident precaution in a season of war, to prevent that protection from being abused. The new law proscribed the foreign merchant, and refused him an asylum upon the shores of England. And was it in the eighth year of peace that in this country, "the eldest born of freedom," a minister of the Crown, should call, upon his own responsibility, for the enactment of this obnoxious and most dangerous law? It was with pain and mortification that he had heard the declarations which accompanied the support of this measure. With what other sensations could the subjects of a free country hear the struggles of freemen in other parts of the world compared to the machinations of conspirators against the lawful authorities whom they were bound to obey? Thus, the struggle for liberty in Spain, the efforts in Portugal, the success of what were called the revolted colonies, were alike denominated the intrigues of conspirators; and the House was told, that some of the parties engaged in them had been received, or rather suffered to reside in England, with an oblivion of their crimes? Of what crimes?—the unforgiven crime of having fought for the liberties of their country. Ministers took praise to themselves for having, as it were, passed an act of amnesty for such criminals—for having pardoned, forsooth, those glorious martyrs in the cause of universal liberty—a liberty founded, too, upon a kingly basis, and a constitutional government—acquired, not, as was too often the case when the oppressed had to rise against the oppressor, by secret conspiracies and fell means, but by an open, manly, and determined avowal that the people would no longer endure the tyranny which had so long scourged them. These were the conspirators towards whom his majesty's ministers boasted they had held out a free pardon; and the very tone and temper in which their description was drawn was sufficient to show the uses that would be made of this bill. He hoped the voice and spirit of the country would be raised against so odious a measure; for the people of England could never forget, that though, in the present case, it was only called for to oppress persecuted and unprotected foreigners, the example might hereafter be adduced for the application of a similar engine to the destruction of their own liberties.

The Marquis of Londonderry said, he rose not for the purpose of travelling over again the same arguments which had been so forcibly adduced by his right hon. friend, but to protest against its being understood that he supported the bill upon any of the obnoxious grounds which it was convenient for gentlemen opposite to assume were the motives influencing that support. An hon. and learned gentleman (sir J. Mackintosh) had said, that he listened with sorrow and humiliation to the speech of his right hon. friend, and that he felt some alarm at seeing the dawn of his public life clouded by such a bill as this. The learned gentleman might express, if he pleased, these feelings of alarm; but he (lord L.), so far from participating with him in his view of that speech, saw nothing but a subject of congratulation at the prospect it held out of long and able and efficient services in the cause of the country. His right hon. friend had in that powerful speech, disclosed a character and a capability to exalt the liberties of his country, and to establish them upon a firm basis. He did not, indeed, like the gentlemen opposite, pursue a phantom and call it liberty, in the absence of all the qualifications belonging to real, rational liberty—a mock liberty, reared in the midst of bloodshed, and founded upon the ruins of empires. His right hon. friend understood liberty better. He understood it as he found it, as in England, raised upon a basis of internal tranquillity, and only secure and durable so long as it was allied with order and peace. For this country could not hope for tranquillity, nor deserve it, if it suffered its noble soil to become a public nuisance to Europe. The gentlemen opposite seemed to think that the larger the crop that could be collected from the malcontents of Europe, and deposited in England, the better. He thought differently. He would treat foreigners as he would treat the petitions of the people. He would throw open their doors widely for the reception of the petitions of the people. So would he the shores of England for the hospitable reception of foreigners. But if there were those among the petitioners who came to insult the House, or those among the foreigners who came here to work their conspiracies, he would make the conspirator and the insulter both feel, that, notwithstanding the characters which they thought proper to assume, they were not equal to the power of parliament, or the arm of the executive government. His right hon. friend had made out the strongest case. We lived among the ruins of empires, and until those countries so strongly alluded to, assumed another appearance than that which they now presented, he could not feel that high respect for them which others were so ready to express. He protested against the notion that the present measure had grown out of any understanding with foreign powers. So far from that being the case, the foreign powers understood that no such law could be adopted for their convenience.—If they entertained any doubt of it before, the discussions in that House must have placed it beyond all doubt. At the same time, he had no hesitation in saying, that foreign powers would have a right to complain, if persons engaged in conspiracies against them found an asylum in this country. If the House were of opinion that the measure grew out of any arrangement with foreign countries, he would call upon them to vote against it; but he would entreat them not to be led away by general declamations upon liberty, and high sounding appeals, which had no reference to the question. For the present, he should content himself with protesting against the supposition, that the measure arose out of any understanding with foreign powers; and though it must be painful to the House, to travel over the same ground as often as appeared to be intended, he would engage to give his opponents speech for speech, and argument for argument, in the progress of the discussions.

Sir John Newport said, that the noble marquis had asserted, that no argument had been adduced against the bill. He would tell the noble lord, that when a measure was introduced to take away a part of the liberties of the people, on those who introduced it, lay the burthen of the proof.—He denied absolutely that the right hon. secretary had given any reason for the bill. He had introduced it on his mere assertion, that it was necessary, and that the power should be exercised with caution. He (sir J. N.) would not devolve such confidence on any man; he would have better security than the word of any minister.

Lord Stanley could not be silent when he heard a minister of the Crown characterise the people of England as a nuisance to the rest of Europe. Where were refugees now to look for shelter? The creed which he had imbibed with his mother's milk, was this—that to the distressed and the persecuted of all the world, England was the land of protection.

The Marquis of Londonderry said, his argument was, that if England permitted the free ingress of foreign conspirators and agitators, she would absolutely become a nuisance to all Europe.

Lord A. Hamilton said, that if the bill was passed at all, it should be only for one year; but for himself, proposed as it was for no British purposes, he would not consent to its passing even for a month.

Mr. Secretary Peel said, that a learned gentleman (Mr. Denman) had declared, that he (Mr. Peel) was indebted to the other side of the House for the candour and forbearance he had experienced at their hands. Of any want of candour and forbearance on the part of those hon. gentlemen, he never complained. But, what did the terms amount to, as they were explained by the learned gentleman? Why, to this—that he was indebted to their candour and forbearance for not having attacked him for his junction with his majesty's government. He must tell that learned gentleman, that there was nothing he deprecated so much as his charity; that he defied his scrutiny; that he was not afraid of his accusation. If that learned gentleman thought that he was awaiting his accusation, "with bated breath and whispering humbleness," he was very much deceived. He challenged him to bring forward the accusation which he insinuated he had in his pocket, but would not promulge. His motives in accepting office were as pure as those which had actuated the learned gentleman in doing so. He had been connected with the present government ever since his first appearance in public life. He was secretary to the lord lieutenant of Ireland—a post which he quitted earlier than he could have wished. As to his subsequent connexion with government, it arose not out of his own solicitation. Excepting on one great question, upon which he had the misfortune to differ with ministers, he had never acted against them.

The House divided: Ayes, 189; Noes, 92. The bill was then brought in, and read a first time.

Friday, June 7.

BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH'S EXAMINATION QUESTIONS.] Lord Dacre rose with reluctance, to present a petition to their lordships, as it was directed against a person, whose character for piety and learning was eminent. After the petition should be read by the clerk, he would move that it be laid on the table. If their lordships agreed to that motion, he would follow it up by moving an address to the Crown. Their lordships were not ignorant of the nature of this case, as it had been before the House in the course of the last session. [See Vol. 5, p. 1166.] He must here observe, that if the right reverend prelate had thought fit to act consistently either with the statute law or the canon law, he would not have given occasion to the present complaint. But the right rev. prelate, not satisfied with the 87 questions, answers to which he originally required from all persons before he licensed them, had since added 36, making 123 intricate questions on points of doctrine propounded to the petitioner. The petitioner complained of this demand, considering himself only bound to declare his belief in the 39 articles. He should now beg leave to present the petition of the Rev. Thomas Shuttleworth Grimshaw, rector of Burton Latimer. [The petition was then read. It stated that the petitioner had appointed the rev. Edward Thurtell curate of Burton, and complained that the bishop had refused to license him on the ground of his not giving satisfactory answers to his questions.] The subject of complaint was chiefly this—that persons who had received holy orders were compelled to submit to an examination of a very extraordinary nature before they could be licensed to curacies in the diocese of Peterborough. The questions of the right rev. prelate were delivered to the candidates printed. The candidate was expected to annex his answer to each question, and then sign the paper; but the questions were printed in so contracted a manner, that they could only be replied to in the most brief manner possible. On Mr. Thurtell's appointment, the questions were sent to him, enclosed in a letter, from the bishop, dated the 3rd of August last. On the 11th, Mr. Thurtell wrote to the right rev. prelate, stating that he had complied with his lordship's request as speedily as possible; that he had considered the questions attentively, and had answered them, he trusted, conscientiously: but that some of the questions involved points of so difficult and delicate a nature, that he felt it impossible to answer them in a satisfactory manner in the column appropriated for that purpose; and that he had therefore deemed it expedient to add an appendix, wherein he had inserted some of the authorities upon which the answers were founded. The right rev. prelate, in return, had written a letter to Mr. Thurtell, dated the 17th of August, in which he says, "The object of my Examination Questions is, to ascertain the religious opinions of the person examined, that I may know whether they accord with the doctrines of the church. For this purpose I want nothing more than short, plain, and positive answers; such are the answers which have been hitherto given to my questions, and such I expect from every one. But instead of giving plain answers to plain questions, you have sent me a mass of dissertation, containing such restrictions and modifications as prevent your real opinions from appearing so plainly as they ought to do." He would not here enter into any discussion on the facility with which answers might be given, farther than to remark, that what the bishop called plain questions involved some of the most intricate and controverted points in theology. But the right rev. prelate proceeded in his letter to insist on his mode of examination, which, he observed, depended entirely upon his own discretion; and he concluded with saying, "I think it right to inform you beforehand, that if you do not choose to conform exactly to the mode prescribed to you, you cannot be licensed." Now, he was ready to admit, that the mode of examination was left to the discretion of the bishop; but then he must contend that the right rev. prelate was, both by the statute and canon law, bound to confine his mode of examination within certain limits. He would not dispute the right of even examining persons removing from one parish to another; but as this sort of examination had not before been practised in the church, the right rev. prelate ought not to have been surprised at finding some hesitation in those who were called upon to submit to it. He would not contend that under the 48th canon such an examination was not within the reach of the right rev. prelate's power. But when spiritual persons removing from one charge to another produced proper testimonials, such a course as that pursued in the diocese of Peterborough was altogether unknown; because it was naturally to be presumed, that such persons had already been sufficiently examined. If their lordships referred to the act of 13th Eliz., they would find that the bishop could only examine the candidate in order to ascertain whether he could explain in Latin an account of his belief in the articles of the church. The canon, in the same manner, requires the candidate to give an account of his faith in Latin, according to the articles. Thus, though the bishop was at liberty to examine on his discretion with respect to the mode, yet he was limited, both by the canon and statute law, as to the object, which was merely to make the candidate give an account of his faith according to the articles. The questions of the right rev. prelate were, however, of a leading nature, and often admitted but of one answer. Indeed, he called upon the candidate to answer them with yes, or no. They were a series of tests, framed for the see of Peterborough, in addition to the 39 articles, which were the only lawful tests. In proof of the latitude of interpretation allowed for the 39 articles, he would quote some of the highest authorities of the church. Bishop Burnet, in his History of the Reformation, book i, part 2, speaking of the form in which the articles of the church had been drawn up by those who framed them, states, that they cut off the errors of popery and anabaptism—" avoiding the niceties of schoolmen, or the peremptoriness of the writers of controversy; leaving, in matters that are more justly controvertible, a liberty to divines to follow their private opinions, without thereby disturbing the peace of the church." Fuller, in his Church History, observes, that the present articles in the main agree with those set forth in Edward 6th's time, but those who drew them up wished to allow more liberty to dissenting judgments. He says, "These holy men did prudently predis-

cover that differences in judgments would unavoidably arise in the church, and were loth to unchurch any, and drive them off from our ecclesiastical communion for such petty differences, which made them pen the articles in comprehensive words, to take in all who, differing in the branches, meet in the root of the same religion." The noble lord then quoted the bishop of Bangor, bishop Horsley, and several other eminent authorities for a wide interpretation of the 39 articles. To these authorities he might add the intention of the persons who established the articles, which appeared from the king's declaration prefixed to them. As it thus appeared that the articles of the Church of England admitted of more than one mode of arriving at belief in them, he must contend that the right rev. prelate was bound to receive every answer by which a candidate could explain his belief according to the articles. The candidate, it appeared, was not admitted to examination until the questions were answered. But if the candidate was ready to account for his faith according to the articles, the right rev. prelate was, according to the statute of Elizabeth, bound to examine him. Their lordships must perceive, that if this course was permitted in one diocese, it might be generalized. Every bishop might have his particular set of questions, and their clergy would be driven to study these papers, in order to discover to what diocese it would be most convenient for them to go. To act on such a system was nothing else than recruiting for dissenters. There would soon be an episcopacy, with questions and articles on one hand, and a dissenting ministry on the other. It was the boast of this country, that there was no wrong for which the law had not a remedy. Was this system of clerical interrogation to form an exception? If there was no remedy in the hands of their lordships, they might at least be the means of procuring redress. The Crown might refer the case to the Convocation, or some other mode of settling the question might be found. Their lordships ought, therefore, to agree to the address he intended to move after the petition was laid on the table. The purport of the address would be, to request that his majesty would be pleased to order an inquiry to be made to ascertain whether any innovations had taken place in church discipline.

The Bishop of Peterborough [Dr. Herbert Marsh,] rose and said:*—My Lords;—The question, whether the prayer of this petition shall be granted or not, must chiefly depend on the truth or falsehood of the allegations. The allegations, therefore, shall be distinctly submitted to the consideration of your lordships. But, as some topics have been introduced, to which the allegations do not refer, it is necessary that those topics should be previously examined. The noble lord has stated, and truly stated, that I refused a licence, in the course of last summer, to a person whom the petitioner had nominated to the curacy of Burton Latimer. But the noble lord has not accurately stated the grounds on which the licence was refused; nor was the refusal itself an act of injustice, as must be inferred from the arguments which he has employed. That a bishop is not only authorised but required to examine curates before they are licensed, appears from the 48th canon; and the necessity of such examination appears farther from the terms of a curate's licence, in which a bishop declares that he confides in the "sound doctrine" of the person to whom he grants it. Now, my lords, it would be a perfect anomaly, if they who are entrusted with the duty of examination had not the power of determining the mode of examination. Exercising, therefore, the discretionary power which belongs to examiners in general, I sent to the person, whom the petitioner had nominated, an Examination Paper, containing questions, which I required him to answer. The object of this examination by question and answer, being avowedly to ascertain the religious opinions of the persons examined, the only mode by which that object can be satisfactorily obtained, is by short, plain, and positive answers to the questions proposed. Such answers have been invariably given by the persons, to whom the questions have been proposed during the time that I have employed them in my present diocese. But the petitioner's intended curate departed entirely from the mode prescribed, which no one had attempted beside himself. Instead of giving direct answers to the questions proposed, he answered in so ambiguous and circuitous a manner, that it was impossible to ascertain with any precision what his opinions were. Where I was the most anxious that he should be explicit, he was the most obscure. For the answers to such questions he referred me to an appendix, consisting of ten folio pages, closely written; and this appendix had so many restrictions and reservations, that instead of explaining his opinions, it served only to conceal them. My lords, this was a mockery of examination, and an insult to the bishop who proposed the questions.

Having stated to your lordships in what manner the object of the examination was defeated, I will proceed to the sequel. Being unwilling to reject, without affording the opportunity of a second trial, I sent on the 17th of August 1821, another copy of my questions, which I desired this person to answer in the same direct and positive manner, with which no one had ever refused to comply. And I added, that if he did not choose to conform to that mode, he could not be licensed. My lords, this was no exercise of severity: for the mode prescribed was the only mode by which the object of the examination could be obtained. But in a letter which I received from him on the 30th of August, 1821, he informed me, that he could give no other answers, than those which he had given already, but that, if I wished for more explanation, he was ready to send it. Now, I request your lordships to consider the circumstances under which this offer of additional explanation was made. I had already endured the drudgery of wading through ten folio pages of explanation, which tended rather to conceal, than to explain. Could it be expected then, that I should require more explanation, which would evidently have been of the same description? It would really have been absurd to require it. And as he positively refused to answer in such a manner, as would enable me to say, that I confided in his sound doctrine, I should have subscribed to a falsehood, if I had signed his licence. I refused therefore, what as an honest man I could not grant.

Another topic, to which the noble lord has adverted, is the custom of bringing testimonials, when a curate applies for a licence; which testimonials, if he comes from another diocese, are countersigned by the bishop of that diocese. Such testimonials, as the noble lord contends, imply, that the person, who brings them, has been sufficiently examined already, and therefore ought not to be subjected to any further examination. I cannot mean to offer an affront to any of my right rev. brethren: but where I must take the responsibility on myself, I must be allowed to judge for myself. And after all, my lords, to what do the usual testimonials amount, in reference to doctrine? They are signed by three beneficed clergymen, who state, that "as far as they know and believe," the person who brings them has never taught any thing that is contrary to the doctrine of the established church. And the bishop who countersigns them, states only, that the subscribers are beneficed in his diocese, and worthy of credit. The testimony of the bishop therefore is testimony to the credit of the subscribers. And though no bishop ought to countersign a testimonial, if he knows that the person, in whose favour it was given, really does maintain doctrines which are contrary to those of the church, as he would then declare, that the subscribers were worthy of credit in a case where he himself believed they were not entitled to it, yet where a bishop has not subjected a curate to examination, he must generally depend on the testimony of the subscribers. After all, then, the testimonial which is brought from another diocese, resolves itself generally into the testimony of three beneficed clergymen. And as their testimony to doctrine is matter only of opinion, which unfortunately for the present age is subject to great diversity, the bishop of one diocese offers no affront to the bishop of another diocese, if, notwithstanding the counter-signature of the latter, the former determines to grant no licence, till he is enabled to declare from his own knowledge, that the licensed curate is of sound doctrine.

The remarks, with which I have hitherto detained your lordships, have related to the examination of curates. But though the refusal of a curate's licence gave rise to the petition, the petition extends over a much wider field. It relates to the examinations for holy orders: and the noble lord, who presented it, has himself appealed to the 34th canon, which relates exclusively to candidates for holy orders. From that canon he has argued against the use of those questions, which were originally proposed only to candidates for orders, and are now confined to them again. I shall at present make no remarks
